P R E F A C E.

LOVERS of Literature and the Fine Arts! Many long, weary months we have been digging gold and gathering gems for you; and here they are! We have brought you the precious metal from olden mines and newly-discovered placers; and all climes and countries have been explored to amass the treasure.

Some gems from their native rocks, but many more from the decaying caskets and coffers in which they were stored by others, we have here collected, newly polished and set in forms of order and beauty for your use.

On such articles as ARCHITECTURE, AUTHORS, the DRAMA, ENGRAVING, FICTION, HISTORY, MUSIC, PAINTING, POETRY, PRINTING, and SCULPTURE, these collections, we believe, will be found more choice and copious than those of any preceding volume; for the most noted anecdotal works, ancient and modern, have contributed to our Cyclopædia, and a large number of anecdotes, original and selected, have been added, which none of those works contain.

In previous books of anecdotes, the artists and literary men of America are hardly mentioned; as if the New World had no Historians, Novelists, Poets, Painters, or Sculptors who were worthy of a passing notice! So far as we could, we have endeavored to remedy this egregious deficiency; and such facts and incidents respecting American Authors and Artists are here presented as American readers may be pleased and proud to contemplate.

Bad taste, sceptical notions, and corrupt habits, glossed over by wit and novelty, are painfully frequent in the various collections of anecdotes which we have met with, some few volumes only excepted. The moral virus which such works diffuse where they circulate must be great. It has been our aim, in preparing our Cyclopædia, to expurgate these evils as much as possible from this department of literature. And, though we have freely introduced what may exhilarate and amuse, humorous incidents, sallies of wit and flashes of genius, along with matters calculated to awaken grave reflection or generous sensibility, we have studiously pruned away all vulgar and profane expressions, all sarcastic sneers and inuendoes against virtue and religion.

The inconsiderate youth may therefore read the work without injury, and the sensitive moralist without offence. As to the practical value of such anecdotes as this volume contains, we may speak somewhat at length. Their perusal may furnish at once agreeable entertainment and useful information, when the mind needs to be relaxed from the fatigues of study or the pressure of business and care. Whatever be one's mood of mind, or however limited the time for reading, in the endless variety and great brevity of the articles he can find something to suit his feelings, and something he can begin and end at once.

And while the perusal of such anecdotes may beguile the solitary, their repetition may enliven the social hour. How does facility in their use enable one to excel in conversation! If debate arises, they give him feathers and barbs for the shafts of argument, speeding them to the mark and fixing them where they strike.

And with the "Flowers of Biography and History" how may one perfume and adorn the genial sentiments exchanged in refined and elevated converse! And when all themes of weighty import become unwelcome to jaded intellects, how do these facetious occurrences, these brilliant repartees, these curiosities and eccentricities, when aptly cited, pour new life into the social circle, and prompt a fresh relish for “The feast of reason and the flow of soul”!

To instructors of youth and popular lecturers who would give information on the various topics of our volume, we trust it will be found no mean auxiliary: the importance of their having a variety of spicy anecdotal details with which to enforce and illustrate their communications, is almost too obvious to mention.

Writers, artists, students, and men of genius are sometimes found who seem prone to treat the materials of a work like this with indifference or contempt. But on the practical value of such anecdotes and facts, to these classes of persons let us quote D'ISRAËLI — a gifted author, at once laborious in compiling and skilful in using them.

“A writer of penetration sees connections,” says he, “in literary anecdotes which are not immediately perceived by others; in his hands, anecdotes, even should they be familiar to us, are susceptible of deductions and inferences, which become novel and important truths. ‘We yield to fact, when we resist speculation.’

“For this reason, writers and artists should, among their recreations, be forming a constant acquaintance with the history of their departed kindred. How many secrets may the man of genius learn from literary anecdotes! important secrets, which his friends will not convey to him. He traces the effects of similar studies; warned sometimes by failures, and often animated by watching the incipient and shadowy attempts which closed in a great work. From one he learns in what manner he planned and corrected; from another he may overcome those obstacles which, perhaps, at that very moment make him rise in despair from his own unfinished labor. What perhaps he had in vain desired to know for half his life is revealed to him by a literary anecdote; and thus the amusements of indolent hours may impart the vigor of study; as we find sometimes in the fruit we have taken for pleasure the medicine which restores our health. How superficial is that cry of some impertinent, pretended geniuses of these times, who affect to exclaim, ‘Give me no anecdotes of an author, but give me his works!’ I have often found the anecdotes more interesting than the works.”

Would our literary men and artists collect and classify these anecdotal details for themselves, it would be the better way, perhaps; but few have the time to do this, and fewer yet the patience.

We have thought, therefore, that by many of these men, at least, a large dictionary of well-selected anecdotes, old and new, on all the important subjects connected with Literature and Art, would be cordially welcomed. Such a dictionary it has been our aim to prepare; for hitherto no such work in the English language could be found.

The TOPICAL AND ALPHABETICAL ARRANGEMENT, and the FULL PARTICULAR INDEXES OF NAMES AND SUBJECTS, were intended to make the work useful to literary persons and artists, as a BOOK OF REFERENCE; yet these, perhaps, will render it no less interesting as a volume for GENERAL READING.

CYCLOPÆDIA OF ANECDOTES.

§ 1.* AGE, OLD, AND LITERARY PURSUITS.

THERE is an argument for the cultivation of the intellect to be drawn from the perpetual progress of the mind towards perfection, without a possibility of ever arriving at it. The infant body springs into boyhood, hardens into manhood, dwindles down to the decay of age, and returns to the dust from which it was formed. The mind runs a similar career in its onward progress, but not in its retrogression. Though the inroads of disease, or the feebleness of sensibility, may fetter its powers and obscure their brightness, yet the fact that intellect is frequently retained in its pristine vigor by the advanced in years, is an argument that the mind does not necessarily retrograde in old age.

The following incidents show this. They are calculated also to encourage the devotees of literature, though in advanced life, still to nurse the fire of genius, and toil at their high vocation.

And will not those who in early life have neglected mental improvement, find in many of these facts a stimulus to attend to it even in their maturity or old age?

1. SOCRATES, CATO, THEOPHRASTUS, RONSARD, AND BOCCACCIO.

Socrates learned to play on musical instruments in his old age. Cato, at eighty, thought proper to learn Greek; and Plutarch; almost as late in life, Latin.

Theophrastus began his admirable work on the Characters of Men at the extreme age of ninety. He only terminated his literary labors by his death.

Peter Ronsard, one of the fathers of French poetry, applied himself late to study. His acute genius and ardent application rivalled those poetic models which he admired; and Boccaccio was thirty-five years of age when he commenced his studies in polite literature.

2. ARNAULD, SPELMAN, COLBERT, AND TELLIER.

The great Arnauld retained the vigor of his genius, and the command of his pen, to his last day. He translated Josephus excellently when eighty years old, and at the age of eighty-two was still the great Arnauld.

Sir Henry Spelman neglected the sciences in his youth, but cultivated them at fifty years of age, and produced good fruit. His early years were chiefly passed in farming, which greatly diverted him from his studies; but a remarkable disappointment respecting a contested estate disgusted him with these rustic occupations. Resolved to attach himself to regular studies and literary society, he sold his farms, and became the most learned antiquary and lawyer.

Colbert, the famous French minister, almost at sixty returned to his Latin and law studies.

Tellier, the chancellor of France, learned logic merely for an amusement, to dispute with his grandchildren.

3. JOHNSON, CHAUCER, LUDOVICO, VOLTAIRE, AND CELLINI.

Dr. Johnson applied himself to the Dutch language but a few years before his death. In one morning of advanced life, he amused himself by committing to memory eight hundred lines of Virgil. At the age of seventy-three, when staggering under an immediate attack of paralysis, — sufficiently severe to render him speechless, — he composed a Latin prayer, in order to test the loss or retention of his mental faculties.

The Marquis de Saint Aulaire, at the age of seventy, began to court the Muses, and they crowned him with their freshest flowers. The verses of this French Anacreon are full of fire, delicacy, and Chaucer's Canterbury Tales were the composition of his latest years. They were begun in his fifty-fourth year, and finished in his sixty-first.

Ludovico Monaldesco, at the extraordinary age of one hundred and fifteen, wrote the memoirs of his times—a singular exertion, noticed by Voltaire, who himself is one of the most remarkable instances of the progress of age in new studies.

The most delightful of autobiographers, for artists, is that of Benvenuto Cellini—a work of great originality, which was not begun till “the clock of his age had struck fifty-eight.”

4. KOORNHERT, OGILBY, FRANKLIN, AND ACCORSO.

Koornhert began at forty to learn the Latin and Greek languages, of which he became a master. Several students, who afterwards distinguished themselves, have commenced as late in life their literary pursuits.

Ogilby, the translator of Homer and Virgil, knew little of Latin or Greek till he was past fifty.

Franklin's philosophical pursuits began when he had nearly reached his fiftieth year.

Accorso, a great lawyer, being asked why he began the study of the law so late, answered, that indeed he began it late, but should therefore master it the sooner.

5. DRYDEN, ANGELO, AND WREN.

Dryden's complete works form the largest body of poetry from the pen of one writer in the English language; yet he gave no public testimony of poetical abilities till his twenty-seventh year. In his sixty-eighth year he proposed to translate the whole Iliad; and the most pleasing productions were written in his old age.

Michael Angelo preserved his creative genius even to extreme old age: there is a device said to be invented by him of an old man represented in a go-cart, with an hour-glass upon it; the inscription Ancora imparo!—YET I AM LEARNING!

Sir Christopher Wren retired from public life at eighty-six; and after that he spent five years in literary, astronomical, and religious engagements.

6. NECKER AND LE VEGE.

Necker offers a beautiful instance of the influence of late studies in life; for he tells us, that “the era of threescore and ten is an agreeable age for writing: your mind has not lost its vigor, and envy leaves you in peace.”

The opening of one of La Mothe le Veger's Treatises is striking: “I should but ill return the favors God has granted me in the eightieth year of my age, should I allow myself to give way to that shameless want of occupation which I have condemned all my life;” and the old man proceeds with his “observations on the composition and reading of books.”

7. WALTON, BODMER, REID, AND HOBBS.

Isaac Walton still glowed while writing some of the most interesting biographies in his eighty-fifth year, and in his ninetieth enriched the poetical world with the first publication of a romantic tale by Chalkhill, “the friend of Spenser.”

Bodmer, beyond eighty, was occupied on Homer, and Wieland on Cicero's Letters.

The revolutions of modern chemistry kindled the curiosity of Dr. Reid to his latest days.

Hobbes exulted that he had outlived his enemies, and was still the same Hobbes; and to demonstrate the reality of this existence, published, in the eighty-seventh year of his age, his version of the Odyssey, and the following year, his Iliad.

8. ADAM SMITH.

Professor Dugald Stewart tells us that Adam Smith observed to him that “of all the amusements of old age, the most grateful and soothing is a renewal of acquaintance with the favorite studies and favorite authors of youth—a remark which in his own case seemed to be more particularly exemplified while he was reperusing, with the enthusiasm of a student, the tragic poets of ancient Greece. I heard him repeat the observation more than once while Sophocles and Euripides lay open on his table.”

9. DE TRESSAN AND FONTENELLE.

Of the happy results of literary habits in advanced life, the Count de Tressan, the elegant abridger of the old French romances, in his “literary advice to his children,” has drawn a most pleasing picture. With a taste for study, which he found rather inconvenient in the movable existence of a man-of-the-world, and a military wanderer, he had, however, contrived to reserve an hour or two every day for literary pursuits; the men of science, with whom he had chiefly associated, appear to have turned his passion to observation and knowledge, rather than towards imagination and feeling; the combination formed a wreath for his gray hairs. When Count de Tressan retired from a brilliant to an affectionate circle, amidst his family, he pursued his literary tastes with the vivacity of a young author inspired by the illusion of fame. At the age of seventy-five, with the imagination of a poet, he abridged, he translated, he recomposed his old Chivalric Romances, and his reanimated fancy struck fire in the veins of the old man. To the centenary Fontenelle the Count de Tressan was chiefly indebted for the happy life he derived from the cultivation of literature; and when this man of a hundred years died, Tressan, himself on the borders of the grave, would offer the last fruits of his mind in an éloge to his ancient master; it was the voice of the dying to the dead, a last moment of the love and sensibility of genius, which feeble life could not extinguish.

10. MASON AND CHATHAM.

One of the most beautiful sonnets in the English language was composed by Mason on the attainment of his seventy-second birthday.

The feeble frame of the Earl of Chatham, at seventy, sank under the effort to express the convictions of his mighty mind, after a speech so singularly eloquent, bold, ardent, and animated, as to rival, if not outvie, the most brilliant outpourings of his youth or early manhood.

11. FONTENELLE'S DOTAGE.

Fontenelle reached the very advanced age of ninety-nine years, and continued his literary pursuits to the last. Lord Orrery, in a letter written from Marston, near Glastonbury in Somersetshire, very beautifully said, "Fontenelle, like our neighboring thorn, blossoms in the winter of his days." He outlived, indeed, the knowledge of his writings, but the winter which destroyed his memory allowed his wit to flourish with the freshness of spring.

He could mark and estimate his growing infirmities, and make them the subject of lively sayings. "I am about," he remarked, "to decamp, and have sent the heavy baggage on before."

When Brydson's family read him his admirable

Travels in Sicily, he was quite unconscious that his own eyes had beheld the scenes, and his own lively pen described them; but he comprehended what he heard, thought it amusing, and wondered if it was true.

12. MENAGE AND SCALIGER.

Menage, in his Anti-Baillet, has a very curious apology for his writing verses in his old age, by showing how many poets amused themselves notwithstanding their gray hairs, and wrote sonnets or epigrams at ninety.

Julius Scaliger retained his faculties so well that, after he was seventy, he dictated to his son two hundred verses of a poem which he had composed the day before, and retained in his memory.

13. SWISSET, CORVINUS, AND TOURNAY.

It was said of a Mr. Swisset, that he often wept because he was not able to understand the books which he had written in his younger days. Corvinus, an excellent orator in the Augustine age, became so forgetful as not even to know his own name. Simon Tournay, in 1202, after he had outdone all at Oxford for learning, at last grew such an idiot as not to know one letter from another, or one thing he had ever done.

§ 2. ALMANACS.

14. FIRST ENGLISH ALMANAC.

The first almanac in England was printed in Oxford, in 1673. "There were," says Wood, "near thirty thousand of them printed, besides a sheet almanac for twopence, that was printed for that year; and because of the novelty of the said almanac, and its title, they were all vended. Its sale was so great, that the Society of Booksellers in London bought off the copy for the future, in order to engross the profits in their own hands."

15. CLOUGH'S ALMANAC.

The Cambridge Chronicle informs us, that Mr. I. Harlom has in his possession a copy of Clough's "New England Almanack," for 1702 — one hundred and forty-six years ago. It bears the following title:

"Clough, 1702. The New England ALMANACK for the year of our LORD MDCCII. From the CREATION, 5651. From the DISCOVERY of America, 210. Being second after Leap Year, and of the Reign of our Gracious Lord King WILLIAM the Third, (which began Feb. 13th) the 14 year. Made after a New Fashion. WHEREIN is contained (besides) the Changes of the Moon, Aspects, Courts, Spring Tides, Rising and Setting of the SUN; Sun and Moon's place, time of High Water; the Eclipses, &c. OBSERVATIONS on each month in verse and prose, both Pleasant and Profitable. Also, the length of the Day never extant in an Almanack in this country before, to which is added an Account of the High ways both East and West; with an account of the Courts in the Province of NEW HAMPSHIRE. Calculated for the Meridian of Boston in N. E. whose Lat. is found by late Observations to be nearest 42 gr. 24 min. but may indifferently serve any part of N. E. By Samuel Clough, Boston; Printed by B. Green and J. Allen, for Benj. Eliot at his Shop under the Town-house, 1702."

The almanac contains pages of memoranda, written in an antiquated manner. The following are specimens: —

"2d June 1725. Voted yt a New pump be prepared for ye use of ye kitchen, and yt a New well be dug and a pump put into it at ye Southeast corner of ye yard to accommodate ye students in Stoughton and Massachusetts Colleges."

"Voted yt ye Steward be desired to see ye Bell hung for ye Clock to Strike on, and give an Acct of ye charges thereof; and yt ye care of ye Clock be committed to him for ye year to keep it going, and yt he have £4 for his services in keeping it in order."

"13th Sepr. 1725. Voted yt Whereas there are great disorders arising by reason of ye Schollars living out of Com's; Voted yt every Student having a Study in ye College and actually Residents there shall be in Com's. Excepting such as are employed in occasional preaching, Servitors, and those whose bodily infirmities ye Presidt and Majr. pt of ye tutors judge will not allow it."

Mr. Clough was extremely weather-wise, and could predict its future state with most surprising accuracy. He tells his readers that perhaps, from the 15th to the 23d of January, it will be very Cold Weather if it "frees by the fire-side or on the Sunny side of a Fence at noon." So in April — "Perhaps wet weather, if it Rains; now fair weather if the Sun-shines; and windy or calm." So in July — "If now the Weather do prove fair, People to Cambridge do repair."

16. LAURENCE D'HENRY'S ALMANAC.

In 1717, the following singular commitment to the Bastille was made out by order of the Duke of Orleans, Regent during the minority of Louis XV. of France. "Laurence d'Henry, for disrespect to King George I. in not mentioning him in his Almanac as King of Great Britain." How long this unlucky almanac-maker remained in prison is unknown. The register of the Bastille, when examined at the revolution, afforded no information on the subject.

17. PARTRIDGE, THE WEATHER PROPHET.

An English paper tells a pleasant anecdote of Partridge, the celebrated almanac-maker, about one hundred years since. In travelling on horseback into the country, he stopped for his dinner at an inn, and afterwards called for his horse, that he might reach the next town, where he intended to sleep.

"If you will take my advice sir," said the hostler, as he was about to mount his horse, "you will stay where you are for the night, as you will surely be overtaken by a pelting rain."

"Nonsense, nonsense," exclaimed the almanac-maker; "there is a sixpence for you, my honest fellow, and good afternoon to you."

He proceeded on his journey, and sure enough he was well drenched in a heavy shower. Partridge was struck by the man's prediction, and being always intent on the interest of his almanac, he rode back on the instant, and was received by the hostler with a broad grin.

"Well, sir, you see I was right after all."

"Yes, my lad, you have been so, and here is a crown for you; but I give it to you on condition that you tell me how you knew of this rain."

"To be sure, sir," replied the man; "why, the truth is, we have an almanac at our house called 'Partridge's Almanac,' and the fellow is such a notorious liar, that whenever he promises us a fine day, we always know that it will be the direct contrary. Now, your honor, this day, the 21st of June, is put down in our almanac in-doors as 'settled fine weather; no rain.' I looked at that before I brought your honor's horse out, and so was enabled to put you on your guard."

18. ANDREWS'S NAUTICAL EPHEMERIS.

Henry Andrews, who died at Royston, England, January 26, 1820, aged seventy-six, was, for more than forty years, the able computer of the Nautical Ephemeris, and compiler of Moore's Almanac, published by the Stationers' Company. The sale of the latter work rose, under Mr. Andrews's care, to four hundred and thirty thousand copies annually. This prodigious circulation of Chaldean Mysteries was owing to the astrological predictions with which the worthy calculator was allowed to fill his work, though printed for a public company, and revised and sanctioned at Lambeth Palace, by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

19. BARNSTABLE THUNDER.

An American farmer, not the most acute, looking over his almanac, observed the words "Barnstable Thunder" opposite a certain day of the month. Having great confidence in the almanac-maker's prognostications of the weather, and being withal somewhat reverential, he was solemnly impressed with the belief that on the day predicted there would be thunder of most extraordinary character, and so he resolved to keep the day sacred. He dressed himself in his best clothes, and waited in great suspense for the occurrence of the wonderful phenomenon. But hearing one of his neighbors threshing, he gave him a call at his barn. "Why, how do you dare to work on such a day?" "What should hinder my working, pray?" "Why, didn't you know that this was the time set for Barnstable Thunder?" "No, I have heard nothing about it." "Well, it's in the almanac, you may be certain." The thresher laid by his flail. But on carefully examining the calendar, it was found that the word Barnstable was in Roman letters, and was not to be read with the following word thunder, in Italics, but with the words "Court sits," in the same type below!

20. MURPHY'S PREDICTION.

The origin of Murphy's Weather Almanack is interesting. This singular man undertook to predict the state of the weather; and — will it be believed? — he actually foretold that the 9th of November, lord mayor's day, would be wet and foggy. Now, it had happened that this has always been the fact nine years out of ten, and it actually occurred the first year of Murphy's publication! Verily, his fortune was made — and became fully secured by his prognostic that the tenth of the following January would be "very cold;" and so it was. Who could doubt the wisdom of the almanac-maker? For two or three years his almanacs sold by tens of thousands. Murphy's purse was well lined. The public began to doubt about the truth of his predictions. Now, alas! poor Murphy and his almanac are both forgotten; save one copy, which we took care to deposit in the British Museum, as a monument of English folly.

21. THOMAS'S PREDICTION.

When Thomas was preparing one of his first almanacs, a man who was engaged upon the work with him, asked what he should say about the weather opposite a certain week in July. Thomas humorously or perversely replied, "Thunder, hail, and snow." It was so put down and printed; and it so happened that it did thunder, hail, and snow at the very time. This fortunate prediction raised the almanac-maker in the estimation of many, and made his almanac the most popular in America.

§ 3. ALPHABETS.

22. THE AMERICAN CADMUS.

The invention of the Cherokee alphabet is one of the most remarkable events in the history of the aborigines. The best account we have seen of it is by Samuel L. Knapp, who became acquainted with See-quah-yah, its author, in 1828. The English name of this celebrated Indian was George Gass. He is said to have been a half-breed; but whether he was so or not, he never associated with the whites, or spoke any language but that of the Cherokees. Prompted by his own curiosity, and urged by several literary friends, Mr. Knapp applied to See-quah-yah, through the medium of two interpreters, to relate to him, as minutely as possible, the mental operations, and all the facts, in his discovery. The substance of his communications to Mr.

Knapp was as follows: That he, See-quah-yah, was now about sixty-five years old; that in early life he was gay and talkative; and although he never attempted to speak in council but once, yet was often, from the strength of his memory, his easy colloquial powers, and ready command of his vernacular, story-teller of the convivial party. His reputation for talents of every kind gave him some distinction when he was quite young, so long ago as St. Clair's defeat. In this campaign, or some one that soon followed it, a letter was found on the person of a prisoner, which was wrongly read by him to the Indians. In some of their deliberations on this subject, the question arose among them, whether this mysterious power of the talking leaf was the gift of the Great Spirit to the white man, or a discovery of the white man himself? Most of his companions were of the former opinion, while he as strenuously maintained the latter. This frequently became a subject of contemplation with him afterwards, as well as many other things which he knew, or had heard, that the white man could do; but he never sat down seriously to reflect on the subject, until a swelling on his knee confined him to his cabin, and which at length made him a cripple for life, by shortening the diseased leg. Deprived of the excitements of war and the pleasures of the chase, in the long nights of his confinement, his mind was again directed to the mystery of the power of speaking by letters—the very name of which, of course, was not to be found in his language. From the cries of wild beasts, from the talents of the mocking bird, from the voices of his children and his companions, he knew that feelings and passions were conveyed by different sounds from one intelligent being to another. The thought struck him to try to ascertain all the sounds in the Cherokee language. His own ear was not remarkably discriminating, and he called to his aid the more acute ears of his wife and children. He found great assistance from them.

When he thought that he had distinguished all the different sounds in their language, he attempted to use pictorial signs, images of birds and beasts, to convey these sounds to others, or to mark them in his own mind. He soon dropped this method, as difficult or impossible, and tried arbitrary signs, without any regard to appearances, except such as might assist him in recollecting them, and distinguishing them from each other. At first, these signs were very numerous; and when he got so far as to think his invention was nearly accomplished, he had about two hundred characters in his alphabet. By the aid of his daughter, who seemed to enter in the genius of his labors, he reduced them, at last, to eighty-six, the number he now used. He then undertook to make these characters more comely to the eye, and succeeded. As yet he had not the knowledge of the pen as an instrument, but made his letters on a piece of bark, with a knife or nail. At this time he sent to the Indian agent, or some trader in the nation, for paper and pen. His ink was easily made from some of the bark of the forest trees, whose coloring properties he had previously known; and after seeing the construction of the pen, he soon learned to make one; but at first he made it without a slit; this inconvenience was, however, quickly removed by his sagacity. His next difficulty was to make his invention known to his countrymen; for by this time he had become so abstracted from his tribe and their usual pursuits, that he was viewed with an eye of suspicion. His former companions passed his wigwam without entering it, and mentioned his name as one who was practising improper spells for notoriety or mischievous purposes; and he seemed to think that he should have been hardly dealt with, if his docile and unambitious disposition had not been so generally acknowledged by his tribe.

At length he summoned some of the most distinguished of his nation, in order to make his communication to them; and after giving them the best explanation of his principle that he could, stripping it of all supernatural influence, he proceeded to demonstrate to them, in good earnest, that he had made a discovery. His daughter, who was now his only pupil, was ordered to go out of hearing, while he requested his friends to name a word or sentiment, which he put down, and then she was called in and read it to them; then the father retired, and the daughter wrote. The Indians were wonder-struck, but not entirely satisfied. See-quah-yah then proposed that the tribe should select several youths from among their cleverest young men, that he might communicate the mystery to them. This was at length agreed to, although there was some lurking suspicion of necromancy in the whole business. John Maw, with several others, was selected for this purpose. The tribes watched them for several months with anxiety; and when they offered themselves for examination, the feelings of all were wrought up to the highest pitch. The youths were separated from their master, and from each other, and watched with the greatest care. The uninitiated directed what the master and pupil should write to each other, and these tests were varied in such a manner, as not only to destroy their infidelity, but most firmly to fix their faith. The Indians, on this, ordered a great feast, and made See-quah-yah conspicuous at it. How nearly is man alike in every age! Pythagoras did the same on the discovery of an important principle in geometry. See-quah-yah became at once schoolmaster, professor, philosopher, and a chief. His countrymen were proud of his talents, and held him in reverence as one favored by the Great Spirit. The government of the United States had a font of types cast for his alphabet; and a newspaper, printed partly in the Cherokee language, and partly in the English, was soon established at New Echota, characterized by decency and good sense; and many of the Cherokees were able ere long to read both languages.

23. DIFFERENT ALPHABETS.

The Sandwich Island alphabet has twelve letters; the Burmese, nineteen; the Italian, twenty; the Bengalese, twenty-one; the Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, Samaritan, and Latin, twenty-two each; the French, twenty-three; the Greek, twenty-four; the German and Dutch, twenty-six each; the Spanish and Slavonic, twenty-seven each; the Arabic, twenty-eight; the Persian and Coptic, thirty-two; the Georgian, thirty-five; the Armenian, thirty-eight; the Russian, forty-one; the Muscovite, forty-three; the Sanscrit and Japanese, fifty; the Ethiopic and Tartarian, two hundred and two.

24. DEFECT IN THE RUSSIAN ALPHABET.

The Church of St. Alexander Nevskoi, at St. Petersburg, is named after the canonized Grand Duke Alexander, whose remains were brought there in a silver coffin. It was in this same church, Kohl, the traveller, was told by a guide, pointing to a corner of the building, "There lies a Cannibal." The inscription announced it to be the Russian general, Hannibal; but as the Russians have no H, they change the letter into K; and hence the extraordinary and not very flattering misnomer given to the deceased warrior.

25. A BRIGHT SCHOLAR.

One of the earlier French princes being too indolent or too stupid to acquire his alphabet by the ordinary process, twenty-four servants were placed in attendance upon him, each with a huge letter painted upon his stomach. As he knew not their names, he was obliged to call them by their letter when he wanted their services, which in due time gave him the requisite degree of literature for the exercise of the royal functions.

26. CURIOUS WAY OF TEACHING.

Herodes, to overcome the extraordinary dullness of his son Atticus, educated, along with him, twenty-four little slaves of his own age, upon whom he bestowed the names of the Greek letters, so that young Atticus might be compelled to learn the alphabet as he played with his companions, now calling out for Omicron, now for Psi.

§ 4. AMANUENSES.

27. JULIUS CÆSAR.

It was said of Julius Cæsar, that, while writing a despatch, he could at the same time dictate four others to his secretaries, and if he did not write himself, could dictate seven letters at once. The same thing is asserted also of the Emperor Napoleon, who had a wonderful capability of directing his whole mental energy to whatever came before him.

28. MILTON'S PARADISE LOST.

Milton was blind when he composed that immortal work, the Paradise Lost. His daughters were his amanuenses. Nor did they merely write what he dictated; but they read to him from day to day whatever classical or other authors he might wish to consult in the way of reference, or to relax or invigorate his mind. But reading to their father the Greek and Latin authors must have been very tedious to them, as it is said they were quite ignorant of both those ancient languages.

29. GOLDSMITH'S TRIAL.

A voluminous author was one day expatiating on the advantages of employing an amanuensis, and thus saving time and the trouble of writing. "How do you manage it?" said Goldsmith. "Why, I walk about the room, and dictate to a clever man, who puts down very correctly all that I tell him, so that I have nothing to do, more than just to look over the manuscript, and then send it to the press."

Goldsmith was delighted with the information, and desired his friend to send the amanuensis the next morning. The scribe accordingly waited upon the doctor, with the implements of pens, ink, and paper placed in order before him, ready to catch the oracle. Goldsmith paced the room with great solemnity, several times, for some time; but, after racking his brains to no purpose, he put his hand into his pocket, and, presenting the amanuensis with a guinea, said, "It won't do, my friend; I find that my head and hand must go together."

30. DWIGHT'S THEOLOGY.

Dr. Timothy Dwight, of New Haven, prepared his System of Theology for the press in his old age, when his defective sight no longer enabled him to use the pen. He dictated to an amanuensis that long and eloquent course of sermons on the various doctrines of religion, which will carry down his name through coming time, and spread his influence over the world.

31. LIFE OF M. DE MENNEVAL.

It may be known that, during the consulate of Napoleon, M. le Baron De Menneval was his private secretary, but very few perhaps know his history; and, as we are about to relate an anecdote told by his sister to M. Jauffret, with which he was connected, we will give a hasty sketch of his interesting life.

M. De Menneval was the son of a baker in the Rue Mazarine, at Paris, with an only sister depending on him for support. For a time he worked steadily in his bake-house; but after a while he felt within himself a mental craving which his plebeian calling did not tend to satisfy, and every hour which he could steal from his business he spent at the Mazarine library.

The want, as may easily be understood, was like jealousy, it grew by what it fed on; and at length he gave himself up so entirely to literary pursuits and study, that he attracted the notice of the celebrated Palissot, to whom he soon revealed his history.

Palissot, after having long observed the youth, bade him diligently pursue his studies, and promised to use his best exertions to procure him some public situation. Nor was he unmindful of his pledge, for he soon afterwards mentioned him to François de Neufchâteau, then minister of the interior, and a man of taste and letters.

The minister declared himself interested in the young student, but regretted that he had so many more candidates than places that it was at that moment impossible for him to meet the views of the applicant. Some months passed away, and the ambitious De Menneval felt all hope die within him; and in this mood he wrote a respectful but gloomy and despairing letter to Palissot, thanking him for the service which he had sought to render him, and declaring that as he found every avenue to honorable advancement closed against him, and as he felt himself utterly unable to follow the mechanical calling of his father, he had determined on throwing himself in the Seine, and terminating at once his existence and his sufferings.

There was an air of sincerity, a concentration of melancholy in the wording of the letter, which decided Palissot on making a final and an immediate effort to reconcile him to life, and he instantly hurried, with the open paper in his hand, to the minister, who, struck by the energy of the young man's disdainful despair, made out, without delay, his appointment to an inconsequent situation under the government, and, accompanying it with a promise to Palissot that he would not lose sight of his pro- tegé, he bade him hasten to save a life which might one day prove a valuable one to his country.

De Menneval was saved; and shortly afterwards Joseph Bonaparte requiring a private secretary, he was recommended and accepted. But fortune was not yet weary of befriending him; for no very considerable time elapsed, ere Napoleon applied to his brother to procure for him a well-educated and perfectly confidential person to act in the same capacity.

After the hesitation of a moment, Joseph replied that he possessed a treasure in his own secretary, but that he would not withhold him from the first consul in the hour of need.

Napoleon, too much overwhelmed with business to stand on etiquette, took him at his word, and the immediate transfer of De Menneval to the cabinet of the consulate was the consequence.

It proved to be indeed an hour of need; for the accumulation of papers was so great as to daunt even the energetic and ambitious private secretary, who found himself, moreover, extremely puzzled to follow the rapid dictation of the first consul, who brooked no repetitions; and in this strait, fearful of omitting any portion of his task, De Menneval, after having for a considerable time struggled against the difficulty, ventured one day to ask his impetuous master whether he might be permitted to associate with himself a person capable of assisting him in his labors.

The first consul paused in the centre of the floor, across which he had been rapidly striding to and fro, and as the words met his ear, he thundered out in a voice beneath which De Menneval quailed,—"Comment! vous voulez ici un troisième, vous? nous sommes déjà trop de deux!"

At a subsequent period, when the first consul had become emperor of the French, and when he had learned to appreciate the talent, fidelity, and exertion of his private secretary, it chanced, as was indeed by no means uncommon to the impetuous conqueror, that business was infinitely more rife than time, and that M. De Menneval had been at the desk during three days and nights, snatching a hasty meal, but quite unable to indulge the feeling of weariness which had grown to positive pain.

The emperor, to whom it had never occurred that nature could not hold out beyond a certain point, had not reflected on the sufferings of his zealous amanuensis, and was pacing the apartment, on the evening of the fourth day, with his arms folded behind him, dictating in an unimpassioned and monotonous voice, as was his custom, without once looking towards the baron, who had long learned never to expect the repetition of any sentence from the lips of his impatient master, when suddenly missing the sound of the rapid pen, which now failed for the first time, Napoleon paused and turned towards the desk.

There sat M. De Menneval, bending over his papers; the pen had dropped from his hand, and he was fairly asleep. Only a few moments, however, elapsed, when the baron, in his turn, amid his uneasy slumber, missed the measured tramp of the emperor, with that extraordinary power of perception peculiar to the fitful sleep of exhaustion, and opening his eyes with a sudden start, he discovered, seated beside him, Napoleon himself, writing most industriously on the very sheet of paper on which he had been engaged, the emperor having taken up the subject where the overpowered secretary had resigned it.

The confusion of the baron may be imagined.

"Pardon, sire!" he exclaimed, with clasped hands, as he started from his seat; "do not blame me for want of zeal—I was not master of myself." "Mon-sieur," retorted the emperor, "why do you go to sleep while I am dictating?" "Sire!" said De Menneval deprecatingly, "I beseech of your majesty to forgive my involuntary fault, and to remember that this is the fourth day that I have spent at the desk, without one hour of rest—I was exhausted, and my weariness overpowered me." "M. le Baron!" said Napoleon, earnestly, as he looked up for an instant from his occupation; "why did you not remind me of this? Allez vous coucher, monsieur; allez vous coucher." (Go to bed, sir; go to bed.)

De Menneval needed no second bidding; he at once withdrew, and the emperor worked during a great portion of the night; and when they resumed their united labors on the morrow, he made not the slightest allusion to the circumstance.

32. JUNOT.

Marshal Junot was originally a private soldier, and, being a good penman, he was frequently employed in the writing of despatches. On one occasion he was ordered to write a letter at the dictation of an officer. Junot was seated in an exposed situation, and, just as he had finished the letter, a shell burst, and almost buried this intrepid soldier with earth. "In very good time," exclaimed Junot; "we wanted some sand!" The officer was Napoleon, and this circumstance occasioned Junot's advancement.

33. THE SCRUPULOUS OFFICER.

At Marengo, whilst Napoleon reconnoitred the enemy's movements, and gave his orders in writing, a cannon-ball struck the officer to whom he was dictating, and threw him mutilated on the ground. Napoleon ordered another secretary—he came. At the moment when Napoleon resumed his despatch, the wounded man raised himself. "General!" said he, in a dying voice,— "general—we stopped there." And he repeated the last words that Napoleon had dictated.

34. PETERBOROUGH.

Lord Peterborough, it is said, could dictate letters to nine amanuenses together. He walked round the room, and told each in his turn what he was to write. One, perhaps, was a letter to the emperor; another to an old friend; a third to a mistress; a fourth to a statesman, and so on; yet he carried so many and so different connections in his head, all at the same time.

35. ADAM SMITH AND G. P. R. JAMES.

Adam Smith, in composing his great works, employed an amanuensis. He dictated to the laborer at the pen, while he paced back and forth across the study.

G. P. R. James, the novelist, composes his fictions, it is said, in the same manner; only he has two or three amanuenses employed at a time on as many different works! It is thus that Mr. James accomplishes so much. He is one of the most voluminous authors of the present age.

§ 5. AMUSEMENTS OF THE LEARNED.

36. THE JESUITS, SPINOSA, SOCRATES, AND TYCHO BRAHE, ETC.

Among the Jesuits it was a standing rule of the order, that after an application to study for two hours the mind of the student should be unbent by some relaxation, however trifling.

After protracted studies, Spinoza would mix with the family party where he lodged, and join in the most trivial conversation, or unbend his mind by setting spiders to fight each other. He observed their combats with so much interest that he was often seized with the most immoderate fits of laughter. This, however, was neither a humane or tasteful amusement.

Socrates did not blush to play with children.

Tycho Brahe diverted himself with polishing glasses for all kinds of spectacles.

D'Andilly, the translator of Josephus, after seven or eight hours of study every day, amused himself in cultivating trees.

Barclay, the author of the Argenis, in his leisure hours was a florist.

Balzac amused himself with a collection of crayon portraits, the Abbe De Maroles with his prints, and Politian in singing airs to his lute.

37. PETAVIUS AND POLLIO.

When Petavius was employed in his Dogmata Theologica, a work of extensive erudition, the great recreation of the learned father was, at the end of every second hour, to twirl his chair for five minutes.

Assinius Pollio would not suffer any business to occupy him beyond a certain hour. After that time he would not allow any letters to be opened after his hours of relaxation, lest they might be interrupted by unforeseen labors.

38. SAMUEL CLARKE AND DR. SWIFT.

Dr. Samuel Clarke used to amuse himself by jumping over the tables and chairs.

Dr. Swift exercised himself by running up and down the steps of the deanery; and even in his later days, when his constitution was almost broken down, he was, as Dr. Johnson observes, on his legs about ten hours in the day.

39. SHELLEY'S PAPER BOATS.

Shelley took great pleasure in making paper boats, and floating them on the water. The New Monthly has the following curious anecdote on this subject: So long as his paper lasted, he remained rivetted to the spot, fascinated by this peculiar amusement. All waste paper was rapidly consumed, then the covers of letters, next letters of little value; the most precious contributions of the most esteemed correspondents, although eyed wistfully many times, and often returned to his pocket, were sure to be sent at last in pursuit of the former squadrons. Of the portable volumes which were the companions of his rambles, and he seldom went out without a book, the fly leaves were commonly wanting; he had applied them as our ancestor Noah applied gopher wood. But learning was so sacred in his eyes that he never trespassed further upon the integrity of the copy; the work itself was always respected. It has been said that he once found himself on the north bank of the Serpentine River, without the materials for indulging those inclinations which the sight of water invariably inspired, for he had exhausted his supplies on the round pond in Kensington Gardens. Not a single scrap of paper could be found, save only a bank note for fifty pounds. He hesitated long, but yielded at last. He twisted it into a boat with the extreme refinement of his skill, and committed it with the utmost dexterity to fortune, watching its progress, if possible, with a still more intense anxiety than usual. Fortune often favors those who fully and frankly trust her; the north-east wind gently wafted the costly skiff to the south bank, where during the latter part of the voyage the venturesome owner had waited its arrival with patient solicitude.

§ 6. ANACHRONISMS.

40. SHAKSPEARE'S ANACHRONISMS.

Without noticing the blunders of some of his contemporaries, it may suffice to refer to a few of the glaring errors of the "world's great poet," which may surprise some. In the Comedy of Errors, speaking of the ancient city of Ephesus, we find allusion made to ducats, marks, and guilders, as well as to an abbess of a nunnery, and also to a striking clock.

In King John and Macbeth, we find reference made to cannon. We do not learn that any record has been made of this strange anachronism.

In Coriolanus, reference is made to Alexander, Cato, and Galen, all of whom lived long subsequent to his day.

Cassius, in Julius Caesar, speaks of a clock striking. He must have been endowed with a seer's prophetic vision.

Similar mistakes occur in Cymbeline and some other plays of Shakspeare; but in King Lear they are as thick as "leaves in Vallambrosa." E. g., among others, Kent talks like a good Protestant of eating no fish, and Gloucester of not being compelled to the use of spectacles! Surely it must have been Master Shakspeare that was short-sighted.

41. DRAMATIC ERRORS.

In Beaumont and Fletcher's Humorous Lieutenant, a play in which Antigonus and Demetrius Poliorcetes are the heroes, and where, of consequence, the scene must be laid many years before the Christian era, Demetrius is introduced discharging a pistol: an anachronism so very ridiculous and inconsistent with the genius and learning of the two dramatic bards, that one commentator, fired with the true spirit of attachment to his authors, has ventured to assert, that the blunder was introduced on purpose to render the comedy still more burlesque! "Absurd um per absurdum." There seems to be a palpable obscurity about Demetrius Poliorcetes; his chronology has misled a philosopher, two poets, and one critic.

42. DURER'S ANACHRONISM.

Grotesque anachronisms sometimes appear in the efforts of painters. In one of Albert Durer's paintings of St. Peter denying the Savior, a Roman legionary is represented as smoking a pipe of tobacco! In a Dutch picture of Abraham offering up Isaac, the patriarch is shown in the act of holding a blunderbuss to his son's head.

43. TINTORET AND BRENGHELI.

Tintoret, in a picture which represents the Israelites gathering manna in the desert, has armed the Hebrews with guns!

Brengeli, a Dutch painter, in a picture of the Eastern Magi, according to the grotesque fashion of his country, drew the Indian king in a large white surplice, with boots and spurs, and bearing in his hand, as a present to the Holy Child, the model of a Dutch seventy-four!

44. SEVERAL ANACHRONISMS.

A gentleman of this city, (says the Drawing-room Journal of Philadelphia,) distinguished for his brilliant wit, as well as fine legal attainments, told us that he once met with an old painting, by a French artist, of the Lord's Supper, and that both ends of the table were decorated with tumblers, holding cigar lighters. Such anachronisms are very common.

There is, we believe, a picture in this city, at present, of the Birth of Christ, where the virgin Mary is represented as sleeping on a French bedstead of the most fashionable mode, while Christ is lying in a modern washing-tub.

In the Garden of Eden, Adam and Eve, of course, are represented as occupying a position in the foreground, while, in the background, conspicuous from his hunting costume, stands a German student, deliberately shooting ducks!

45. INGENIOUS SEPULCHRAL ANAGRAM.

It is known to many that in the vicinity of the city of Rome are many miles of subterraneous passages, extending in various directions to an almost incredible distance. These underground retreats were used as the abodes of the early Christians, under the Roman emperors, and frequently afforded a secure asylum from the fury of pagan persecutors. There hundreds of them lived and died, and there they were buried.

In an interesting address at the dedication of Oak Hill Cemetery, at Nyack, the Rev. Dr. Adams gave a description of a recent visit to these subterraneous passages, several miles of which he had explored. Among other things, he stated that sepulchral monuments were frequently met with here, distinguished by the figure of a fish carved in stone. Being at a loss to understand the meaning of this figure, so oft recurring, he inquired of a friend skilled in Christian antiquities, who gave the following explanation:—

The figure of the fish was intended to point out the burial-place of a Christian, without revealing the fact to the pagan persecutors. The Greek word for fish is ἰχθῦς, which the Christians understood to mean Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Savior,—the letters forming the initials of the five following Greek words:—

Ἰησοῦς—Jesus
Χριστός—Christ,
Θεοῦ—of God
υἱοῦ—the Son,
σωτήρ—the Savior.

46. QUEEN ELIZABETH.

An old work contains an anecdote of Queen Elizabeth, which we do not recollect ever before to have read. A Jesuit, named Gordon, attempted an anagram on her name, as follows: Elizabeth.....Jezabel The queen immediately ordered that, as he had omitted, among others, the letter T, he should be presented a gallows in the form of one; and he was accordingly executed on such a gallows the next day.

47. ELEANOR DAVIES.

Perhaps the happiest of anagrams was that produced on a singular person and occasion. Lady Eleanor Davies, the wife of the celebrated Sir John Davies, the poet, was a very extraordinary character. She was the Cassandra of her age; and several of her predictions warranted her to conceive she was a prophetess. As her prophecies, in the troubled times of Charles I., were usually against the government, she was at length brought by them into the Court of High Commission.

The prophetess was not a little mad, and fancied the spirit of Daniel was in her, from an anagram she had formed of her name:—

Eleanor Davies.
Reveal, O Daniel!

The anagram had too much by an L, and too little by an S; yet Daniel and reveal was in it, and that was sufficient to satisfy her inspirations. The court attempted to dispossess the spirit from the lady, while the bishops were in vain reasoning the point with her out of the Scriptures, to no purpose, she poisoning text against text. One of the deans of the arches, says Heylin, shot her through and through with an arrow borrowed from her own quiver: he took a pen, and at last hit upon this excellent anagram:—

Dame Eleanor Davies.
Never so mad a ladie!

The happy fancy put the solemn court into laughter, and Cassandra into the utmost dejection of spirit. Foiled by her own weapons, her spirit suddenly forsook her; and either she never afterwards ventured on prophesying, or the anagram perpetually reminded her hearers of her state—and we hear no more of this prophetess!

48. CRASHAWE AND CAR

Anagrams consist in a dissolution of a person's name into its letters, as its elements; and a new connection into words is formed by their transposition, if possible without addition, subtraction or change of the letters: the words must make a sentence applicable to the person named. The anagram is complimentary or satirical: it may contain some allusion to an event, or describe some personal characteristic. If antiquity can consecrate some follies, they are of very ancient date.

These anagrams were often devoted to the personal attachments of love or friendship. A friend delighted to twine his name with the name of his friend.

Crashawe, the poet, had a literary intimate of the name of Car, who was his posthumous editor; and, in prefixing some elegiac lines, discovered that his late friend Crashawe was Car; for so the anagram of Crashawe runs: He was Car. On this quaint discovery, he has indulged all the tenderness of his recollections:—

"Was Car then Crashawe, or was Crashawe Car?
Since both within one name combined are.
Yes, Car's Crashawe, he Car; 'tis love alone
Which melts two hearts, of both composing one,
So Crashawe's still the same," &c.

49. WILLIAM OLDYS.

The following anagram on the well-known bibliographer, William Oldys, may claim a place among the first productions of this class. It was written by Oldys himself, and found by his executors in one of his manuscripts:—

"W. O.

In word and WILL I AM a friend to you,
And one friend OLD IS worth a hundred new."

50. BURNEY'S ANAGRAM ON NELSON. "PENDU A RIOM."

None of the anagrams of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries exceed in felicity Dr. Burney's on Lord Nelson: "Horatio Nelson, Honor est a Nilo."

Of all the extravagances occasioned by the anagrammatic fever, when at its height, none probably equals what is recorded of an eccentric Frenchman in the seventeenth century, André Pujom. He read, in his own name, the anagram "Pendu à Riom," (the seat of criminal justice in the province of Auvergne,) felt impelled to fulfil his destiny, committed a capital offence in Auvergne, and was actually hung in the place to which the omen pointed.

51. ON NAPOLEON.

The following anagram on the original name of Napoleon I., the most renowned conqueror of the age in which he lived, may claim a place among the first productions of this class, and fully shows, in the transposition, the character of that extraordinary man, and points out that unfortunate occurrence of his life which ultimately proved his ruin. Thus: "Napoleon Bonaparte" contains—"Nò, appear not on Elba."

52. THE THREE INITIALS.

An apt use of initials, in the expression of an idea, appears in the following couplet, written on the alleged intended marriage of the old Duke of Wellington with Angelina Burdett Coutts, the rich heiress:—

The duke must in his second childhood be,
Since in his dotting age he turns to A B C.

§ 8. ANTIQUARIANS.

53. LÆTUS AND BOSIUS.

It is finely said by Livy, that "in contemplating antiquity, the mind itself becomes antique." Amidst the monuments of great and departed nations, our imagination is touched by the grandeur of local impressions, and the vivid associations of the manners, the arts, and the individuals of a great people. Men of genius have roved amidst the awful ruins till the ideal presence has fondly built up the city anew, and have become Romans in the Rome of two thousand years past.

Pomponius Lætus, who devoted his life to this study, was constantly seen wandering amidst the vestiges of this "throne of the world;" there, in many a reverie, as his eye rested on the mutilated arch, and the broken column, he stopped to muse, and dropped tears in the ideal presence of Rome and of the Romans.

Another enthusiast of this class was Bosius, who sought beneath Rome for another Rome, in those catacombs built by the early Christians for their asylum and their sepulchres. His work of Roma Sotteranea is the production of a subterranean life, passed in fervent and perilous labors.

Taking with him a hermit's meal for the week, this new Pliny often descended into the bowels of the earth, by lamp light, clearing away the sand and ruins, till some tomb broke forth, or some inscription became legible: accompanied by some friend whom his enthusiasm had inspired with his own sympathy, here he dictated, his notes, tracing the mouldering sculpture, and catching the fading picture. Thrown back into the primitive ages of Christianity, amidst the local impressions, the historian of the Christian catacombs collected the memorials of an age and of a race which were hidden beneath the earth.

54. CATHERINOT'S VOLUMES.

One Catherinot all his life was printing a countless number of feuilles volantes in history and on antiquities; each consisting of about three or four leaves in quarto. Lenglet du Fresnoy calls him grand auteur des petits livres. This gentleman liked to live among antiquaries and historians; but with a crooked headpiece, stuck with whims, and hard with knotty combinations, all overloaded with prodigious erudition, he could not ease it at a less rate than by an occasional dissertation of three or four quarto pages. He appears to have published about two hundred pieces of this sort, much sought after by the curious for their rarity. Brunet complains he could never discover a complete collection. But Catherinot may escape "the pains and penalties" of our voluminous writers, for De Bure thinks he generously printed them to distribute among his friends. Such endless writers, provided they print themselves into an almshouse, may be allowed to print themselves out; and we would accept the apology which Monsieur Catherinot has framed for himself, preserved in Beyeri Memoria Librorum Rariorum. "I must be allowed my freedom in my studies, for I substitute my writings for a game at the tennis court, or a club at the tavern. I never counted among my honors these opuscula of mine, but merely as harmless amusements. It is my partridge, as with St. John the Evangelist; my cat, as with Pope St. Gregory; my little dog, as with St. Dominic; my lamb, as with St. Francis; my great black mastiff, as with Cornelius Agrippa; and my tame hare, as with Justus Lipsius." Catherinot could never get a printer, and was rather compelled to study economy in his two hundred quartos of four or eight pages; his paper was of inferior quality; and when he could not get his dissertations into his prescribed number of pages, he used to promise the end at another time, which did not always happen. But his greatest anxiety was to publish and spread his works. In despair, he adopted an odd expedient. Whenever Monsieur Catherinot came to Paris, he used to haunt the quais where books are sold, and while he appeared to be looking over them, he adroitly slid one of his own dissertations among these old books. He began this mode of publication early, and continued it to his last days. He died with a perfect conviction that he had secured his immortality; and in this manner had disposed of more than one edition of his unsalable works. Nicron has given the titles of one hundred and eighteen of his things, which he had looked over.

55. POPE INNOCENT X.

A surprise and detection of the theft of a book is revealed in a piece of secret history by Amelot de la Houssaie, which terminated in very important political consequences. He assures us that the personal dislike which Pope Innocent X. bore to the French had originated in his youth, when cardinal, from having been detected, in the library of an eminent French collector, of having purloined a most rare volume. The delirium of a collector's rage overcame even French politesse; the Frenchman not only openly accused his illustrious culprit, but was resolved that he should not quit the library without replacing the precious volume. From accusation and denial, both resolved to try their strength; but in this literary wrestling-match the book dropped out of the cardinal's robes, and from that day he hated the French, at least their more curious collectors!

56. JOHN STOWE.

The famous antiquarian John Stowe was born in London, about the year 1525. His father, who was a tailor, brought him up to the same business, and pressed him to follow it. But his labors were in vain. He early discovered a strong fondness for antiquities, and it was impossible to turn him.

About the year 1560, he made known his plan of publishing an English history, the materials for which he had begun to collect before he left his trade. His researches were now renewed with great eagerness. No honest means were neglected of which he could avail himself in the completion of his work. It did not appear, however, till the year 1565. The title was, A Summarie of the Englyshe Chronicles. Dudley, Earl of Leicester, assisted and encouraged him in its publication, and it was continued by Edmund Howes, who printed several editions.

In 1568, an information was laid against him as a suspicious person, who possessed many dangerous books. The Bishop of London ordered an investigation of his study, in which, as might have been expected of an antiquarian, they found several Popish books. The result is not known.

But he was reserved for trials of another kind, and less easy to be endured. In 1570, an unnatural brother, having defrauded him of his property, sought to take away his life by preferring against him no less than one hundred and forty articles. He was tried before the ecclesiastical commission. Of the nature of these charges history does not inform us, but he was honorably acquitted.

While preparing his Summarie, he was also collecting materials for a Survey of London. This he regarded, and justly, as his great work. He was engaged in collecting materials for it about forty years. It appeared in 1598, when he was more than seventy years of age. It went through eight editions between 1598 and 1754; but Stowe did not live to see but two of them, nor did they ever afford him any considerable remuneration.

Notwithstanding his antiquarian turn, he found time for other employments, though these did not greatly improve his financial condition. He contributed to the improvement of the second edition of Holinshed, in 1587, and gave corrections, which were valuable, to two editions of Chaucer.

His poverty and misfortunes will be mentioned under another head—that of History. They wore him out in his eightieth year.

57. DRS. BARTON AND NASH.

Dr. Barton was in company with Dr. Nash, just as he was going to publish his work on the antiquities of Worcestershire. "I fear," said Dr. Barton, "there will be a great many inaccuracies in your books, when they come out." "How are errors to be avoided?" said Dr. Nash. "Very easily," said Dr. Barton. "Are you not a justice of peace?" "I am," said Dr. Nash. "Why, then," replied the old warden, "you have nothing to do but to send your books to the house of correction."

58. TOWNLEY'S ENTHUSIASM.

The following anecdote is related in Nichols's Illustrations of Literature, upon the authority of Mr. Dallaway. Upon the receipt of a letter by Townley, from Mr. Jenkins, the then English banker at Rome, promising him the first choice of some discovered statues, Mr. Townley "instantly set off for Italy, without companion or baggage, and, taking the common post conveyance, arrived incognito at Rome on the precise day when a very rich cava was to be explored. He stood near, as an uninterested spectator, till he perceived the discovery of an exquisite statue, little injured, and which decided his choice. Observing that his agent was urgent in concealing it, he withdrew to wait the event. Upon his calling at Mr. Jenkins's house in the Corso, who was not a little surprised by his sudden appearance, the statue in question was studiously concealed, while the other pieces were shared between them with apparent liberality. Mr. Townley remonstrated, and was dismissed with an assurance that, after due restoration, it should follow him to England. In about a year after, Mr. Townley had the mortification to learn that the identical young Hercules had been sold to Lord Lansdowne at an extreme, yet scarcely an equivalent price." This transaction must have occurred some time before 1790. It was in that year that the Hercules was sold by Mr. Jenkins to Lord Lansdowne. A different story is, however, told of this Hercules in the account of it in the first Dilettanti volume. Mr. Townley is there stated to have had the choice of the two statues at the time they were discovered; to have fixed from description, but afterwards to have repented of his choice.

59. STRAWBERRY HILL.

Strawberry Hill, near Twickenham; the Residence of Horace Walpole.

One of Walpole's most favorite pursuits was the building and decoration of his Gothic villa of Strawberry Hill. It is situated at the end of the village of Twickenham, towards Teddington, on a slope, which gives it a fine view of a reach of the Thames, and the opposite wooded hill of Richmond Park. He bought in, in 1747, of Mrs. Chenevix, the proprietress of a celebrated toy-shop. He thus describes it, in a letter of that year to Mr. Conway: "You perceive, by my date, that I have got into a new camp, and have left my tub at Windsor. It is a little plaything house that I got out of Mrs. Chenevix's shop, and is the prettiest bawble you ever saw. It is set in enamelled meadows, with filigree hedges:—

And little fishes wave their wings of gold.'

"Two delightful roads, that you would call dusty, supply me continually with coaches and chaises; barges, as solemn as barons of the Exchequer, move under my window; Richmond Hill and Ham Walks bound my prospects; but, thank God! the Thames is between me and the Duchess of Queensbury. Dowagers, as plenty as flounders, inhabit all around; and Pope's ghost is just now skimming under my window by most poetical moonlight."

After his villa had been built, he commenced to collect antiquities and curiosities of all kinds, together with many valuable paintings and engravings, which he seems to have spared no expense in buying and bringing together. Here, also, he had set up a small printing press, with which he printed many of his own works, and those of his friends. Gray's poems were printed here, with engravings by Mr. Richard Bentley, a friend of both authors. For defraying these expenses, he drew upon his income, which amounted to about two thousand pounds a year, chiefly arising from the various sinecures conferred upon him by his father, Sir Robert Walpole.

This fine collection, upon which he had employed so much pains, and expended such large sums of money, is now scattered to the winds—dispersed at a public sale. Surely, it is enough "To rouse the dead man into rage,

And warm with red resentment the wan cheek."

60. IRISH ANTIQUARIANS.

The Irish antiquaries mention public libraries that were before the flood; and Paul Christian Ilsker, with profounder erudition, has given an exact catalogue of Adam's. Messieurs O'Flaherty, O'Connor, and O'Halloran have most gravely recorded as authentic narrations the wildest legendary traditions; and more recently, to make confusion doubly confounded, others have built up what they call theoretical histories on these nursery tales, by which species of black art they contrive to prove that an Irishman is an Indian, and a Peruvian may be a Welshman, from certain emigrations which took place many centuries before Christ, and some about two centuries after the flood! Keating, in his History of Ireland, starts a favorite hero in the giant Partholanus, who was descended from Japhet, and landed on the coast of Munster, 14th May, in the year of the world 1778. This giant succeeded in his enterprise; but a domestic misfortune attended him among his Irish friends. His wife exposed him to their laughter by her loose behavior, and provoked him to such a degree that he killed two favorite greyhounds; and this the learned historian assures us was the first instance of female infidelity ever known in Ireland!

61. D'AUSSY.

When Le Grand D'Aussy, whose Fabliaux are so well known, adopted, in the warmth of antiquarian imagination, the plan suggested by Marquis de Paulmy, first sketched in the Mélanges tires d'une grande Bibliothèque, of a picture of the domestic life of the French people from their earliest periods, the subject broke upon him like a vision. It had novelty, amusement, and curiosity: "Le sujet m'en parut neuf, riche, et piquant." He revelled amid the scenes of their architecture, the interior decorations of their houses, their changeable dress, their games and recreations; in a word, on all the parts most adapted to suit the fancy. But when he came to compose the more detailed work, the fairy scene faded in the length, the repetition, and the never-ending labor and weariness; and the three volumes which we now possess, instead of sports, dresses, and architecture, exhibit only a very curious, but not always a very amusing, account of the food of the French nation.

No one has more fully poured out his vexation of spirit. He may excite a smile in those who never experienced this toil of books and manuscripts, but he claims the sympathy of those who would discharge their public duties so faithfully to the public. I shall preserve a striking picture of these thousand task-works, colored by the literary pangs of the voluminous author who is doomed never to finish his curious work:—

"Endowed with a courage at all proofs, with health which till then was unaltered, and which excess of labor has greatly changed, I devoted myself to write the lives of the learned of the sixteenth century. Renouncing all kinds of pleasure, working ten to twelve hours a day, extracting, ceaselessly copying; after this sad life, I now wished to draw breath, turn over what I had amassed, and arrange it. I found myself possessed of many thousands of bulletins, of which the longest did not exceed many lines. At the sight of this frightful chaos, from which I was to form a regular history, I must confess I shuddered; I felt myself for some time in a stupor and depression of spirits; and now actually that I have finished the work, I cannot endure the recollection of that moment of alarm without a feeling of involuntary terror. What a business is this, good God, of a compiler! In truth it is too much condemned; it merits some regard. At length I regained courage; I returned to my researches. I have completed my plan, though every day I was forced to add, to correct, to change my facts as well as my ideas. Six times has my hand recopied my work; and however fatiguing this may be, it certainly is not that portion of my task that has cost me most."

62. "TOM HILL."

A few days before the close of 1840, London lost one of its choicest spirits, and humanity one of her kindest-hearted sons, in the death of Thomas Hill, Esq.—"Tom Hill," as he was called by all who loved and knew him. His life exemplified one venerable proverb, and disproved another. He was born in May, 1760, and was, consequently, in his 81st year, and "as old as the hills," having led a long life and a merry one. He was originally a dry-salter: but about the year 1810, having sustained a severe loss by a speculation in indigo, he retired upon the remains of his property to chambers in the Adelphi, where he died, his physician remarking to him, "I can do no more for you—I have done all I can. I cannot cure age."

Hill, when in business at the unlettered Queen-hite, found leisure to accumulate a fine collection of books, chiefly old poetry, which afterwards, when misfortune overtook him, was valued at £6000. Hill was likewise a Mecenas: he patronized two friendless poets, Bloomfield and Kirke White. The Farmer's Boy of the former was read and admired by him in manuscript, and was recommended to a publisher. Hill also established the Monthly Mirror, to which Kirke White was a contributor. Hill was the Hull of Hook's Gilbert Gurney. He happened to know every thing that was going on in all circles, and was at all "private views" of exhibitions. So especially was he favored, that a wag recorded, when asked whether he had seen the new comet, he replied, "Pooh! pooh! I was present at the private view."

Hill left behind him an assemblage of literary rarities, which it occupied a clear week to sell by auction. Among them was Garrick's cup, formed from the mulberry-tree planted by Shakespeare in his garden at New Place, Stratford-upon-Avon; this produced forty guineas. A small vase and pedestal, carved from the same mulberry-tree, and presented to Garrick, was sold, with a colored drawing of it, for ten guineas. And a block of wood, cut from the celebrated willow planted by Pope, at his villa at Twickenham, brought one guinea.

63. THE TWO VIRTUOSOS.

Not many years ago there lived in the little town of R—, a suburb of one of our Atlantic cities, an individual known as Dr. Q—, who was noted for three remarkable "manifestations of the passion of love," as Mr. Tasistro would classify them. These were, the love of money, the love of science, and the love of Bologna sausages. The first he inherited with his estate from his father; the second he caught by inoculation from a near neighbor, Professor Z., formerly of some eastern college; and the third probably grew out of the first, as it is well known that Bologna, American Bologna sausages, when eaten sufficiently sparingly, are the most economical food that can be procured.

Dr. Q— had attached to his mansion at R— a large room, which he called his "museum," filled with pictures and all manner of curiosities and articles of virtu. The walls were ornamented with numerous paintings of every size and shape; some of them landscapes of a peculiarly dirty and smoky appearance, and which, in consequence, had been pronounced, by friendly connoisseurs, to be the genuine works of Teniers, Claude, and Ruysdael; others were portraits of ancient ladies and gentlemen, with glaring red and white cheeks, and stony blue eyes that at the first glance chilled through the gazer like an east wind. These were all veritable "Titians," "Vandykes," and "Raphaels," supposed so, probably, from the fact that they looked as little like the works of those immortal artists as it was possible for a bad painter, with bad materials, to make them.

In addition to these invaluable paintings, our doctor's museum was filled with stuffed birds, striped snakes, ring-tailed monkeys, and every kind of flying and creeping thing, as well as all manner of unknown and unknowable curiosities from the four quarters of the world, including, of course, that article indispensable to all museums, "the identical club with which the renowned Captain Cook was killed at Owyhee." All the doctor's friends, and every little boy and girl in the village, were laid under contribution to furnish additions to this rare collection, for which they generally received a "thank'ee," and sometimes, if the donation happened to be unusually dirty and unclassifiable, the "thank'ees" extended to two or three.

Now, the doctor had a nephew, the son of a widowed sister-in-law, a lad of some fifteen or sixteen years, who had been unusually active in securing rubbish for his uncle's collection; which, by the way, he must have done from sheer love of science, as he never received any remuneration for his pains, excepting the everlasting "thank'ee," and a free admittance to the museum, which he enjoyed in common with the other acquaintance of his uncle. Ned Wilson, (the nephew,) having, after much importunity, prevailed upon his mother to let him go to sea, had accordingly procured a voyage, and one morning presented himself in the breakfast-room of his uncle, to take leave of his rich relative previous to sailing. The doctor was at first surprised, and then delighted; surprised when his nephew announced his purpose, and delighted when he learned that his destination was the Mediterranean, and that it was his intention, if possible, to visit the ruins of Herculaneum and Pompeii. "Of course, Ned," said he, "you will not forget your old habits when there. What vast fields for the industrious and patient explorer are those two buried cities!—every house a museum in itself, and every street strewed with the curiosities of a former age. You've been a good boy, Ned, at home, and you musn't forget your uncle when at Pompeii. And," suddenly recollecting himself, "your uncle musn't forget you either." And then, turning to his wife, he inquired whether she couldn't think of some little present that would be acceptable to their clever relative.

Now, it happened, on the morning in question, the doctor had had his favorite dish of Bolognas on the table; but they didn't relish very well. He thought they were rather "hurt," as the term is; his wife thought so too; and the cook, who had been called in, pronounced them the "werry worst kind of tastin' things she ever see." They were accordingly rejected, and now stood on the sideboard.

"What can we do for Ned?" the doctor repeated, as he began to pace the room; for there was a struggle going on in his breast between his innate meanness and a desire to do a little something for a lad who had done so much for him, and from whom he expected a great deal more. He kept walking to and fro, occasionally repeating, "Give him—give him——" But he could not make up his mind what, until he accidentally cast his eye on the discarded Bolognas, when he finished the sentence, "Give him a—a—Bologna sausage, Hetty! Nothing can be more delicious on board a ship." And drawing a long breath, his mind seemed relieved of an immense load.

The sausage was accordingly wrapped in an old newspaper and given to Ned, with many almost paternal benedictions, and not a few injunctions to remember his uncle; and the nephew quitted the splendid mansion of his uncle with a swelling breast, and a not very exalted opinion of his liberality.

Three years passed away, and Ned Wilson returned to the village of R—, having, in the meantime, visited nearly every port in the Mediterranean. One morning, a few days after his return, he made his appearance at Dr. Q—'s mansion, having under his arm a small tin box. The first greetings over, his uncle, who had not for a moment lost sight of the little tin box, led his nephew into the museum. "And now, Ned, what have you got in the box, eh? Something rare, I'll warrant."

"It is something rare," said the nephew; "but what, I can't tell. I picked it up in Pompeii; but nobody there knew what it was." And he handed the box to the doctor, who received it as eagerly as if it had been filled with mortgages.

"But stop!" said he, laying the box on the table; "we must call Professor Z. here;" and ringing the bell, he sent a message after his brother virtuoso.

In a few moments the professor made his appearance, and the men of science proceeded to examine the contents of the box, which, after undoing sundry wrappers, they found to consist of one article only. Throwing his spectacles over his forehead, which he always did when about to look sharply at anything, the doctor commenced the examination. He turned the curiosity over and over, and looked at it on every side, and in every position of light, until his eyes ached and began to grow dim; but he could make nothing of it; and then, his spectacles suddenly dropping in their place unnoticed, he handed the article to the professor, protesting that looking at it had made him nearly stone blind.

The professor examined it as closely as the doctor. "The form is familiar to me," said he; "it looks very much like a sausage."

"So it does,—it does!" chimed in the doctor. "Don't go, Ned," turning to his nephew, who had his hand on the latch of the door,— "don't go; we shall soon know what it is."

"It looks like a sausage," repeated the professor, solemnly; "and," putting it to his nose, "it smells like a sausage." And then, having tasted it, he threw it from him as if it had been a rattlesnake, exclaiming, "and, doctor, it is a sausage—a Bologna; and a bad one too."

The truth flashed on the uncle. He stood irresolute a moment, and then, seizing the club that had killed Captain Cook, he turned suddenly round. But his graceless nephew had just closed the street door behind him.

§ 9. ANTIQUITIES AND RELICS, LITERARY.

64. GASTRELL.

Gastrell was the name of the clergyman, who, having purchased Shakspeare's house, in 1756, soon afterwards pulled it down, because he thought the town assessment on it was too high. He had previously cut down the celebrated mulberry-tree, planted by Shakspeare's hand, because it subjected him to answer the frequent importunities of travellers!

Gastrell's name is immortalized by these acts of literary Vandalism. Let those who would escape such an immortality refrain from similar depredations.

65. ANCIENT MAP OF ROME.

The ichnography of Rome, in the fine collection of antiquities of Rome in the Palazzo Farnese,* was found in the temple of Romulus and Remus, which is now dedicated to St. Cosmo and Damiano, who are also two brothers. Though incomplete, it is one of the most useful remains of antiquity. The names of the particular buildings and places are marked upon it, as well as the outlines of the buildings themselves; and it is so large, that the Horrea Lolliana (for instance) are a foot and a half long; which may serve as a scale to measure any other buildings or places in it. It is published in Grævius's Thesaurus.

66. RELICS OF MILTON.

Milton was born at the "Spread Eagle," Bread Street, Cheapside, December 9, 1608, and was buried November, 1674, in St. Giles's Church, Cripplegate, without even a stone, in the first instance, to mark his resting-place; but, in 1793, a bust and tablet were set up to his memory by public subscription.

Milton, before he resided in Jewin Gardens, Aldersgate, is believed to have removed to, and "kept school" in a large house on the west side of Aldersgate Street, wherein met the City of London Literary and Scientific Institution, previously to the rebuilding of their premises in 1839.

Milton's London residences have all, with one exception, disappeared, and cannot be recognized; this is in Petty France, at Westminster, where the poet lived from 1651 to 1659. The lower part of the house is a chandler's shop; the parlor, up stairs, looks into St. James's Park. Here part of Paradise Lost was written. The house belonged to Jeremy Bentham, who caused to be placed on its front a tablet, inscribed "SACRED TO MILTON, PRINCE OF POETS."

* It now belongs to the noble collection in the Capitol.

In the same glass case with Shakspeare's autograph, in the British Museum, is a printed copy of the Elegies on Mr. Edward King, the subject of Lycidas, with some corrections of the text in Milton's handwriting. Framed and glazed, in the library of Mr. Rogers, the poet, hangs the written agreement between Milton and his publisher, Simmons, for the copyright of his Paradise Lost.

67. WILLS OF SHAKSPEARE, MILTON, AND NAPOLEON.

The last wills and testaments of these three great men are tied up in one sheet of foolscap, and may be seen at Doctors' Commons, London. In the will of the bard of Avon is an interlineation in his own handwriting: "I give unto my wife my brown best bed, with the furniture." It is proved by William Byrd, 22d of July, 1616. The will of the minstrel of Paradise is a nuncupative one, taken by his daughter, the great poet being blind. The will of Napoleon is signed in a bold style of writing; the codicil, on the contrary, written shortly before his death, exhibits the then weak state of his body.

68. ADDISON'S WALK, CAMOENS'S CAVE, PETRARCH'S HOUSE, ETC.

The enthusiasts of genius still wander on the hills of Pausilippe, and muse on Virgil to retrace his landscapes, or, as Sir William Jones ascended Forest Hill, with the Allegro in his hand, and step by step seemed, in his fancy, to have trodden in the footpath of Milton. There is a grove at Magdalen College which retains the name of Addison's Walk, where still the student will linger; and there is a cave at Macao, which is still visited by the Portuguese from a national feeling, where Camoens is said to have composed his Lusiad.

When Petrarch was passing by his native town, he was received with the honors of his fame; but when the heads of the town, unawares to Petrarch, conducted him to the house where the poet was born, and informed him that the proprietor had often wished to make alterations, but that the townspeople had risen to insist that the house which was consecrated by the birth of Petrarch should be preserved unchanged, this was a triumph more affecting to Petrarch than his coronation at Rome.

In the village of Certaldo is still shown the house of Boccaccio; and on a turret are seen the arms of the Medici, which they had sculptured there, with an inscription alluding to a small house and a name which filled the world.

"Foreigners," said Anthony Wood of Milton, "have, out of pure devotion, gone to Bread Street to see the house and chamber where he was born;" and at Paris, the house which Voltaire inhabited, and at Ferney, his study, are both preserved inviolate. Thus is the very apartment of a man of genius, the chair he studied in, the table he wrote on, contemplated with curiosity; the spot is full of local impressions.

Even the rage of the military spirit seems to respect the abode of genius; and Cæsar and Sylla, who never spared their own Roman blood, alike felt their spirit rebuked, and saved the literary city of Athens. The house of the man of genius has been spared amidst contending empires, from the days of Pindar to those of Buffon; and the letter of Prince Schwartzberg to the countess, for the preservation of the philosopher's chateau, is a memorial of this elevated feeling.

69. MALONE AND SHAKSPEARE'S BUST.

Malone, the commentator of Shakspeare, ruined his bust in Stratford Church, in 1793. Listen to Charles Lamb: "The wretched Malone could not do worse when he bribed the sexton of Stratford Church to let him whitewash the painted effigy of old Shakspeare, which stood there, in rude but lively fashion depicted, to the very color of the cheek, the eye, the eyebrow, the hair, the very dress he used to wear; the only authentic testimony we had, however imperfect, of these curious parts and parcels of him. They covered him over with a coat of white paint! If I had been a justice of the peace for Warwickshire, I would have clapped both commentator and sexton fast in the stocks, for a pair of meddling, sacrilegious varlets.

"I think I see them at their work, those sapient trouble-tombs."

In reference to the atrocious act, the following stanzas were written in the album at Stratford Church by one of the visitors to the tomb:—

"Stranger, to whom this monument is shown,
Invoke the poet's curses on Malone,
Whose meddling zeal his barbarous taste displays,
And daubs his tombstone, as he marred his plays."

70. SINGULAR DISCOVERY.

A very singular discovery of an inscription was made some time since at Coxwold, near Thirsk, in Yorkshire. The country was formerly, as its name implies, a forest; but as cultivation has advanced, the trees have by degrees been cleared away. An ash was thus felled and split for firewood. Upon being riven asunder, the outer part of the tree was cleft in two like a case, leaving the inner portion of the trunk entire, and the following rude inscription was discovered, distinctly legible, both upon the inner part of the trunk, and, with the letters inverted, upon the outer casing. The inscription can, without difficulty, be thus read:—

LOVRS
THAT DID
WALK HEA
RE

"This tree long time witness bear
Of two lovers that did walk here."

There is no date to the inscription, but the period at which it was made may be ascertained, with much probability, from the following considerations: The tree is deposited in the Museum of the Hospital at Kirk Leatham, between Stockton-upon-Tees and Redcar. The porter of the hospital, now living, can vouch for its having been there upwards of seventy years; and the tradition respecting the tree is, that it was given by Lord Falkenburg, from his manor at Coxwold, to Mr. Cholmley Turner, who died on the 9th of May, 1757. It would, therefore, appear that the tree has been cut down nearly a hundred years. Also, by the number of rings in the wood, each indicating a year's growth, the tree appears to have been about fifty-five years old when the inscription was made, and to have subsequently grown for nearly two hundred years. The closeness of the rings under the circumference prevents this estimation of the date from being regarded as more than an approximation; but all the circumstances render it highly probable that the inscription was made about three centuries ago.

71. WILL'S COFFEE-HOUSE, TOM'S, AND BUTTON'S.

Three of the most celebrated resorts of the literati of the last century were the following: Will's Coffee-house, No. 23, on the north side of Great Russell Street, Covent Garden, at the end of Bow Street. This was the favorite resort of Dryden, who had here his own chair, in winter, by the fire-side, in summer in the balcony; the company met on the first floor, and there smoked; and the young beaux and wits were sometimes honored with a pinch out of Dryden's snuff-box. Will's was the resort of men of genius till 1710. It was subsequently occupied by a perfumer.

Tom's, No. 17 Great Russell Street, had nearly seven hundred subscribers, at a guinea a head, from 1764 to 1768, and had its card, conversation, and coffee-rooms, where assembled Dr. Johnson, Garrick, Murphy, Goldsmith, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Foote, and other men of talent. The tables and books of the club are preserved in the house, the first floor of which is occupied by Mr. Webster, the medallist.

Button's, "over against" Tom's, was the receiving-house for contributions to the Guardian, in a lion-head box, the aperture for which remains (1849) in the wall to mark the place. Button had been servant to Lady Warwick, whom Addison married, and the house was frequented by Pope, Steele, Swift, Arbuthnot, and Addison. The lion's head for a letter-box, "the best head in England," was set up in imitation of the celebrated lion at Venice. It was removed from Button's to the Shakspeare's Head, under the arcade in Covent Garden, and in 1751, was placed in the Bedford, next door. This lion's head is now treasured as a relic by the Bedford family.

72. POPE'S OPINION UPON ARCHÆOLOGY.

"There is no one study," said Pope to Spence, "that is not capable of delighting us after a little application to it. How true of even so dry a study as antiquities!" "Yes, I have experienced that myself. I once got deep into Grævius, and was taken greatly with it, so far as to write a treatise in Latin, collected from the writers in Grævius, on the old buildings in Rome. It is now in Lord Oxford's hands, and has been so these fifteen years."

73. VARIOUS RELICS.

In the grounds of Abbingdon Abbey, Northamptonshire, stands Garrick's mulberry-tree, with this inscription upon copper attached to one of its limbs: "This tree was planted by David Garrick, Esq., at the request of Ann Thursty, as a growing testimony of their friendship, 1778."

Henry Kirke White's favorite tree, whereon he had cut "H. K. W., 1805," stood on the sands at Whitton, in Northumberland, till it was cut down by the woodman's axe; but in veneration for the poet's memory, the portion bearing his initials was carefully preserved in an elegant gilt frame.

An English traveller, desirous of possessing a memorial of Madame De Sévigné, purchased, for the sum of eighteen thousand francs, the staircase of her chateau at Provence.

Sir Isaac Newton's solar dial, which was cut in stone, and attached to the manor-house at Woolstrop, Lincolnshire, is now placed in the Royal Society's collection.

Some years ago, a curious arm-chair, which had belonged to Gay, the poet, was sold at public auction at Barnstable, his native place. It contained a drawer underneath the seat, at the extremity of which was a smaller drawer, connected with a rod in front, by which it was drawn out.

Benjamin Franklin's "fine crab-tree walking stick, with a gold head curiously wrought in the form of a cap of liberty," is bequeathed in a codicil to his will, "to the friend of mankind, General Washington;" adding, that "if it were a sceptre, he has merited it, and would become it."

Thrope's Catalogue of Autographs (1843) includes a letter from a Miss Smith, of Arundale, forwarding to the Earl of Buchan "a chip, taken from the coffin of the poet Burns, when his body was removed from his first grave to the mausoleum erected to his memory in St. Michael's Churchyard, Dumfries."

The tower of Monthbard, in Burgundy, was Buffon's study, and, together with the garden in which the great naturalist used to recreate himself, was religiously kept up by the inhabitants.

BIRTH PLACE OF DR. JOHNSON —

74. RELICS OF DR. JOHNSON AT LICHFIELD.

The house in which Dr. Johnson was born, at Lichfield, stands upon the west side of the market-place, and is now (1847) occupied as a draper's shop and residence. In the centre of the market-place is a colossal statue of Johnson, seated upon a square pedestal. It is by Lucas, and was executed at the expense of the Rev. Chancellor Law, in 1838. By the side of a footpath leading from Dam Street to Stow formerly stood a large willow, said to have been planted by Johnson. It was blown down in 1829; but one of its shoots was preserved, and planted upon the same spot. It is now a large tree, and is known as "Johnson's Willow."

Mr. Lomax, who has for many years kept a bookseller's shop,—the "Johnson's Head," in Bird Street, Lichfield,—possesses several articles that formerly belonged to Johnson, which have been handed down by a clear and indisputable ownership. Amongst them is his own Book of Common Prayer, in which are written, in pencil, the four Latin lines printed in Strahan's edition of the doctor's Prayers. There are, also, a sacrament-book, with Johnson's wife's name in it, in his own handwriting; an autograph letter of the doctor's to Miss Porter; two tea-spoons, an ivory tablet, and a breakfast table; a Visser's Atlas, paged by the doctor, and a manuscript index; Davies's Life of Garrick, presented to Johnson by the publisher; a walking cane, and a Dictionary of Heathen Mythology, with the doctor's manuscript corrections. His wife's wedding ring, afterwards made into a mourning ring, and a massive chair, in which he customarily sat, are also in Mr. Lomax's possession.

There are few persons now living who ever saw Dr. Johnson. Among them is Mr. Dyott, of Lichfield. This was seventy-four years ago, or in 1774, when the doctor and Boswell, on their tour into Wales, stopped at Ashbourne, and there visited Mr. Dyott's father, who was then residing at Ashbourne Hall.

75. THE MITRE IN FLEET STREET.

The "Mitre," a tavern in Fleet Street, is remarkable for Johnson having used the house, and very probably done the landlord. The Mitre, according to a recent magazine article, has a corner, known as Johnson's Corner, which is so sacred that no one is allowed to sit in it. This corner is supposed to be the site on which the gas-pipe has since been erected.

The late owner of the Mitre was not aware that the house was famous as the rendezvous of Johnson, until once asked by a customer where Johnson generally sat, when the host replied, that "so many people came there whom he did not know, that he could not say which was Mr. Johnson's usual place of sitting." On the matter being subsequently explained to him, he saw the necessity of reading the subject well up, and he never took a waiter without examining him in the first four chapters of Boswell. The bust of Johnson, by Nollekins, and the portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Thrale, by somebody, over the fireplace in the lower room, added to the second-hand edition of the lexicographer's life on the chimney-piece up stairs, turned the Mitre into a perfect Johnsonian Museum.

76. ANECDOTE OF MRS. BURNS.

It is generally known that Mrs. Burns, after her husband's death, occupied exactly the same house in Dumfries which she inhabited before that event; and it was customary for strangers, who happened to pass through, or visit that town, to pay their respects to her, with or without letters of introduction, precisely as they do to the churchyard, the bridge, the harbor, or any other public object of curiosity about the place.

A gay young Englishman one day visited Mrs. Burns, and after he had seen all she had to show,—the bedroom in which the poet died, his original portrait by Nasmyth, his family Bible, with the names and birthdays of himself, his wife, and children, written on a blank leaf by his own hand, and some other little trifles of the same nature,—he proceeded to entreat that she would have the kindness to present him with some relic of the poet, which he might carry away with him, as a wonder, to show in his own country. "Indeed, sir," said

Mrs. Burns, "I have given away so many relics of Mr. Burns, that, to tell the truth, I have not one left." "O, you surely must have something," said the persevering Saxon; "any thing will do — any little scrap of his handwriting, the least thing you please. All I want is just a relic of the poet; and any thing, you know, will do for a relic." Some further altercation took place — the lady reasserting that she had no relic to give, and he as repeatedly renewing his request. At length, fairly tired out with the man's importunities, Mrs. Burns said to him, with a smile, "'Deed, sir, unless you take myself, then, I dinna see how you are to get what you want; for, really, I'm the only relict o' him that I ken o'." The petitioner at once withdrew his request.

77. BOLINGBROKE AT BATTERSEA.

Bolingbroke's Monument in Battersea Church.

When Sir Richard Phillips took his "Morning's Walk from London to Kew," in 1816, he found that a portion of the family mansion in which Lord Bolingbroke was born had been converted into a mill and distillery, though a small oak parlor had been carefully preserved. In this room Pope is said to have written his Essay on Man; and, in Bolingbroke's time, the mansion was the resort, the hope, and the seat of enjoyment of Swift, Arbuthnot, Thomson, Mallet, and all the contemporary genius of England. The oak room was always called "Pope's Parlor," it being, in all probability, the apartment generally occupied by that great poet in his visits to his friend Bolingbroke.

On inquiring for an ancient inhabitant of Battersea, Sir Richard Phillips was introduced to a Mrs. Gilliard, a pleasant and intelligent woman, who told him she well remembered Lord Bolingbroke; that he used to ride out every day in his chariot, and had a black patch on his cheek, with a large wart over his eyebrow. She was then but a girl, but she was taught to look upon him with veneration as a great man. As, however, he spent little in the place, and gave little away, he was not much regarded by the people of Battersea. Sir Richard mentioned to her the names of several of Bolingbroke's contemporaries; but she recollected none except that of Mallet, who, she said, she had often seen walking about in the village, while he was visiting at Bolingbroke House.

78. GIBBON'S HOUSE AT LAUSANNE.

The house of Gibbon, in which he completed his Decline and Fall, is in the lower part of the town of Lausanne, behind the church of St. Francis, and on the right of the road leading down to Ouchy. Both the house and the garden have been much changed. The wall of the Hotel Gibbon occupies the site of his summer-house, and the berceau walk has been destroyed to make room for the garden of the hotel; but the terrace looking over the lake, and a few acacias, remain.

Gibbon's record of the completion of his great labor is very impressive. "It was on the day, or rather the night, of the 27th of June, 1787, between the hours of eleven and twelve, that I wrote the last line of the last page, in a summer-house in my garden. After laying down my pen, I took several turns in a berceau, or covered walk of acacias, which commands a prospect of the country, the lake, and the mountains. The air was temperate, the sky was serene, the silver orb of the moon was reflected from the waves, and all nature was silent."

At a little inn at Morges, about two miles distant from Lausanne, Lord Byron wrote the Prisoner of Chillon, in the short space of two days, during which he was detained here by bad weather, June, 1816; "thus adding one more deathless association to the already immortalized localities of the lake."

79. MAGNA CHARTA RECOVERED.

The transcript of Magna Charta, now in the British Museum, was discovered by Sir Robert Cotton in the possession of his tailor, who was just about to cut the precious document out into "measures" for his customers. Sir Robert redeemed the valuable curiosity at the price of old parchment, and thus recovered what had long been supposed to be irretrievably lost.

80. OTIS'S ORATION

Old Zechariah G. Whitman, in his history of the "Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company," tells us that he discovered in a volume of pamphlets that a fourth of July oration, delivered in Boston by the Honorable Harrison Gray Otis, bound with others, had been consumed by mice, who injured nothing else. He adds, that he attributed to the mice a very high degree of taste; or that, being connoisseurs, they approved highly of the orator, and of the matter.

81. WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

It was said (1849) that Washington's Farewell Address, in the original manuscript, was in good preservation in Philadelphia.

In 1850, it was sold to James Lenox, Esq., of New York, for $2300.

82. RELICS OF FRANKLIN.

An original portrait of Benjamin Franklin sold at auction, in Boston, in 1849 or '50, for three hundred dollars. Twenty-five pieces of china ware which formerly belonged to Franklin, were next offered. One large cake plate sold for thirteen dollars, and a bowl, with a large piece broken out of the rim, for five dollars and a half. An attempt was made to sell the tea plates, but as only seventy-five cents was bid for a cracked one, the sale was stopped — a much larger price having been offered at private sale for the lot.

83. POPE'S GROVE.

The village of Binfield, Berkshire, situated about seven miles west of Windsor, and within the precincts of the forest, is remarkable from having been the residence of Alexander Pope during his early years. About half a mile from the house, an interesting memorial of the poet still remains, or at least did so a few years since, when the writer last visited the spot. There is here a fine grove of beeches, pleasantly situated on the gentle slope of a hill, which commands an agreeable, though not an extensive, view of the surrounding country. This grove was a favorite resort of Pope's, who is said to have composed many of his earlier pieces sitting under the shade of one of the trees, below which a seat was then placed. The recollection of this circumstance was preserved by Lady Gower, an admirer of the poet, who caused the words, "Here Pope sung," to be cut in large letters in the bark, at some height from the ground; and as this inscription, at the time we mention, was distinctly legible, it was no doubt, at one period, occasionally renewed.

About twelve years ago, when first seen by the writer, the tree was standing in a sound state, and apparently little injured by time, although the bark, to the height of seven or eight feet, was nearly covered by the names of visitors, many of which, with dates, were cut deeply into it.

This interesting relic of the poet (if still in existence) will not, however, endure much longer. When the writer last saw it, a year or two after his first visit, it presented a sad appearance of dilapidation, the upper part of the tree having been entirely broken off by a violent storm which had happened a short time previous, and lying prostrate on the ground, stripped of its branches.

It is somewhat remarkable that none of the neighboring trees were injured by the storm, which thus destroyed the object which, for nearly a century, had consecrated the spot.

84. THE OLD PARSONAGE.

Notwithstanding the ruling passion among us for making all things new, there yet remain in New England many habitations which have been standing for one or two centuries, and each of which has been occupied all that time by successive generations of one family. In the garrets of these old mansions, there may often be found accumulations of old pamphlets, newspapers, and manuscripts, embalmed in dust and cobwebs, and which will often be found to contain much matter of antiquarian and historical interest. The examination of some of these "lumber-mountains" and "slumber-lakes," as Carlyle calls them, has exhumed many treasures of this kind. All persons having access to any such deposits of forgotten valuables are earnestly exhorted to lose no time in exploring them, and bringing their treasures to light. We are moved, says a writer in the Christian Observatory, to make this exhortation by a statement from a friend who narrowly missed a notable opportunity of the kind.

In the place where he resided was an ancient habitation, originally built as a parsonage for the first minister of the town. That minister, in his youth, had been carried captive to Canada by the Indians; in his manhood, he served as chaplain at the taking of Louisburg, and also in the old French war; and he died, in the sixty-sixth year of his ministry, among his own flock. Our informant, through special favor with a descendant of the patriarch, obtained access to the attic of the old habitation. Here he spent one happy day in overhauling and arranging the long-neglected treasures, and roughly calculated that it would take about ten days more to complete the business. He found what appeared to be full files of the Boston News-Letter, which our antiquarians have greatly desired to see. There were journals relating to the Louisburg and other military expeditions, which would have been invaluable; there were files of letters full of interesting items of intelligence and traits of old times; there were bundles of long-lost proclamations and other public documents. In short, there were heaps of those spoils and relics of the past over whose discovery the heart of the antiquary leaps for joy. Before our friend could revisit the precious hoard, he was called out of town. On his return, the first sight which met his eyes was that old parsonage wrapped in flames! It burned to the ground before his sorrowing eyes, and all those priceless documents perished together in melancholy ruin. Now, therefore, take warning, all who have access to like spots; and take heed lest they too be destroyed before their wealth shall have been made available to the lover of our country, studious of its history, and proud of its early fame.

85. A UTILITARIAN.

"Some twenty years ago," said a buxom dame, showing the antiquities of Dartford Church, "we lived in that old building you see through the windows there. It was in ancient times part of the nunnery." "There are some strange old things in such places," remarked we, inquiringly. "You may say that, sir," replied she; "and when we left, I wouldn't leave them behind me. I pulled down the whole Trojan War, Hector and Andromache, sir, tapestry hangings, all worked by the nuns; beautiful, sir." "Yes—well! have you sold them? Have you them yet? Where are they?" "Bless your heart, sir, they are worn out long ago! I cut them up, and made carpets of 'em."

86. LITERARY LOCALITIES.

Leigh Hunt pleasantly says, "I can no more pass through Westminster, without thinking of Milton; or the Borough, without thinking of Chaucer and Shakespeare; or Gray's Inn, without calling Bacon to mind; or Bloomsbury Square, without Steele and Akenside, — than I can prefer brick and mortar to wit and poetry, or not see a beauty upon it beyond architecture in the splendor of the recollection. I once had duties to perform which kept me out late at night, and severely taxed my health and spirits. My path lay through a neighborhood in which Dryden lived, and though nothing could be more commonplace, and I used to be tired to the heart and soul of me, I never hesitated to go a little out of the way, purely that I might pass through Gerard Street, and so give myself the shadow of a pleasant thought."

$ 10. ARCHITECTURE.

87. PYRAMID OF CHEOPS.—MODE OF ASCENT BY A LADY.

"The cloud-capt towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherits, shall dissolve."

This pyramid is five hundred feet in height, and seven hundred and twenty feet on each side of the base; thus covering 518,400 square feet. It is ascended by steps to the summit, which is a platform of nine large stones, each of which would weigh a ton. Some of the stones in other parts of the pyramid are still larger. They are of hewn granite and limestone on the outside, cemented together with fine mortar; in the interior the stones are so nicely smoothed and fitted together as not to need cement of any kind. Machinery of immense power, of which all knowledge is lost, must have been employed to raise these stones to such an amazing height. The pyramid is ascended by steps. The following description of the manner of ascending the pyramid is from Letters from the Old World, by a Lady of New York:—

"The north side of the largest pyramid is so steep as to be dangerous of approach. A short time since, a young Englishman was precipitated from the top to the bottom, and of course dashed to atoms. Near the bottom the layers of stone are about four feet thick, and the mode of my ascent was as follows: First, an Arab got down on his hands and knees, thus forming a sort of extra step, while two others mounted on the edge above, and giving me their hands, I was enabled, by making two good long Tagliani-isms, to reach the place where they stood; a fourth Arab remained always behind and below me, to be ready in case I made a false step. This went on very well for a short time, while each shelf or step was of sufficient width to permit the placing of my four-footed stool; but frequently the steps were not more than six inches wide, while yet they were four feet high, thus rendering the footing very insecure, and the position sufficiently alarming for weak nerves. In such cases another mode of proceeding became necessary. An Arab would kneel with one knee, and present the other as a step, the one below holding him against the rock, that he might not topple over. At about half way from the ground, the layers of stone are not over three feet

The famous pyramids of Egypt stand upon a plain which extends from Cairo about fifty miles along the Nile. Forty, or more, of different sizes, and of various materials, are irregularly scattered over this plain; the three largest, the pyramids of Cheops, of Cephrenes, and of Mycerines, are in the neighborhood of Djiza.

The great pyramid of Cheops is the largest structure in the world; or, in other words, it is the greatest mass of materials which men have ever placed together to form a single building; and one of our distinguished countrymen says, "The oldest pyramid is yet the most perfect work of art." It has stood through the moral and physical convulsions of more than thirty centuries, and may stand until—thick, and from thence to the top they diminish gradually.

"Difficult as the ascent is, it is as nothing when compared with the descent. In the first operation, the face being turned to the wall, neither the giddy height is observed, nor the tapering point for which one is aiming, the whole attention being taken up with the matter on hand, and the climber being hurried on without time to turn around, so that a fearful height is reached before he is aware of it. Curiosity satisfied, and the constant excitement over, the descent becomes a regular matter of business. On looking down, the first few tiers of steps are quite perceptible, and their lines are distinctly marked; but all lines soon become confused, and nothing but a smooth surface is visible from fifty feet in advance down to the very ground. At first the stoutest hearts recoil at this optical delusion, but gradually gaining assurance as they descend, they get through it tolerably well."

The second pyramid, that of Cephrenes, is about four hundred feet high, and six hundred and sixty-five feet on each side at the base. The enterprising traveller Belzoni discovered the entrance to this pyramid in 1818. When he forced his way to the interior, he found inscriptions in Arabic, showing that the pyramids had been entered by a Saracen conqueror some centuries before. Nothing of great value has been discovered in them in modern times. We are told that under one of the caliphs an order went forth for the destruction of these edifices, and that the work was committed to one of the most skilful engineers of the age. He wrought at it for a long time, expending much labor and treasure, and finally gave it up. Of course he had no gunpowder. The engineer began at the top; but how he got there, up the smooth plane of five hundred feet, is beyond comprehension, unless by cutting a flight of steps from the bottom. "Nothing can be farther from the truth than the idea that there was a regular series of steps for ascent in the original plan of either of these pyramids."

All the pyramids are finished in the interior with much labor. They contain many long and intricate passages, the walls of which are sculptured and painted, the colors remaining as fresh as if recently executed. For what purpose these stupendous edifices were erected, remains an enigma which the most learned antiquaries have in vain attempted to solve. Were they for tombs or for temples for worship? Probably they united both purposes.

88. PYRAMIDS OF SOCCARA, BUILT BY THE ISRAELITES.

The pyramids of Soccara, at some distance from the great pyramids, are in a ruinous state. Some of them are rounded at the top; others are flat, and ascended by steps.

These are supposed to be of more recent origin than the larger pyramids. One, which has partly fallen down, was built of unburnt bricks, badly made with gravel, shells, and chopped straw.

It has been suggested that these were the works upon which the Israelites toiled, whose lives the taskmasters of Pharaoh made "bitter with hard bondage in mortar and in brick." When they murmured against their hard fate, the command of the tyrant was followed out to the letter, "Ye shall no more give the people straw to make brick, as heretofore; let them go and gather straw for themselves;" "and the tale of the bricks which they did make heretofore ye shall lay upon them; ye shall not diminish aught thereof." In this dry climate, unburnt bricks are mostly used; and in order to give the clay more tenacity, a large proportion of chopped straw is worked into it in the pit; without which, or something for a substitute, as coarse, dry grass, or "stubble," the bricks would tumble to pieces in handling, after being dried in the sun.

89. TEMPLE OF KARNAC.

Of the remains of Egyptian architectural greatness, the temple or palace of Karnak, or Carnak, is one of the most elaborate and extensive. It contains such an immense number of sphinxes, colossal statues, obelisks, propylæa, and porticoes, that the mind is bewildered and lost amid the endless variety. All descriptions fail to convey a just idea of its size and magnificence. We can form no conception of a hall so large that the Cathedral of Notre Dame, at Paris, could be placed in it entire; or, as a Frenchman remarked, "eight of our churches might dance a cotillon in it." This is the great hypostyle hall, supported by one hundred and thirty-four colossal columns, some of which are twenty-six feet in circumference, and others thirty-four. Six men, with their hands united, might clasp one of the shafts of these columns, but not the capitals; they are sixty-five feet in circumference, and ten feet high!

Champollion says, "The imagination, which in Europe rises far above our porticoes, sinks abashed at the foot of the one hundred and forty columns of the hypostyle hall of Carnak."

90. TEMPLES EXCAVATED AND CARVED FROM THE SOLID ROCK.

The most celebrated are at Elephanta, Salsette, and Ellora. The Island of Elephanta is near Bombay, and is so called from a colossal figure of an elephant carved upon the rocks on the southern shore of the island. A temple, one hundred and twenty feet square, is here cut out of the solid foundations of the earth.

The large columns, of which there were four rows, stand upon high square pedestals; the bases have a peculiar ornament; the shafts are receded, very short, and much smaller at the top than near the base. Along the sides of the cavern are about fifty statues, from twelve to fifteen feet high, having their heads ornamented with crowns, helmets, and other decorations.

This subterranean temple is constantly exposed to the sea breeze, and is yielding to the ruthless spoiler, Time, —

"Whom stone and brass obey, —
Who gives to every flying hour
To work some new decay."

Canara, in the Island of Salsette, is represented by travellers as very magnificent. There are four stories or galleries hewn out of a high perpendicular rock, into which open more than three hundred apartments. Before the entrance into this grand temple stand two colossal statues, twenty-seven feet in height. Thirty-five octagonal columns are formed of tigers, elephants, and other animals finely carved, and represented crouching down, as if to support the superincumbent weight. There are said to be not less than six hundred figures of idols within the excavations of Salsette.

But wonderful as are the excavations at Salsette and Elephanta, they are far surpassed by those of Ellora. A traveller says, "No monuments of antiquity in the known world are comparable to the caves of Ellora, whether we consider their unknown origin, their stupendous size, the beauty of their architectural ornaments, or the vast numbers of statues and emblems, all hewn out of the solid rock." It would require volumes to give a description of these amazing works.

It is supposed that these temples were hewn out by the architect's commencing at the top of the rock, and the roof of the building, working downwards. By whom they were excavated is wholly unknown.

91. THE TEMPLE OF DAGON.

Tyre was built about the year 1060 before Christ; and a curious specimen of their sacred architecture was the temple of Dagon, which the Bible represents to have been destroyed by Samson, who pulled it down, and destroyed himself and all the people who were assembled to worship the idol and to make sport with their captive. The temple is described to have had two main pillars or columns on which it stood, and that Samson, standing between the two, pulled them down, and hurled the temple into inevitable destruction.

The structure of such a building has puzzled many a commentator and critic; but Sir Christopher Wren, whose learning and reading were equal to his skill in architecture and mathematics, has given so clear an elucidation, as to render its mode of construction perfectly intelligible. In considering what this fabric must be, that could at one pull be demolished; he conceived it to have been an oval amphitheatre, the scene in the middle, where a vast roof of cedar beams, resting upon the walls, centred all upon one short architrave, that united two cedar pillars in the middle; one pillar would not be sufficient to unite the ends of at least one hundred beams that tended to the centre; therefore, he says, there must be a short architrave resting upon two pillars, upon which all the beams tending to the centre of the amphitheatre might be supported. Now, if Samson, by his miraculous power pressing upon one of these pillars, moved it from its basis, the whole roof must of necessity fall.

92. THE CORINTHIAN CAPITAL.

The capital of the Corinthian order in architecture had its origin in a simple incident. On the death of a young maid of Corinth, her lover gathered the ornaments she had most valued when living, and placed them in a wicker basket, covered by a tile, upon her tomb. Close to her grave, an acanthus had taken root, and the flowers shooting forth in the spring, its leaves twined around the basket, and convolved beneath the tile in the form of volutes. Attracted by this display, Callimachus, the founder of the Corinthian order, made it the model for his capital; the tile being the abacus, the foliage of the acanthus the volutes, and the whole forming the capital which adorns his column, about 540 B. C.

93. TEMPLE OF MINERVA AT ATHENS.

The finest specimen of the Doric order is the temple of Minerva Parthenon, at Athens. Pericles resolved that Athens should be the admiration of the world, and that her architecture should keep pace with her military and intellectual renown. When the temple of Minerva Parthenon was to be built, many grand designs were offered to the Athenians for their choice. Ictinus was the successful architect, whose design met with their approbation. Callicrates was also employed upon it. A small temple, raised by Cimon, in honor of Theseus, was the model of the Parthenon.

The sculptures which decorated this temple were designed by Phidias, and executed by his scholars. Ictinus, the architect, wrote a work on the architecture of the Parthenon, which is quoted by Vitruvius. The Grecian temples are all oblong, and about twice as long as they are broad. The Parthenon was two hundred and twenty-five feet in length, and one hundred in breadth; the height of the entrance was thirty-six feet.

There were eight columns at each front, and seventeen on each side, counting those at the angle twice. Besides these, there was an inner row of columns at each end, which stood upon a platform two steps higher than the outer row. The diameter of the columns of the outer row is six feet two inches, and their height, including the capitals, thirty-four feet.

Part of the beautiful Parthenon was destroyed by the explosion of a magazine which the Turks had placed within its walls, when Athens, in 1687, was besieged by the Venetians. Enough of it remained when Stuart visited Athens, about 1765, to enable him to give a perfect description of it, as restored to its pristine glory. When the columns or other parts fell, the Turks sometimes used them for their buildings; but it is said that they rarely destroyed or defaced these beautiful ruins.

The Parthenon stood upon the grand platform or area of the Acropolis. On this elevation were accumulated those edifices whose surpassing beauty will long remain the world's wonder. In sight of these splendid structures, perhaps with his eyes fixed upon the sculptured Parthenon, St. Paul stood upon "Mars' Hill," the hill of Areopagus, and exclaimed, "Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious....God, that made the world and all things therein, seeing he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands. Forasmuch, then, as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device."

The statue of the goddess Minerva, executed by Phidias, occupied one apartment of the Parthenon. This statue was thirty-nine feet high, of ivory covered with gold, and for the richness, exquisite workmanship, and beauty, was unsurpassed by any statue of antiquity. Another apartment was used for the public treasury.

94. DINOCRATES.

Dinocrates, an ingenious but neglected architect of Macedon, determined to attract the attention of Alexander. He clothed himself in a lion's skin, with a chaplet of poplar boughs on his head, and a club in his hand, like Hercules. His large stature, agreeable countenance, and dignified mien, suited well with this disguise; the king was attracted by the novelty of his appearance, and demanded who he was. "I am," replied Dinocrates, "a Macedonian architect, who come to thee with ideas and designs worthy of the greatness of thy fame. I have formed a design to cut Mount Athos into the statue of a man, in whose left hand shall be a large city, and in his right hand a basin, which shall receive all the rivers of the mountain, and discharge them into the sea." Alexander inquired if there would be sufficient country around the city in the giant's hand to supply it with food. When answered that there would not, and that it must be supplied by sea, Alexander declined the proposition, but retained the architect in his service. The fame of the emperor and the architect was more effectually perpetuated by the building of Alexandria, at the mouth of the Nile. Dinocrates planned this magnificent city; its walls fortified with towers, its aqueducts, fountains, canals, temples, palaces, and streets. Cairo furnished an immense quarry, from which the new city was adorned. Few architects ever had the direction of a work so important.

95. SOSTRATUS.

Sostratus, one of the most celebrated architects of antiquity, was so esteemed by Ptolemy Philadelphus, that he was surnamed "the favorite of kings." His greatest work was the light-house in the Isle of Pharos, considered one of the wonders of the world. It was a tower four hundred and fifty feet high, built upon a rock, and could be seen at a hundred miles' distance. It consisted of several stories, decreasing in size; the ground story was a mile in circumference; at the top was an immense lantern, where fires were lighted at night to guide the mariner's course. On the light-house was the following inscription in Greek: "Sostratus of Cnidus, son of Dexiphanes, to the gods, the saviors; for the benefit of sailors." It has been said that Sostratus secretly covered this inscription with cement, and placed over it another in honor of Ptolemy, which in a few years mouldered away and showed the first.

96. THE GREAT WALL OF CHINA.

It was with the view of securing his empire against future attacks from various formidable tribes, that Che-wangte (B. C. 214) undertook the completion of this great wall, a stupendous work, surpassing the most wonderful efforts of human labor in other countries, and upon which twenty centuries have exerted but little effect. The biggest of the pyramids of Egypt contains but a small portion of the matter in this wall, the solid contents of which—not including the projecting mass of stone and brick, which contains as much masonry as all London—are supposed to exceed in bulk the materials of all the dwelling-houses in England and Scotland.

The vastness of the mass may be better appreciated by considering that it is more than sufficient to surround the circumference of the earth, on two of its circles, with two walls, each six feet high and two feet thick. Walls had been already erected by some of the petty princes in the north, to exclude the barbarians from their states.

The emperor directed his general, Mungteen, who had completed the campaign against the Hounghnoos, to survey the walls built by these princes, to complete the union, and to continue this great barrier from Kea-yuh-kwan to the place where, at a subsequent period, Wung-hae-low was built, on the shore of the Eastern Sea, a space of about fifteen hundred miles, over deep valleys and mountains of great elevation. The foundations of this prodigious work were laid in the early part of this year. Enormous numbers of men, some say millions, being a third of the inhabitants of the certain age, were collected from all parts of the empire, and set to work on the structure. Its superintendence was intrusted to Mungteen, who had under him an army of three hundred thousand men. Vessels laden with iron were sunk at the sea-shore, where the wall began, to make a buttress for it. Large arches were built for the passage of rivers; along the wall, at certain distances, were forts for garrisons; gates were made at convenient places for traffic, passage of troops, &c.; and its width was so great that, in some parts, seven horsemen could walk abreast at the top of the wall. The work was completed in the short space of ten years, in the second year of the usurpation of Pwa-wang, (B. C. 205,) so that neither Che-wangte nor any of his race had the satisfaction of seeing the great undertaking accomplished.

97. PROGRESS OF ART IN ROME.

According to Pliny, nearly a century elapsed before the Romans used marble columns; and so ignorant were they of the value of beautiful sculpture, that when Mummius sacked Corinth, and sent away all the sculptures to adorn Rome, he threatened the bearers, that if any were lost or damaged, they should supply their places with new. But as the Romans extended their dominion over Greece, they received from the polished inhabitants of those states more refined ideas. Assisted by Grecian architects, they filled Rome with buildings of the greatest magnitude and splendor. In the time of Augustus, such noble improvements were made in the city, that the emperor exclaimed, that he "found Rome of brick, but that he left it of marble." The successors of Augustus continued to embellish Rome, and other parts of Italy; and as they then had Grecian artists residing among them, the Etruscan style was rejected. From that time the Romans borrowed their ideas of architecture, and formed their style, from the works of conquered Greece: not servilely copying them, they ventured to vary from their original, and, prompted by an ambitious desire to surpass all other nations, with the mighty resources of their extended empire, they erected temples and buildings which have been the admiration of all succeeding ages.

98. THE FLAVIAN AMPHITHEATRE.

The Flavian amphitheatre, called the Coliseum, was erected by the Emperor Flavius Vespasian, after his return from the Jewish war, A. D. 72. Many thousand Jews, who were made captives in this war, were employed upon the Coliseum. Titus completely finished it, and dedicated it to his father, Vespasian. On the day of its dedication, five thousand animals of different species were cruelly made to destroy each other for the amusement of the populace! But not animals alone were slaughtered in this amphitheatre. Here sat the conquerors of the world, coolly to enjoy the combats of the gladiators, and the tortures and death of men who had never offended them. Two aqueducts were scarcely sufficient to wash off the human blood which a few hours' sport shed in these imperial shambles. Twice in one day came the senators and matrons of Rome to witness the butchery; a virgin always gave signal for the slaughter, and, when glutted with bloodshed, those ladies sat down in the wet and streaming arena to a luxurious supper. Such reflections check our regret for its ruin. As it now stands, the Coliseum is a striking image of Rome itself; decayed, vacant, serious, yet grand—half gray and half green—erect on one side and fallen on the other, with consecrated ground in its bosom.

The shape necessary to an amphitheatre has preserved it from destruction. Such was its stability that it resisted earthquakes and sieges. Barbarian hands commenced the work of dilapidation, and popes, in their turn, used it as a quarry for modern churches. This colossal structure was oval in its form, its length being five hundred and eighty feet, and its breadth four hundred and seventy. It was externally surrounded by three rows of arches, raised one above another to the height of one hundred and fifty-seven feet; each row was composed of eighty arches, with as many columns. The order of the lower part of the Coliseum is Doric; the next order is Ionic; the next, Corinthian; above this, a row of composite pilasters; and the whole is crowned with a heavy attic.

numbers; these arches were so many entrances, which, by means of twenty staircases, led to the upper piazzas and to the seats; so that even a child could find his way directly to his seat, and the numerous spectators could quit the amphitheatre in a very short time, without confusion.

The arena, where the games were celebrated, is two hundred and eighty-five feet long, and one hundred and eighty-two wide; it was surrounded by a wall of moderate height, to prevent the animals from escaping. The seats for spectators were arranged around the arena. Those destined for the emperor, his family, and the magnates of Rome, were the nearest to the arena: above these were the seats for the people, gradually ascending, so that every spectator could have an uninterrupted view of the whole amphitheatre. Thus eighty thousand spectators could be accommodated; and twenty thousand more could sit in the piazzas above.

There was no roof to this stupendous structure. The spectators were protected from the sun and rain by an awning, which was drawn over as occasion required.

99. COLUMNS OF TRAJAN AND MARCUS AURELIUS

The historical columns are true to no order of architecture.* Trajan's column has a Doric shaft, a Tuscan base and capital, and a pedestal with Corinthian mouldings. The shaft is eleven feet two inches in diameter at the base, and ten feet at the capital; the whole height of the column, including the statue, is one hundred and thirty-two feet. Upon the summit formerly stood the statue of Trajan, in bronze, but Sixtus V. displaced the emperor and elevated St. Peter, in bronze, notwithstanding the ashes of Trajan were buried beneath the pedestal, and the whole column is covered with sculptures in bas-relief, representing his victories. This splendid column is of marble, fastened together with bronze. A spiral cordon is represented as entwining it from the top to the bottom, in twenty-three windings, thus separating the figures that ornament it, and giving continuity to the subject or story. An interior winding staircase, chiselled out of the marble, conducts to the top, which commands a fine view of Rome. The pedestal is beautifully adorned with eagles, garlands, and trophies.

The column of Marcus Aurelius is similar to that of Trajan. It was erected by the Roman senate in honor of that emperor; but he afterwards dedicated it to his father-in-law, Antoninus Pius. The pedestals to these columns are mentioned as unique in ancient Roman architecture, though often employed in more modern days. Forsyth remarks, that "the insulated pedestal, which in architecture acts as a still to the shaft, is beautiful, because necessary only under insulated columns like these." The column of M. Aurelius having been injured by lightning, Sixtus V. repaired it, and placed upon the top a gilt bronze statue of St. Paul.

100. APOLLODORUS AND HADRIAN.

Apollodorus fell a sacrifice to his derision of Hadrian, who, being a smatterer in architecture, had designed and executed a temple dedicated to Rome and Venus. Upon his showing it to Apollodorus, the latter observed, that if the sitting statues of the gods and goddesses therein should ever be desirous of changing their posture and standing upright, they would run the risk of breaking their heads against the ceiling.

Hadrian felt the reproof, and made away with Apollodorus.

101. ANGELO'S FIRST SIGHT OF THE PANTHEON.

When Michael Angelo first saw the Pantheon at Rome, "I will erect such a building," said he, "but I will hang it up in the air." With what truth he spoke this, the cupola of St. Peter's will evince, but which, unhappily for him, was not executed while he was living, and to which his original design was to append a magnificent portico.

102. ST. PETER'S AT ROME.

St Peter's is situated on the ancient site of the circus and garden of Nero, where that tyrant massacred numbers of Christian martyrs. Tradition says, that the bodies of these martyrs were buried by their faithful friends in a grotto near the circus, and that among those who were thus buried here was the crucified apostle, St. Peter. In 306, Constantine founded a church over the reputed grave of the holy apostle. This edifice remained for eleven centuries, when Pope Nicholas V., in 1450, demolished it, and laid the foundation for the present St. Peter's. At the death of this pope, the structure had been elevated only four or five feet above the pavement. The work was suspended, or made but little progress, till the time of Julius II., who, in 1503, employed the celebrated Bramante to carry on this great undertaking. This architect formed the original plan of the cupola, and caused four stupendous pillars or piers, two hundred and nine feet in circumference, to be raised to support it. The patron and the architect both died and left it in this state.

Leo X. employed architects to carry on the work, among whom was the celebrated painter Raphael d'Urbino, who strengthened the basis of the pillars, which he deemed too weak to support the stupendous cupola. Various other architects were employed by the pontiffs who succeeded Leo, until at last Paul III. committed the edifice to the incomparable genius of Michael Angelo Buonarroti, who designed the dome and cupola as they now stand. He wished to make the front like the Pantheon, but death removed him from his labors, and the sublime idea was abandoned. Michael Angelo "left it an unfinished monument of his proud, towering, gigantic powers; and his awful genius" seemed to watch over his successors for a long time. Many other artists were employed upon this stupendous edifice, until it was finished, under Paul V., by Carlo Maderno. Three centuries and a half this church was being built; and in 1694, the cost was estimated to have been eleven million pounds sterling, or about forty-nine million eight hundred and forty thousand dollars!

This edifice contains the best specimens of design of the ablest architects who flourished during a period in which the revived classic style was carried to the highest perfection which it reached in Italy. The extreme length of St. Peter's is seven hundred and twenty feet; breadth, five hundred and ten feet; height, from pavement to the top of the cross upon the cupola, five hundred feet.

103. ST. PETER'S AND ANGELO.

To Pope Julius II. the world is indebted for that wonder of architecture, St. Peter's Church at Rome. The vanity of Julius had prompted him to order Michael Angelo to give him a design for his tomb; which that great artist made upon so grand a scale, that the choir of old St. Peter's Church could not contain it. "Well, then," replied the pope, "enlarge the choir." "Ay, holy father, but we must then build a new church, to keep up the due proportion between the different parts of the edifice." "That we will then do," replied the pope; and immediately gave orders for the sale of indulgences to carry on the erection of this noble fabric.

Some of the figures intended for the pope's mausoleum; the famous figure of Moses sitting, in St. Pietro da Vinculi at Rome; and two or three of the slaves at the Hotel de Richelieu in Paris, are preserved. The original design of the tomb is engraved in Vasari; it has much of stately Gothic grandeur in it, and was to have been decorated with thirty-two whole length figures of prophets and apostles.

104. ANGELO'S SEPARATION FROM THE POPE.

Pope Julius II. commissioned Michael Angelo to erect a mausoleum. Michael's design was magnificent. When he showed it to the pope, his holiness inquired the cost of such a splendid work. Michael answered that it would amount to a hundred thousand crowns; and the pope liberally gave him permission to expend twice that sum. The mausoleum was commenced. Pope Julius was so delighted with it, that he had a covered way from his palace erected, that he might visit the artist at his work incognito. This was too great a favor not to excite the envy of a court. Ill words and unkind slanders were spoken of Michael. They reached the pope's ear, as it was intended, and he visited Buonarroti no more. Michael came to the Vatican, which had been at all times open to him; but it was not so now. A groom of the chamber stopped his entrance.

"Do you know to whom you speak?" asked the malignant architect.

"Perfectly well," said the man; "and I only do my duty in obeying the orders my master has given."

"Then tell the pope," replied Michael, "if he wants me, he may come and seek me elsewhere himself."

The insulted artist returned immediately to his house, ordered his servants to sell his furniture, and follow him to Florence; and left Rome that very night. Great was the pope's consternation. Couriers were immediately sent after Michael. But it was too late; he had already passed the boundary of the pope's jurisdiction, and force was of no avail. The couriers reached Florence, and delivered the pope's letter. Michael's answer was this: "I have been expelled from the antechamber of your holiness without meriting disgrace; therefore I have left Rome to preserve my reputation. I will not return, as your holiness commands. If I have been deemed worthless one day, how can I be valued the next, except by a caprice alike discreditable to the one who shows it and the one to whom it is shown."

Julius next wrote to the government of Florence, using these conciliatory words: "We know the humor of men like Michael Angelo. If he will return, we promise that none shall offend him or interfere with him, and he shall be reinstated in our apostolic grace." But Michael was inflexible. Again and again the pope wrote, and still this proud and high-spirited man refused to heed him. At last the chief magistrate of Florence became alarmed. He sent for the artist, and said, "You have treated the Pope as the King of France himself would not have dared. We cannot bring him to war against the state on your account; therefore you must obey his will." The magistrate promised also, if Michael feared for his personal safety, to send him as ambassador to Rome, in which case his person would be inviolable. At last Michael relented, and met the pope at Bologna. Julius glanced at him with displeasure, and did not for some time deign to speak. At last he said, "Instead of your coming to us, you seem to have expected that we should wait upon you."

Michael answered with a slight apology for his conduct, which, however, was so haughtily expressed, that a prelate, who had introduced him, thought it necessary to observe, "One must needs make allowance for such men, who are ignorant of every thing except their art."

Wise, and generous too, was the pope's indignant reply to this speech. He turned to the prelate: "Foolish man, it is thou who hast vilified Michael Angelo; I have not. He is a man of genius, and thou an ignorant fellow. Depart from my sight this moment." And the contemner of art was forcibly driven from the room.

105. ANGELO'S DISINTERESTEDNESS.

Michael Angelo was extremely disinterested. For his noble design of the church of St. Peter at Rome, he received only twenty-five Roman crowns, and it was finished in a fortnight. Santo Gallo had been many years employed in his wretched models, and received four thousand crowns for them. This being reported to Angelo, far from being mortified or envious, he said, "I work for God, and require no other recompense."

106. ANGELO AND THE CARDINAL.

Under the papacy of Julius III., the faction of Michael Angelo's rival, San Gallo, gave him some trouble respecting the building of St. Peter's, and went so far as to prevail on the pope to appoint a committee to examine the fabric. Julius told him that a particular part of the church was dark. "Who told you that, holy father?" replied the artist. "I did," said Cardinal Marcello. "Your eminence should consider, then," said Michael Angelo, "that besides the window there is at present, I intend to have three more in the ceiling of the church." "You did not tell me so," replied the cardinal. "No indeed, I did not, sir," answered the artist: "I am not obliged to do it, and I would never consent to be obliged to tell your eminence, or any person whomsoever, any thing concerning it: your business is to see that money is plenty at Rome; that there are no thieves there; to let me alone; and to permit me to go on with my plan as I please."

107. ANGELO AND BERNINI.

Each of the four piers that support the cupola of St. Peter's at Rome takes up as much ground as a little chapel and convent, in which one of the architects employed in that work lived; and yet they do not appear large to the eye, because every thing is in just proportion about them. They were designed by Michael Angelo, and he insisted earnestly that nothing should be added or altered in his design. Bernini afterwards undertook to make a staircase within each of these columns. Just as they had hollowed and prepared the inside of one of them, the whole building gave a crash; and the Italian tradition says it was loud as thunder. They had put up the stairs in that column, but would not attempt any more.

106. "COLUMBUS AND THE EGG" ANTICIPATED.

Brunelleschi was the discoverer of the mode of erecting cupolas, which had been lost since the time of the Romans. Vasari relates a similar anecdote of him to that recorded of Columbus; though this has unquestionably the merit of being the first, since it occurred before the birth of Columbus. Brunelleschi died in 1446; Columbus was born in 1442.

A council of the most learned men of the day, from various parts of the world, was summoned to consult and show plans for the erection of a cupola, like that of the Pantheon at Rome. Brunelleschi refused to show his model, it being upon the most simple principles, but proposed that the man who could make an egg stand upright on a marble base should be the architect. The foreigners and artists agreeing to this, but failing in their attempts, desired Brunelleschi to do it himself; upon which he took the egg, and with a gentle tap broke the end, and placed it on the slab. The learned men unanimously protested that any one else could do the same; to which the architect replied, with a smile, that had they seen his model, they could as easily have known how to build a cupola.

The work then devolved upon him; but, a want of confidence existing among the operatives and citizens, they pronounced the undertaking to be too great for one man, and arranged that Lorenzo Ghiberti, an artist of great repute at that time, should be co-architect with him. Brunelleschi's anger and mortification were so great on hearing this decision, that he destroyed, in the space of half an hour, models and designs that had cost him years of labor, and would have quitted Florence but for the persuasions of Donatello. It is almost unnecessary to add that the cupola was completed with perfect success by Brunelleschi; since then, St. Peter's, at Rome, and St. Paul's, in London, were formed upon the model of his dome at Florence.

By the way, some of the wise men of the day proposed that a centre column should support the dome; others, that a huge mound of earth, with quatrini scattered among it, should be raised in the form of a cupola, the brick or stone wall built upon it. When finished, an order was to be issued, allowing the people to possess themselves of what money they might find in the rubbish; the mound would thus be easily removed, and the cupola be left clear.

Henry VII. had few expensive propensities; but he seems to have taken some pleasure in architectural improvements, and occasionally to have spared neither pains nor expense in the indulgence of this predilection. He built three houses for that sect of Franciscans called Conventuals, and three others for another sect of them called Observants, which his son destroyed. He also, upon an enlarged and more magnificent plan, rebuilt Baynard's Castle, and enlarged the palace at Greenwich, which he named Placentia. Upon his chapel at Westminster he is said to have expended twenty thousand pounds; a large sum for those days. This magnificent building was erected on the site of a chapel built by Henry III., and of a tavern which had been long distinguished by the sign of the White Rose, the cognizance of the house of York. The chapel of Windsor also owes its rise to Henry VII.

The tomb of Henry VII., perfected by his executors, is said to have cost a thousand pounds, which, as money went then, might be thought a sumptuous monument. Yet this was exclusive of the sculptures in brass, which are extremely beautiful, and were executed during the life of the monarch, by an Italian, who had been disciple to Donato, or Donatello, who formed the gates of a church in Florence, casts from which are in the Royal Academy. These, Michael Angelo said, were worthy to be the gates of paradise.

Lord Herbert, and all other historians, agree that Henry VII. left a sum amounting to 1,800,000*l.* in specie, in secret places of his palace at Richmond, of which he alone kept the keys. "This," says that noble lord "was doubtless a greater sum than any king of this realm before had in his coffers, and such as might be thought effectively quadruple to so much in the age of Charles II.," which computation of his lordship is extremely moderate, if we reflect upon the rate of living at that time, when the usual price of wheat (anno 1504) was but 5*s.* 8*d.* (i. e. 8*s.* 6*d.* of our money) per quarter, and ale not quite 3*d.* per gallon.

110. RICHARD BOYLE, EARL OF BURLINGTON.

Never were protection and great wealth more generously and more judiciously diffused than by this great person, who had every quality of a genius and artist, except envy. Though his own designs were more chaste and classic than Kent's, he entertained him in his house till his death, and was more studious to extend his friend's fame than his own. Nor was his munificence confined to himself and his own houses and gardens. He spent great sums in contributing to public works, and was known to choose that the expense should fall upon himself, rather than that his country should be deprived of some beautiful edifices. His enthusiasm for the works of Inigo Jones was so active, that he repaired the church of Convent Garden because it was the production of that great master, and purchased a gateway at Beaufort Garden in Chelsea, and transported the identical stones to Chiswick with religious attachment. With the same zeal for pure architecture, he assisted Kent in publishing the designs for Whitehall, and gave a beautiful edition of the antique baths from the drawings of Palladio, whose papers he procured with great cost. Besides his works on his own estate at Lonsborough, in Yorkshire, he new fronted his house in Piccadilly, built by his father,* and added the grand colonnade within

* That Lord Burlington being asked why he built his house so far out of town, replied, because he was determined to have no building beyond him. Little more than half a century has so enclosed Burlington House with new streets, that it is now in the heart of that part of London.

the court. As we have few examples of architecture more antique and imposing than that colonnade, Walpole mentions the effect it had on him. "I had not only never seen it, but had never heard of it, at least with any attention, when, soon after my return from Italy, I was invited to a ball at Burlington House. As I passed under the gate by night, it could not strike me. At daybreak, looking out of the window to see the sun rise, I was surprised with the vision of the colonnade that fronted me. It seemed one of those edifices in fairy tales that are raised by genii in a night's time."

111. INIGO JONES.

If a table of fame were to be formed for men of real and undisputed genius in every country, Inigo Jones would save England from the disgrace of not having her representative among those distinguished in the arts. This celebrated architect was bound apprentice to a joiner; but, even in this obscure situation, the brightness of his genius burst forth so strongly that he was patronized by the Earl of Arundel, who sent him to Italy to study landscape painting, to which his inclination then pointed. When at Rome, he found that nature had not formed him to decorate cabinets, but to design palaces. After remaining some time in Italy, Christian IV. invited him to Denmark, and appointed him his architect. He afterwards returned to England, and was employed in repairing St. Paul's, in 1663. He also designed the palace at Whitehall, and erected the banqueting-house, the church, and piazza at Convent Garden, and several other private buildings. Jones was surveyor general of the king's works to James I.; but he refused to accept any salary, until the heavy debts contracted under his predecessor had been liquidated. Upon the accession of Charles, he was continued in his office, when his salary as surveyor was eight shillings and fourpence per day, with an allowance of forty-six pounds a year for house rent.

112. ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

St. Paul's Cathedral, in London, though inferior in size and richness to St. Peter's, is a magnificent edifice. "The first stone," says the architect, Sir Christopher Wren, "was laid in 1675, and the works carried on with such care and industry, that by the year 1685, the walks of the choir and the side aisles were finished, with the north and south porticoes, and the great pillars of the dome brought to the same height; and it pleased God, in his mercy, to grant to the surveyor (architect) health and length of days, and to enable him to complete the whole structure in the year 1710, to the glory of his holy name, and the promotion of his divine worship, the principal ornament of the imperial seat of this realm."

"Thus was this mighty fabric, the second church for grandeur in Europe, in the space of thirty-five years, begun and finished by one architect, and under one Bishop of London, Dr. Henry Compton."

St. Paul's is five hundred feet in length, two hundred and fifty feet in breadth, and its height from the pavement to the top of the cross is three hundred and sixty-six feet.

113. SIR CHRISTOPHER WREN AND ST. PAUL'S.

This great architect was compelled by an order from the Duke of York, (afterwards James II.) who was anxious for the restoration of the Popish religion, to add side oratories to his original design, which broke in very much upon the beauty and simplicity of the plan. Sir Christopher, aware of the injury it would do to the whole, could not refrain from shedding tears in speaking of it; but it was all in vain,—the duke absolutely insisted upon their being inserted, and he was obliged to comply.

114. WREN AND THE LONDON MONUMENT.

After the Monument of London was completed, a committee was formed to inspect and report upon it. On ascending and feeling very sensibly the rocking motion, they became alarmed, and sent immediately for Sir Christopher Wren, the architect, to whom, with dismayed looks, they communicated the intelligence; on hearing which Sir Christopher exclaimed, "Then, gentlemen, I am immortalized! for what you consider a cause of alarm is to me an evidence of its durability."

115. WREN'S GREAT GENIUS.

A variety of knowledge proclaims the universality, a multiplicity of works the abundance, and St. Paul's Cathedral the greatness, of Sir Christopher Wren's genius. The noblest temple, the largest palace, and the most sumptuous hospital in Great Britain, are all the work of the same hand. Besides St. Paul's, Hampton Court, and Greenwich Hospital, all of which were erected by him, he built above fifty parish churches, and designed the Monument, on which he intended to erect the statue of Charles II., instead of the pot of flames which we now see; but in this, as in many other instances, he was overruled by men of inferior judgment. When Sir Christopher had lived to see the completion of St. Paul's, the fabric and the event left such an impression of content on the mind of the good old man, that, being carried to see it once a year, it seemed to recall a memory that was almost deadened to every other use. He died at the great age of ninety-one, and was buried under the dome of St. Paul's.

116. THE GLASS PALACE FOR THE WORLD'S FAIR.

In 1849, the Royal Society of Arts promulgated a plan for a great national fair, to be held in London in 1851, to which the whole civilized world would be invited to contribute. The plan met with universal favor. Plans and specifications for buildings, suited for the purpose, were immediately advertised for; and two hundred and forty-five were submitted to the building committee. Every one was deemed objectionable; but the committee reluctantly decided at length on what seemed the best, viz., a building of brick, two thousand feet long, three hundred feet wide, walls nine feet thick, &c.

But this plan was eventually changed, as all know, for the renowned glass palace; and a sketch of this affair presents one of the finest anecdotes in the history of architecture. On new year's day, 1837, a traveller, proceeding in a native boat up the River Berbice, in Demarara, discovered, on the margin of a lake into which the river expanded, a Titanic water-plant, unlike any other he had before seen, though an accomplished botanist, and familiar with the flora of South America. "I felt as a botanist," said Sir Richard Schomburgk, "and felt myself rewarded. All calamities were forgotten. A gigantic leaf, from five to six feet in diameter, salver-shaped, with a broad rim of a light green above and a vivid crimson below, rested on the water. Quite in character with the wonderful leaf was the luxuriant flower, consisting of an immense number of petals, passing in alternate tints from pure white to rose and pink," (and in some instances fifteen inches across.) "The smooth water was covered with blossoms; and as I rowed from one to the other, I always observed something new to admire."

Sir Robert dug up whole plants, and sent first them, and afterwards seeds, to England, where the magnificent lily was named Victoria Regia. After some unsuccessful attempts, the task of forcing it to blossom in an artificial climate was confided to Mr. Paxton, the celebrated horticulturist of the Duke of Devonshire's celebrated Chatsworth.

When the Victoria Regia was to be flowered, Mr. Paxton determined to imitate nature so closely as to make the innocent offspring of the great mother lily fancy itself back again in the broad waters and under the burning heats of British Guiana. He deceived the roots by imbedding them in a hillock of burnt loam and peat; he deluded the great lubberly leaves by letting them float in a tank, to which he communicated, by means of a little wheel, the gentle ripple of their own tranquil river; and he coaxed the flower into bloom by manufacturing a Barbican climate in a tiny South America, under a spacious and splendid glass house, invented by himself, and beautifully adapted for the purpose.

This at length suggested the giant palace in Hyde Park; and so it proved that the parent of the most extensive building in Europe was the largest known floral structure in the world.

The one proceeded from the other as oaks grow from acorns. But our readers must have the connections between the two, as developed in further details.

The Victoria Regia was planted in Mr. Paxton's greenhouse, August 10, 1849. So well had every thing been prepared, and so vigorously did it flourish, that on the 9th of November a flower was produced a yard in circumference.

Success, however, brought a fresh embarrassment; the great plant outgrew the dimensions of its home in little more than a month. A new house, of proper dimensions for the plant when it should arrive at maturity, must be constructed at once. Mr. Paxton went to work, and combining all his improvements in constructing greenhouses with his special inventions for maturing the Victoria Regia, he soon produced the desideratum in the shape of a novel and elegant conservatory, sixty feet long by forty broad. While Mr. Paxton was busy with this model garden-house, a hot war was raging in London against having the building for the World's Fair erected in Hyde Park, having that great popular resort invaded by armies of excavators, bricklayers, blacksmiths, and timber-fellers, and against having the fashionable roads broken up by the carting of more brick and mortar than were contained in the pyramids of Gizeh. The necessary spoliation of a large number of ornamental trees in the Park, and the impossibility of such a mass of brick and mortar properly drying before the time for opening the fair, were urged in the public journals against the locality and the plan of the building, as chosen by the committee.

These things meeting the eye of Mr. Paxton as he read the Times, the thought struck him that such objections might be mostly obviated, provided the building for the exhibition should be constructed on the plan of his conservatory for the Victoria Regia. All that seemed to him to be wanting was a great number of his lily-houses, made on a larger scale, and joined compactly together.

The proposed edifice could thus be constructed in the great workshops of Birmingham, at Dudley, and at Thames Bank, brought home to Hyde Park ready made and put up like a bedstead, with none of the popular annoyances urged against the committee's plan. As to the trees, he would remove them, and bring them back again in due time, without injury, or he would clap the trees, all standing, under his great glass case.

Mr. Paxton drew up his plans and specifications. They were presented for inspection to Mr. Stephenson, the engineer, one of the royal commissioners appointed for the management of the fair. Mr. Stephenson was delighted with them, and laid them before the royal commission. Sir Robert Peel and Prince Albert strongly favored Mr. Paxton's scheme; but on its reference, to the building committee, it was promptly rejected like many others, the committee having devised a plan of its own.

Nothing daunted, Paxton appealed to the British public; and this he did by the aid of the wood cuts and pages of the London Illustrated News. Every body but the committee was at once convinced of the practicability, simplicity, and beauty of Paxton's scheme. The people and the prince were heartily with him. Thus encouraged, the indomitable architect and his friends determined to make another effort with the building committee.

It happened that the committee had invited candidates for raising their edifice, to suggest any improvements in it that might occur to them. This opened a crevice for the tender of Paxton's plan as an "improvement" on that of the committee. The result was, that the glazed palace was at length chosen unanimously, not only by the building committee, but the royal commission also. The first castings for the iron columns were delivered on the 14th of September; and by the 1st of January, 1851, the cheapest, most gigantic, and substantial structure the world ever saw was completed.

117. GRAVES OF INDIAN KINGS.

In Lambyaque, Peru, are to be seen the stupendous graves of the Indian kings, who must have died in the time of the incas. These stupendous mounds of earth are just upon the outside of the city, and are built of sun-dried brick, and are of gigantic dimensions. Some of them are over three thousand feet in circumference, and over one hundred and fifty in height, and have required much time and labor in their erection. One of them was opened in Truxillo, and silver and gold taken from it amounting to over two million dollars.

118. MAMMOTH MOUND.

The largest mound in the United States is on the Virginia side of the Ohio River, about twelve miles below Wheeling. A western paper relates that some persons living in the vicinity, who have been engaged in the excavation of one of the sides, have suddenly struck upon an aperture descending to a subterranean hall eleven feet wide, and nearly sixty feet high. There are passages at one extremity leading to two spacious vaults, in both of which human skeletons, covered with beads and ornaments of curious construction, have been found. Among the articles worn by one of these relics, "there were," says the writer, "one thousand seven hundred ivory beads, five hundred sea-shells, one hundred and fifty pieces of isinglass, and five copper bands, bound around the wrist, weighing seventeen ounces; also a small stone about two inches in length and one and a half in width, with marks resembling letters and figures, supposed to be the name of the wearer."

§ 11. ASSOCIATIONS, LITERARY AND ARTISTIC.

119. BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.

The date of their first play is 1607, when Beaumont was in his twenty-first year; and it was probably acted some time before. He brought, however, into the firm a genius uncommonly fertile and commanding. In all the editions of their plays, and in every notice of their joint productions, notwithstanding Fletcher's seniority, the name of Beaumont always stands first. Their connection, from similarity of taste and studies, was very intimate, and it would appear, at one time, very economical. Aubrey informs us, that "there was a wonderful consimilitude of fancy between Mr. Francis Beaumont and Mr. John Fletcher, which caused that dearness of friendship between them. I have heard Dr. John Earl, since Bishop of Sarum, say, who knew them, that his (Beaumont's) main business was to correct the super-overflowings of Mr. Fletcher's wit. They lived together on the Bankside, not far from the play-house, both bachelors; had one bench in the house between them, which they did so admire; the same clothes, cloak, &c., between them."

120. THE FRENCH ACADEMY.

It was from a private meeting that the "French Academy" derived its origin; and the true beginners of that celebrated institution assuredly had no foresight of the object to which their conferences tended. Several literary friends in Paris, finding the extent of the city occasioned much loss of time in their visits, agreed to meet on a fixed day every week, and chose Conrat's residence as central. They met for the purposes of general conversation, or to walk together, or, what was not least social, to partake in some refreshing collation. All being literary men, those who were authors submitted their new works to this friendly society, who, without jealousy or malice, freely communicated their strictures; the works were improved, the authors were delighted, and the critics were honest. Such was the happy life of the members of this private society during three or four years. Pellisson, the earliest historian of the French academy, has delightfully described it: "It was such that now, when they speak of these first days of the academy, they call it the golden age, during which, with all the innocence and freedom of that fortunate period, without pomp and noise, and without any other laws than those of friendship, they enjoyed together all which a society of minds and a rational life can yield of whatever softens and charms."

They were happy, and they resolved to be silent; nor was this bond and compact of friendship violated till one of them, Malleville, secretary of Marshal Bassompierre, being anxious that his friend Faret, who had just printed his L'Honnête Homme, which he had drawn from the famous Il Cortigiano of Castiglione, should profit by all their opinions, procured his admission to one of their conferences. Faret presented them with his book, heard a great deal concerning the nature of his work, was charmed by their literary communications, and returned home ready to burst with the secret. Could the society hope that others would be more faithful than they had been to themselves? Faret happened to be one of those light-hearted men who are communicative in the degree in which they are grateful, and he whispered the secret to Des Marets and to Boisrobert. The first, as soon as he heard of such a literary senate, used every effort to appear before them and read the first volume of his Ariane. Boisrobert, a man of distinction, and a common friend to them all, could not be refused an admission; he admired the frankness of their mutual criticisms. The society, besides, was a new object; and his daily business was to furnish an amusing story to his patron Richelieu. The cardinal minister was very literary, and apt to be sohipped in his hours of retirement, that the physician declared, that "all his drugs were of no avail, unless his patient mixed with them a drachm of Boisrobert." In one of those fortunate moments when the cardinal was "in the vein," Boisrobert painted, with the warmest hues, this region of literary felicity, of a small, happy society formed of critics and authors. The minister, who was ever considering things in that particular aspect which might tend to his own glory, instantly asked Boisrobert whether this private meeting would not like to be constituted a public body, and establish itself by letters patent, offering them his protection. The flatterer of the minister was overjoyed, and executed the important mission; but not one of the members shared in the rapture, while some regretted an honor which would only disturb the sweetness and familiarity of their intercourse. Malleville, whose master was a prisoner in the Bastille, and Serisay, the intendant of the Duke of Rochefoucauld, who was in disgrace at court, loudly protested, in the style of an opposition party, against the protection of the minister; but Chapelain, who was known to have no party interests, argued so clearly, that he left them to infer that Richelieu's offer was a command; that the cardinal was a minister who willed not things by halves; and was one of those very great men who avenge any contempt shown to them, even on such little men as themselves. In a word, the dogs bowed their necks to the golden collar. However, the appearance, if not the reality, of freedom was left to them; and the minister allowed them to frame their own constitution, and elect their own magistrates and citizens in this infant and illustrious republic of literature. The history of the further establishment of the French Academy is elegantly narrated by Pellisson. The usual difficulty occurred of fixing on a title; and they appear to have changed it so often, that the academy was at first addressed by more than one title — Académie des beaux Esprits; Académie de l'Eloquence; Académie Eminente, in allusion to the quality of the cardinal, its protector. Desirous of avoiding the extravagant and mystifying titles of the Italian academies, they fixed on the most unaffected, "L'Académie Française"; but though the national genius may disguise itself for a moment, it cannot be entirely got rid of, and they assumed a vaunting devise of a laurel wreath, including their epigraph "a l'Immortalité."

121. HOTEL DE RAMBOUILLET. — MOLIÈRE.

There was in the times of Louis XIV. of France a singular literary society in Paris, made up of platonizing literati of both sexes. It was called the Society of the Hôtel de Rambouillet. It had a language and conduct all its own; these were embodied in the endless novels of Mademoiselle Scuderi. Gallantry and love were the watchwords, and metaphysical disquisitions were the labors of the set. But these were not allowed to subsist in homely phrase or a natural manner. The euphuism of our Elizabethan coxcombs were tame and tropeless in comparison with the high flights of the heroes and heroines of the Hôtel de Rambouillet. All was done by rule—all adapted to a system. The lover had a regular map laid out, and he entered on his amorous journey, knowing exactly the stoppages he must make, and the course he must pass through on his way to the city of Tenderness, towards which he was bound. There was the village of Billets-galans; the hamlet of Billets-doux; the castle of Petits Soins, and the villa of Jolis Vers. After possessing himself of these, he still had to fear being forced to embark on the sea of Dislike, or the lake of Indifference; but if, on the contrary, he pushed off on the river of Inclination, he floated happily down to his bourn. Their language was a jargon, which, Sir Walter Scott observes, in his "Essay on Molière," resembles a Highlander's horse, hard to catch, and not worth catching. They gave enigmatic names to the commonest things, which, to call by their proper appellations, was, as Molière terms it, du dernier bourgeois. When an "innocent accomplice of a falsehood" was mentioned, a Précieuse (they themselves adopted and gloried in this name: Molière only added ridicule, to turn the blow a little aside from the centre of the target at which he aimed) could, without a blush, understand that a night-cap was the subject of conversation; water with them was too vulgar unless dignified as celestial humidity; a thief could be mentioned when designated as an inconvenient hero; and a lover won his mistress's applause when he complained of her disdainful smile as "a sauce of pride."

Purity of feeling, however, was the soul of the system. Authors and poets were admitted as admirers; but they never got beyond the villa of Jolis Vers. When Voiture, who had glorified Julie d'Angennes his life long, ventured to kiss her hand, he was thrown from the fortifications of the castle of Petits Soins, and soused into the lake of Indifference. Even her noble admirer, the Duke of Montauzier, was forced to paddle on the river of Inclination for fourteen years, before he was admitted to the city of Tenderness, and allowed to make her his wife.

Their style of life was as eccentric as their talk. The lady rose in the morning, dressed herself with elegance, and then went to bed. The French bed, placed in an alcove, had a passage round it, called the ruelle; to be at the top of the ruelle was the post of honor; and Voiture, under the title of Alcoviist, long held this envied post beside the pillow of his adored Julie, while he never was allowed to touch her little finger. The folly had its accompanying good. The respect which the women exacted, and the virtue they preserved, exalted them, and, in spite of their high-flown sentiments and metaphysical conceits, wits did not disdain to "put a soul into the body of" nonsense. Rochefoucauld, Menage, Madame de Sevigné, Madame des Houillères, Balzac, Vaugelas, and others frequented the Hôtel de Rambouillet, and lent the aid of their talents to dignify their galimatias.

But it was too much for Molière, the honest comic poet, to bear. He perceived the whole of society infected—nobles and prelates, ladies and poets, marquises and lackeys, all wandered about the Pays de Tendre, lost in a very labyrinth of inextricable nonsense. They assumed fictitious names, they promulgated fictitious sentiments; they admired each other according as they best succeeded in being as unnatural as possible.

Molière, by a well-conceived comedy, the Précieuses Ridicules, stripped the scene and personages of their gilding in a moment. His fair Précieuses were the daughters of a bourgeois named Gorgibus, who quitted their homely names of Cathos and Madelon for Aminte and Polixene, dismissed their admirers for proposing to marry them, scolded their father for not possessing le bel air des choses, and are taken in by two valets, whom they believed to be nobles, who easily imitate the foppery and sentimentalism which these young ladies so much admire.

The success of the piece was complete. From that moment the Hôtel de Rambouillet talked sense. Menage says, "I was at the first representation of the Précieuses Ridicules of Molière, at the Petit Bourbon. Mademoiselle de Rambouillet, Madame De Grignan, M. Chapelain, and others, the select society of the Hôtel de Rambouillet, were there. The piece was acted with general applause; and, for my own part, I was so delighted that I saw at once the effect that it would produce. Leaving the theatre, I took M. Chapelain by the hand, and said, 'We have been used to approve all the follies so well and wittily satirized in this piece; but believe me, as St. Remy said to King Clovis, 'We must burn what we have adored, and adore what we have burnt.' It happened as I had predicted, and we gave up this bombastic nonsense from the time of the first representation."

A better victory could not have been gained by a comic poet. To it may be said to have been added another. While the précieuses yielded to the blow, unsophisticated minds enjoyed the wit. In the midst of the piece, an old man cried out suddenly from the pit, "Courage, Molière! this is true comedy!"

122. ORIGIN OF "THE SOCIETY OF ARTS," LONDON.

"To this society," says a well-informed contemporary, "some of the best artists have owed the most priceless of all services that can be rendered to men of genius at the onset of their career—appreciation on the part of an enlightened few, introduction under favorable auspices to the many."

The Society of Arts was established in 1754, chiefly by Mr. William Shipley, a drawing-master; but it was not until 1774 that the institution was fairly located in its own premises, built in handsome style by the Adamsons, in John Street, Adelphi, the object being denoted by the inscription upon the entablature of the pediment in the front of the mansion in these words: "Arts and Commerce promoted."

There are many interesting anecdotes of the early awards of this society. Thus, in 1758, Bacon, the sculptor, received for a small figure of Peace a reward of ten guineas; and the same artist gained the highest premium upon nine different occasions. In 1761, Nollekins received ten guineas for an alto-relievo of Jephtha's Vow; and, two years later, fifty guineas for a more important piece of sculpture. Flaxman, in 1768, gained for one of his earliest attempts a grant of ten guineas; and for another work, in 1771, he obtained the society's gold medal. Lawrence, at the early age of thirteen, received the reward of a silver-gilt palette, with five guineas, for his drawing in crayons of the Transfiguration; and the painter, in the height of his subsequent prosperity, was accustomed to speak of the impulse thus given to his love of art. In 1807, Sir William Ross, at the age of twelve, received the society's silver palette for a drawing of the death of Wat Tyler. Mr. Edwin Landseer gained a similar mark of approbation, in 1810, for an etching; and to Mr. Wyon was adjudged the gold medal, in 1818, for a medal die. But to artists there is a feature of still greater interest in the society's history. It was in its rooms that the first exhibition of paintings in England took place in 1760, which was continued with great success for some years.

Within about ninety years, the society has distributed more than £100,000 in premiums. The growth of forest-trees was one of its early objects of encouragement; and we find among the recipients of its gold medals the Dukes of Bedford and Beaufort, the Earls of Winterton, Upper Ossory, and Mansfield, and Dr. Watson, Bishop of Llandaff. Then came agriculture, chemistry, manufactures, and mechanics. In the latter, the society taught us, or at least aided those who did so, the manufacture of Turkey carpet, tapestry, weaving, and weaving to imitate the Marseilles and India quilting; also how to improve our spinning and lace making, our paper and our catgut for musical instruments, our straw bonnets and artificial flowers.

The colonies shared in the society's early encouragement. Potash and pearlsh were produced by its agent in North America; and it was busily engaged, just before the breaking out of the war of independence, in introducing the culture of the vine, the growth of silk-worms, and the manufacture of indigo and vegetable oils. But the rewards given to poor Bethnal Green and Spitalfields weavers, for useful inventions in their calling, illustrate, perhaps even better than any of the foregoing instances, the object of the society which so honorably distinguishes it from other associations, viz., its readiness to receive, examine, and reward every kind of useful invention that may be brought forward by those who have neither friends nor money to aid them in making their inventions known.

Nor must we forget Barry's grand series of paintings upon the society's large room, of which Dr. Johnson said, "There is a grasp of mind there which you will find nowhere else." Upon the walls, too, hang some fine portraits of the early presidents of the society, painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds.

123. BLUE STOCKING CLUB.

The celebrated Mrs. Montague was in habits of friendship with the first wits and scholars of the age, and was the reputed founder of the society known by the name of the "Blue Stocking Club." This association was formed on the liberal and meritorious principle of substituting the rational delights of conversation for the absurd and vapid frivolities of the card table. No particular attention was paid to her, but the conversation was general, cheerful, and unrestrained; far different from what is insinuated respecting the company by a satirist who accuses them of going "To barter praise for soup with Montague."

The name of this club is said to be derived from the following circumstances: One of the most distinguished characters in the early days of the society was Mr. Stillingfleet, who always wore blue stockings. His conversation was distinguished for brilliancy and vivacity, inasmuch that when, in his absence, the stock of general amusement appeared deficient, it was the common exclamation, "We can do nothing without the blue stockings." And thus was the appellation acquired, which is now become frequently in use for all learned and witty ladies.

124. BARLOW, HOPKINS, HUMPHRIES, AND TRUMBULL.

Literary associations, for joint authorship, have been common in America. The first one of which we read was established by "the Connecticut wits" at Hartford, and Joel Barlow, Dr. Hopkins, Colonel Humphries, and Trumbull, the author of McFingal, were members of it. They produced numerous essays on literary, moral, and political subjects, none of which attracted more applause than a series of papers in imitation of the Rolliad, (a popular English work, ascribed to Fox, Sheridan, and their associates,) entitled American Antiquities, and Extracts from the Anarchiad, originally printed in the New Haven Gazette for 1786 and 1787. These papers have never been collected, but they were republished from one end of the country to the other in the periodicals of the time, and were supposed to have had considerable influence on public taste and opinions, and, by the boldness of their satire, to have kept in abeyance the leaders of political disorganization and infidel philosophy.

125. ROBERT C. SANDS AND HIS FRIENDS.

One of the most interesting literary associations in the United States was formed by Robert C. Sands and three of his friends, under the name of the "Literary Confederacy." The number was limited to four; and they bound themselves to preserve a friendly communication in all the vicissitudes of life, and to endeavor, by all proper means, to advance their mutual and individual interest, to advise each other on every subject, and to receive with good temper the rebuke or admonition which might thus be given. They proposed to unite, from time to time, in literary publications, covenanting solemnly that no matter hostile to the great principles of religion or morals should be published by any member. This compact was most faithfully kept to the time of Sands's death, though the primary objects of it were gradually given up, as other duties engrossed the attention of its members. In the first year of its existence, the Confederacy contributed largely to several literary and critical gazettes, besides publishing in one of the daily papers of the city a series of essays under the title of the Amphilogist, and a second under that of the Neologist, which attracted much attention, and were very widely circulated, and republished in the newspapers of the day. Sands wrote a large portion of these, both in prose and verse.

§ 12. ORIGIN AND EARLY HISTORY.*

126. THIERS.

LOUIS ADOLPHE THIERS, one of the most eminent persons of the nineteenth century, and one of the most powerful orators of France, was born in Marseilles in 1797. His father was a blacksmith. In 1815, he repaired to Aix, to attend the lectures of the faculty of law in that town. There he devoted himself with fervor to the study of literature, philosophy, history, and politics. His ardent and ambitious spirit feeling a presentiment of a brilliant career, he began to play the rôle of a party leader among his fellow-students. He clamored, harangued against the government of the restoration, evoked the recollections of the republic and the empire, made himself disliked by the professors, execrated by the commissary of police, adored by his comrades, and carried off the prize of eloquence in spite of every obstacle.

There is an anecdote connected with this last fact sufficiently amusing to be related.

A prize had been offered for the best eulogium on Vauban, by the Academy of Aix, a good and peaceful academy, which, to make use of Voltaire's witticism, has always succeeded, like an honest woman, in keeping itself from being talked about. Thiers took it into his head to win this prize, and sent his manuscript. The production was deemed preëminently excellent; but unluckily, the name of the author was either divined or betrayed, and as there was no other candidate who deserved the palm, the worthy members of the areopagus, rather than award it to the little Jacobin, put off their decision to the following year.

At the appointed time, the manuscript of Thiers made its reappearance; but in the interim, a production had come from Paris which eclipsed all its competitors, and the judges hastened to crown it, according, however, to the paper presented by Thiers the humble favor of an accessit, or second best premium. The name of the Parisian victor was then unsealed; and great was the consternation of the academicians when it was found to be that of Thiers himself, who had indulged in the malicious pleasure of mystifying the learned gentlemen, by treating the subject in a new point of view, causing the composition to be copied in a strange hand, sending it on a journey from Aix to Paris, and from Paris to Aix, and thus obtaining the prize and the accessit.

127. SIR WILLIAM JONES.

The events of a man's life have frequently taken their first tinge from accident. On sitting one day near a pear-tree in the yard of the boarding-house at Harrow, where he was at school, some of the fruit fell off, and there was a general scramble of the boys that were near the tree for it. Poor young Jones had his thigh broke in the press, and was directly conveyed to bed, where he lay for a long time, and contracted a love of reading from the books that were brought to amuse him.

128. COBBETT.

Perhaps, in Cobbett's voluminous writings, there is nothing so complete as the following picture of his boyish scenes and recollections. It has been well compared to the most simple and touching passages in Richardson's Pamela.

"After living within a hundred yards of Westminster Hall, and the Abbey Church, and the bridge, and looking from my own window into St. James's Park, all other buildings and spots appeared mean and insignificant. I went to-day to see the house I formerly occupied. How small! It is always thus: the words large and small are carried about with us in our minds, and we forget real dimensions. The idea, such as it was received, remains during our absence from the object. When I returned to England, in 1800, after an absence from the country parts of it for sixteen years, the trees, the hedges, even the parks and woods, seemed so small! It made me laugh to hear little gutters, that I could jump over, called rivers. The Thames was but 'a creek.' But when, in about a month after my arrival in London, I went to Farnham, the place of my birth, what was my surprise! Every thing was become so pitifully small! I had to cross in my post chaise the long and dreary heath of Bagshot; then, at the end of it, to mount a hill called Hungry Hill; and from that hill I knew that I should look down into the beautiful and fertile vale of Farnham. My heart fluttered with impatience, mixed with a sort of fear, to see all the scenes of my childhood; for I had learned, before, the death of my father and mother. There is a hill not far from the town, called Crooksbury Hill, which rises up out of a flat in the form of a cone, and is planted with Scotch fir-trees. Here I used to take the eggs and young ones of crows and magpies. This hill was a famous object in the neighborhood. It served as the superlative degree of height. 'As high as Crooksbury Hill, meant with us the utmost degree of height. Therefore the first object my eyes sought was this hill. I could not believe my eyes! Literally speaking, I for a moment thought the famous hill removed, and a little heap put in its stead; for I had seen in New Brunswick a single rock, or hill of solid rock, ten times as big, and four or five times as high! The postboy, going down hill, and not a bad road, whisked me in a few minutes to the Bush Inn, from the garden of which I could see the prodigious sand hill where I had begun my gardening works. What a nothing! But now came rushing into my mind, all at once, my pretty little garden, my little blue smock-frock, my little nailed shoes, my pretty pigeons that I used to feed out of my hands, the last kind words and tears of my gentle, and tender-hearted, and affectionate mother. I hastened back into the room. If I had looked a moment longer, I should have dropped. When I came to reflect, what a change! What scenes I had gone through! How altered my state! I had dined the day before at a secretary of state's, in company with Mr. Pitt, and had been waited upon by men in gaudy liveries! I had had nobody to assist me in the world; no teachers of any sort; nobody to shelter me from the consequences of bad, and nobody to counsel me to good, behavior. I felt proud. The distinctions of rank, birth, and wealth, all became nothing in my eyes; and from that moment (less than a month after my arrival in England) I resolved never to bend before them."

Cobbett was, for a short time, a laborer in the kitchen grounds of the Royal Gardens at Kew. King George the Third often visited the gardens to inquire after the fruit and esculents; and one day, he saw here Cobbett, then a lad, who, with a few half pence in his pocket, and Swift's Tale of a Tub in his hand, had been so captivated by the wonders of the Royal Gardens, that he applied there for employment. The king, on perceiving the clownish boy, with his stockings tied about his legs by scarlet garters, inquired about him, and specially desired that he might be continued in his service.

§ 13. ENERGY, ENTHUSIASM, AND INDUSTRY.

129. GALLUS.

In Cicero, on Old Age, we find Cato admiring that Caius Sulpitius Gallus, who, when he sat down to write in the morning, was surprised by the evening, and when he took up his pen in the evening, was surprised by the appearance of the morning.

130. VOLUMINOUS AUTHORS.

Wickliffe was such a voluminous writer, that Lubinio Lepus, Bishop of Prague, burnt two hundred of his works, and after that a great many were left.

John Scotus, in addition to his public engagements, was a very hard student.

Clitomachus, of Carthage, wrote about four hundred books.

Antony Arnauld composed more than a hundred.

Lope de Vega said of himself, that he wrote five sheets a day on an average; which, reckoning the length of his life, amounted to one hundred and thirty-three thousand sheets!

131. LUTHER'S RULE.

It was a matter of astonishment to Europe that Luther, amid all his travels and active labors, could present so very perfect a translation of the whole Bible. But a single word explains it all. He had a rigid system of doing something every day. "Nulla dies," says he, in answer to the question how he did it, — "nulla dies sine versu." (Not a day without a verse.) And this soon brought him to the close of his Bible.

132. NEWMAN.

In 1643, Newman's Concordance, usually called the Cambridge Concordance, was published. He revised this book after he settled at Rehoboth, in America, using pine-knots to light him in the night, instead of candles.

133. MERCATOR AND MARINI.

Mercator, the celebrated geographer, found such delight in the ceaseless progression of his studies, that he never willingly quitted his maps to take the necessary refreshments of life.

"Invention," says D'Israeli, "depends on patience. Contemplate your subject long; it will gradually unfold, till a sort of electric spark convulses for a moment the brain, and spreads down to the very heart a glow of irritation. Then come the luxuries of genius! the true hour for production and composition; hours so delightful that I have spent twelve and fourteen hours successively at my writing-desk, and still been in a state of pleasure."

It is probable that the anecdote related of Marini, the Italian poet, is true: that he was once so absorbed in revising his Adonis, that he suffered his leg to be burnt for some time, without any sensibility.

134. BARTHIUS.

The pleasure authors experience is of a nature which, whenever certain unlucky circumstances combine, positively debarring them from publication, will not abate their ardor one jot; and their pen will still luxuriate in the forbidden page which even booksellers refuse to publish. Many instances might be recorded, but a very striking one is the case of Gaspar Barthius, whose Adversaria, in two volumes folio, are in the collections of the curious.

Barthius was born to literature, for Baillet has placed him among his "enfants celebre." At nine years of age he recited by heart all the comedies of Terence, without missing a line. The learned admired the puerile prodigy, while the prodigy was writing books before he had a beard. He became unquestionably a student of very extensive literature, modern as well as ancient. Such was his devotion to a literary life, that he retreated from the busy world. It appears that his early productions were composed more carefully and judiciously than his later ones, when the passion for voluminous writing broke out, which showed itself by the usual prognostic of this dangerous disease — extreme facility of composition, and a pride and exultation in this unhappy faculty. He studied without using collections or references, trusting to his memory, which was probably an extraordinary one, though it necessarily led him into many errors in that delicate task of animadverting on other authors. Writing a very neat hand, his first copy required no transcript; and he boasts that he rarely made a correction. Every thing was sent to the press in its first state. He laughed at Statius, who congratulated himself that he employed only two days in composing the epithalamium upon Stella, containing two hundred and seventy-eight hexameters. "This," says Barthius, "did not quite lay him open to Horace's censure of the man who made two hundred verses in an hour, 'stans pede in uno.' Not," adds Barthius, "but that I think the censure of Horace too hyperbolical; for I am not ignorant what it is to make a great number of verses in a short time, and in three days I translated into Latin the three first books of the Iliad, which amount to above two thousand verses." Thus rapidity and volume were the great enjoyments of this learned man's pen; and now we must look to the fruits.

Barthius, on the system he had adopted, seems to have written a whole library; a circumstance which we discover by the continual references he makes in his printed works to his manuscript productions. In the Index Auctorum to his Statius, he inserts his own name, to which is appended a long list of unprinted works, which Bayle thinks, by their titles and extracts, conveys a very advantageous notion of them. All these, and many such as these, he generously offered the world, would any bookseller be intrepid or courteous enough to usher them from his press; but their cowardice or incivility were intractable. The truth is now to be revealed, and seems not to have been known to Bayle. The booksellers had been formerly so cajoled and complimented by our learned author, and had heard so much of the celebrated Barthius, that they had caught at the bait, and the two folio volumes of the much-referred-to Adversaria of Barthius had thus been published; but, from that day, no bookseller ever offered himself to publish again!

The Adversaria is a collection of critical notes and quotations from ancient authors, with illustrations of their manners, customs, laws, and ceremonies. All these were to be classed into one hundred and eighty books, sixty of which we possess in two volumes folio, with eleven indexes. The plan was vast as the rapidity with which it was pursued. Bayle finely characterizes it by a single stroke: "Its immensity tires even the imagination." But the truth is, this mighty labor turned out to be a complete failure. There was neither order nor judgment in these masses of learning, — crude, obscure, and contradictory, — such as we might expect from a man who trusted to his memory, and would not throw away his time on any correction. His contradictions are flagrant. But one of his friends would apologize for these, by telling us that "he wrote every thing which offered itself to his imagination, to-day one thing, to-morrow another, in order that when he should revise it again, this contrariety of opinion might induce him to examine the subject more accurately." The notions of the friends of authors are as extravagant as those of their enemies. Barthius evidently wrote so much, that he often forgot what he had written, as happened to another great book-man, one Didymus, of whom Quintilian records, that on hearing a certain history, he treated it as utterly unworthy of credit; on which the teller called for one of Didymus's own books, and showed where he might read it at full length!

That the work failed, we have the evidence of Clement in his "Bibliothèque curieuse de Livres difficiles à trouver," under the article Barthius, where we discover the winding up of the history of this book. Clement mentions more than one edition of the Adversaria; but on a more careful inspection he detected that the old title-pages had been removed for others of a fresher date. The booksellers, not being able to sell the book, practised this deception. It availed little; they remained with their unsold edition of the two first volumes of the Adversaria, and the author with three thousand folio sheets in manuscript, while both parties complained together, and their heirs could acquire nothing from the works of an author of whom Bayle says, that "his writings rise to such a prodigious bulk, that one can scarce conceive a single man could be capable of executing so great a variety; perhaps no copying clerk, who lived to grow old amidst the dust of an office, ever transcribed as much as this author has written."

135. ABBE DE MAROLLES.

The Abbé de Marolles had great ardor as a man of letters, and was in the enjoyment of the leisure and opulence so necessary to carry on his pursuits, yet, from an entire absence of judgment, closed his life with the bitter regrets of a voluminous author. Yet it cannot be denied that he has contributed one precious volume to the public stock of literature; a compliment which cannot be paid to some who have enjoyed a higher reputation than our author. He has left us his very curious Memoirs. A poor writer, indeed; but the frankness and intrepidity of his character enable him, while he is painting himself, to paint man. His volumes were richly bound, and freely distributed; for they found no readers! After having plundered the classical geniuses of antiquity by his barbarous style, when he had nothing more left to do, he committed sacrilege in translating the Bible; but, in the midst of printing, he was suddenly stopped by authority for having inserted in his notes the reveries of the pre-Adamite Isaac Peyrere. He had already revelled on the New Testament, to his version of which he had prefixed so sensible an introduction, that it was afterwards translated into Latin.

Translation was the mania of the Abbé de Marolles. It is doubtful whether he ever fairly awoke out of the heavy dream of the felicity of his translations; for late in life we find him observing, "I have employed much time in study, and I have translated many books, considering this rather as an innocent amusement which I have chosen for my private life, than as things very necessary, although they are not entirely useless. Some have valued them, and others have cared little about them; but however it may be, I see nothing which obliges me to believe that they contain not at least as much good as bad, both for their own matter and the form which I have given to them." The notion he entertained of his translations was their closeness. He was not aware of his own spiritless style; and he imagined that poetry only consisted in the thoughts, not in the grace and harmony of verse. He insisted that, by giving the public his numerous translations, he was not vainly multiplying books, because he neither diminished nor increased their ideas in his faithful versions. He had a curious notion that some were more scrupulous than they ought to be respecting translations of authors who, living so many ages past, are rarely read from the difficulty of understanding them; and why should they imagine that a translation is injurious to them, or would occasion the utter neglect of the originals? "We do not think so highly of our own works," says the indefatigable and modest abbé; "but neither do I despair that they may be useful even to these scrupulous persons. I will not suppress the truth, while I am noticing these ungrateful labors; if they have given me much pain by my assiduity, they have repaid me by the fine things they have taught me, and by the opinion, which I have conceived, that posterity, more just than the present time, will award a more favorable judgment." Thus a miserable translator terminates his long labors by drawing his bill of fame on posterity, which his contemporaries will not pay; but, in these cases, as the bill is certainly lost before it reaches acceptance, why should we deprive the drawers of pleasing themselves with the ideal capital?

It is extremely amusing to detect the swarming fecundity of his pen. From year to year, with author after author, was this translator wearying others, but remained himself unwearied. Sometimes two or three classical victims in a season were dragged into his slaughter-house. Of about seventy works, fifty were versions of the classical writers of antiquity, accompanied with notes. But some odd circumstances happened to our extraordinary translator in the course of his life. De L'Etang, a critic of that day, in his Règles de bien traduire, drew all his examples of bad translation from our abbé, who was more angry than usual, and, among his circle, the cries of our Marsyas resounded. De L'Etang, who had done this not out of malice, but, from urgent necessity, to illustrate his principles, seemed very sorry, and was desirous of appeasing the angered translator. One day in Easter, finding the abbé in church at prayers, the critic fell on his knees by the side of the translator. It was an extraordinary moment, and a singular situation to terminate a literary quarrel. "You are angry with me," said L'Etang, "and I think you have reason; but this is a season of mercy, and I now ask your pardon."

"In the manner," replied the abbé, "which you have chosen, I can no longer defend myself. Go, sir! I pardon you."

Some days after, the abbé, again meeting L'Etang, reproached him with duping him out of a pardon, which he had no desire to have bestowed on him. The last reply of the critic was caustic: "Do not be so difficult; when one stands in need of a general pardon, one ought surely to grant a particular one."

136. MILTON.

The course of engagements adopted by Milton, after he was blind, is thus described by Dr. Johnson: "When he first rose, (which was at four in summer and five in winter,) he heard a chapter in the Hebrew Bible, and then studied till twelve; then took some exercise for an hour; then dined; then played on the organ and sung, or heard another sing; then studied to six; then entertained his visitors till eight; then supped, and, after a pipe of tobacco and a glass of water, went to bed."

137. PRYNNE'S HISTRIOMASTIX.

Prynne's Histriomastix, the Player's Scourge, or Actor's Tragiédi, is a ponderous quarto, ascending to about eleven hundred pages; a Puritan's invective against plays and players, accusing them of every kind of crime, including libels against church and state; but it is more remarkable for the incalculable quotations and references foaming over the margins. Prynne scarcely ventures on the most trivial opinion, without calling to his aid whatever had been said in all nations and in all ages; and Cicero and Master Snubbs, Petrarck and Minutius Felix, Isaiah and Froissart's Chronicles, oddly associate in the ravings of erudition. Who, indeed, but the author, "who seldom dined," could have quoted perhaps a thousand writers in one volume? A wit of the times remarked of this helluo librorum, "Nature makes ever the dullest beasts most laborious, and the greatest feeders;" and Prynne has been reproached with a weak digestion, for "returning things unaltered, which is a symptom of a feeble stomach."

When we examine this volume, often alluded to, the birth of the monster seems prodigious and mysterious; it combines two opposite qualities; it is so elaborate in its researches among the thousand authors quoted, that these required years to accumulate. Yet the matter is often temporary, and levelled at fugitive events and particular persons; and thus the very formation of this mighty volume seems paradoxical. The secret history of this book is as extraordinary as the book itself, and is a remarkable evidence how, in a work of immense erudition, the arts of a wily sage involved himself, and whoever was concerned in his book, in total ruin. The author was pilloried, fined, and imprisoned; his publisher condemned in the penalty of five hundred pounds, and barred forever from printing and selling books, and the licenser removed and punished. Such was the fatality attending the book of a man whose literary voracity produced one of the most tremendous indigestions, in a malady of writing.

Prynne was seven years in writing this work, and, what is almost incredible, it was nearly four years in passing through the press. During that interval, the eternal scribbler was daily gorging himself with voluminous food, and daily fattening his cooped-up capon.

138. FREDERIC THE GREAT.

The life of Frederic the Great of Prussia was one of the utmost regularity and activity. A more complete notion will be obtained of the management by which he contrived to make so much use of his time from the following interesting account of his daily occupations, which Dr. Towers, who has written a history of his reign, has collected from a variety of authorities:—

"It was his general custom to rise at five o'clock in the morning, and sometimes earlier. He commonly dressed his hair himself, and seldom employed more than two minutes for that purpose. After he was dressed, the adjutant of the first battalion of his guards brought him a list of all the persons that were arrived at Potsdam, or departed from thence, and an account of whatever had occurred in the garrison. When he had delivered his orders to this officer, he retired into an inner cabinet, where he employed himself in private till seven o'clock. He then went into another apartment, where he drank coffee or chocolate; and here he found upon the table all the letters, addressed to him from Potsdam, Berlin, or any other parts of his dominions. Foreign letters were placed upon a separate table. After reading all these letters he wrote hints or notes in the margin of those which his secretaries were to answer; and then, returning into the inner cabinet, carried with him such as he meant to write or dictate an answer to himself. Here he employed himself till nine o'clock with one of his private secretaries. He then returned back again into his former apartment, where he was attended by three secretaries, each of whom gave him an account of what he had done; after which the king delivered his orders to them, with the letters they were to answer. None of these answers, however, were sent off till they had been read, and many of them signed by the king. At ten o'clock the generals who were about his person, whom he was accustomed to send for in their turn, attended him to his closet, where he conversed with them on the news of the day, politics, tactics, and other subjects; and at this time he also gave audience to such persons as had received previous notice to attend. At eleven o'clock he mounted his horse and rode to the parade, where he reviewed and exercised his regiment of guards. He afterwards walked for some time in the garden, with his generals and the rest of the company whom he had invited to dine with him. At one o'clock he sat down to dinner, and his company generally consisted of the princes his brothers, some of his general officers, some of the officers of his regiment of guards, and one or two of his chamberlains. He had no carver, but did the honors of the table himself, like a private gentleman. After dinner he generally conversed with some of his guests for about a quarter of an hour, walking about the room. He then retired into his private apartment, making low bows to his company. He remained in private till five o'clock, when his reader waited on him. His reading lasted about two hours; and this was succeeded by a concert, in which he himself was a performer on the flute, and which lasted till nine. When the concert was over, he was attended by such wits or favorites as he had invited. With these he supped at half an hour after nine, and his company seldom consisted of more than eight persons, the king himself included. At twelve the king went to bed." The literary works of Frederic will be at least allowed to show great industry, when it is stated that they extend, in the most complete edition, to no fewer than twenty-five octavo volumes — quite a wonderful amount of authorship, certainly, for one who led so busy a life, and strikingly illustrative of what may be done by the economical employment even of the merest odds and ends of time; for, compared to the leisure which many a student enjoys, such must be considered the very few hours every day which were the utmost that Frederic could, by possibility, have given to study.

139. BURNET ON EDUCATION.

Many works have been published by authors in their early days which were badly written; and yet the same persons, at a later period, have produced some admirable compositions. Bishop Burnet wrote a work on education, very clumsily, when he was eighteen years of age; and yet his Life and Death of the Earl of Rochester is so excellent in its style, that Dr. Johnson recommends the critic to read it for its elegance. Swift, Dryden, Gibbon, and Johnson were something like the sun at his rising on a misty morning, rather obscure and unattractive in the commencement of their career.

Godeau, Bishop of Venice, used to say, that "to compose is an author's heaven; to correct, an author's purgatory; but to revise the press, an author's hell."

140. BAILLET.

The history of Baillet's Jugements des Sçavans sur les Principaux Ouvrages des Auteurs, or Decisions of the Learned on the Learned, is a remarkable instance how little the calculations of writers of research serve to ascertain the period of their projected labor. Baillet passed his life in the midst of the great library of the literary family of the Lamoignons, and, as an act of gratitude, arranged a classified catalogue in thirty-two folio volumes. It indicated not only what any author had professedly composed on any subject, but also marked those passages relative to the subject which other writers had touched on. By means of this catalogue, the philosophical patron of Baillet, at a single glance, discovered the great results of human knowledge on any subject of his inquiries. This catalogue, of equal novelty and curiosity, the learned came to study, and often transcribed its precious notices. Amid this world of books, the skill and labor of Baillet prompted him to collect the critical opinions of the learned, and, from the experience he had acquired in the progress of his colossal catalogue as a preliminary work, he sketched one of the most magnificent plans of literary history. This instructive project has been preserved by Monnoye in his edition. It consists of six large divisions, with innumerable subdivisions. It is a map of the human mind, and presents a view of the magnitude and variety of literature, which few can conceive. The project was too vast for an individual. It now occupies seven quartoes; yet it advanced no farther than the critics, translators, and poets, forming little more than the first, and a commencement of the second great division. To more important classes the laborious projector never reached.

141. KENNETT'S REGISTER.

Bishop Kennett's stupendous Register and Chronicle, vol. i., is one of those astonishing labors which could only have been produced by the pleasure of study, urged by the strong love of posterity. It is a diary in which the bishop, one of our most studious and active authors, has recorded every matter of fact "delivered in the words of the most authentic books, papers, and records." The design was to preserve our literary history from the Restoration. This silent labor he had been pursuing all his life, and published the first volume in his sixty-eighth year, the very year he died. But he was so sensible of the coyness of the public taste for what he calls, in a letter to a literary friend, "a tedious, heavy book," that he gave it away to the publisher. "The volume, too large, brings me no profit. In good truth, the scheme was laid for conscience" sake, to restore a good old principle, that history should be purely matter of fact, that every reader, by examining and comparing, may make out a history by his own judgment. I have collections transcribed for another volume, if the bookseller will run the hazard of printing."

This volume has never appeared, and the bookseller probably lost a considerable sum by the one published, which valuable volume is now procured with difficulty.

142. BUFFON'S LUXURY.

The pleasures of composition, in an ardent genius, were never so finely described as by Buffon. Speaking of the hours of composition, he said, "These are the most luxurious and delightful moments of life — moments which have often enticed me to pass fourteen hours at my desk in a state of transport. This gratification, more than glory, is my reward."

143. ROBERT HERON.

Robert Heron was a man of cultivated powers and unwearied industry, but loose in his morals, and corrupt in his principles. He commenced his career at Edinburgh as a writer for the booksellers, whom he soon disgusted by commonplace writing, without regard to truth or principle. About 1800, he went to London, and found a new set of employers, whom he soon overstocked with productions free from glaring faults, but unmarked by originality or profound views. Yet such was his industry, that, at one time, he conducted the British Press (morning) and the Globe (evening) newspapers, besides editing the Anti-Jacobin Review, the Agricultural Magazine, and a Sunday newspaper. Of course, intellect, spread over so much surface, was not very intense; and, though he exhausted his constitution, yet these employments were soon taken from him. His habits being extravagant, he involved himself in debts, which, when incurred, he had no prospect of paying. At length, having worn out his friends, as well as his constitution, which he supported by alternate doses of ether and opium, he applied to his countryman, Dr. Garthshore, who, unable to do any thing better for him, introduced him as an in-door patient of the Fever Institution in Gray's Inn Lane, where, after a few months, he died.

Among other proofs of his utter want of principle, he, on one occasion, wrote and published a critique on a performance at Drury Lane Theatre, containing some strictures, in the grossest language, on several of the players; but it turned out that, from some cause, the play for the evening was changed; and then, as his apology, he stated, that, if it had been performed, his strictures would have been true! Some of the players brought an action for so gross an abuse of criticism; but, finding that the writer was an insolvent, afterwards donned it.

144. SIR WALTER SCOTT'S LAST EFFORT.

At an advanced period of life, Sir Walter Scott, struck with misfortune, entered into an engagement to liquidate, by his literary exertions, a debt of one hundred and twenty-eight thousand pounds. Scott staked his character and reputation upon the fulfilment of his last engagement. He entered with characteristic ardor upon his task, and, amid the pressure of increasing age and infirmity, never lost sight of his anticipated reward.

In seven years, Scott had paid all but one sixth of his enormous load of debt. The prize was within view; independence seemed almost in his grasp; but he had overtaken his strength, and disease, soon to be followed by death, came, like an armed man, and closed the superhuman struggle. When will the annals of literature record such an instance of heroic determination, under such adverse circumstances, united to the highest creative genius, and crowned with such marvellous results?

§ 14. HABITS IN COMPOSING AND CORRECTING.

145. ISOCRATES, VIRGIL, AND CASSIUS.

The ancients were pertinacious in their corrections. Isocrates, it is said, was employed for ten years on one of his works; and, to appear natural, studied with the most refined art.

After a labor of eleven years, Virgil pronounced his Æneid imperfect.

Dio Cassius devoted twelve years to the composition of his history, and Diodorus Siculus, thirty.

There is a middle between velocity and torpidity. The Italians say, it is not necessary to be a stag, but we ought not to be a tortoise.

146. NOT SO BAD A FAULT.

An old French writer, more remarkable for originality of thought than for grace of style, was once reproached by a friend with the frequent repetitions to be found in his works. "Name them to me," said the author. The critic, with obliging precision, mentioned all the ideas which had most frequently recurred in the book. "I am satisfied," replied the honest author; "you remember my ideas. I repeated them so often on purpose to prevent you from forgetting them. Without my repetitions, I should never have succeeded."

147. SALMASIUS AND HOBBS.

Salmasius used to read and write in the company of his wife, and amidst the noise of his children, without inconvenience.

Hobbes was accustomed to shut himself up in profound quietness.

148. HOBBS'S LEVIATHAN.

Thomas Hobbes.

Aubrey has minutely preserved for us the manner in which Hobbes composed his Leviathan. It is very curious for literary students. "He walked much and contemplated; and he had in the head of his cane a pen and inkhorn, and carried always a note-book in his pocket; and as soon as a thought darted, he presently entered it into his book, or otherwise he might have lost it. He had drawn the design of the book into chapters, &c., and he knew whereabouts it would come in. Thus that book was made."

149. ECCENTRICITIES.

Among literary men, some have been eccentric in their method of composing and studying.

Des Cartes used to lie in bed, very frequently, for twelve or fourteen hours in the day, with the curtains drawn.

Thomson sometimes spent the whole day in bed.

Rousseau and Pope procured some of their best thoughts in bed.

Mezerai, the historian, always composed by candle light.

Much of this is folly. Nature has constituted human beings so similarly, that what is consistent with common sense, and suitable for one man, would be found adapted for all, if they would but accustom themselves to it. Eccentricities are not only productive of no advantages, but they are frequently the occasion of awkwardness and unpleasantness.

150. PASCAL, MILTON, SHEFFIELD, THUANUS, AND NEWTON.

Pascal subjected his letters to the inspection of the members of his college, and every advantageous alteration that was suggested was introduced. This method occasions much correctness, but it destroys the originality of the author's thoughts and style.

Sometimes Milton would dictate a certain number of lines, and then reduce them to one half the quantity.

Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, wrote an essay on satire, which was altered and amended so much, that at last, like the stocking of Aristotle, it became a new thing.

The commencement of the History of Thuanus is said to have cost the author an immense deal of labor.

Sir Isaac Newton informed Bishop Pearce that he had written his Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms sixteen times.

151. PASCAL.

When Pascal became warm in his celebrated controversy, he applied himself with incredible labor to the composition of his Provincial Letters. He was frequently occupied twenty days on a single letter. He recommenced some above seven or eight times, and by this means obtained that perfection which has made his work, as Voltaire says, one of the best books ever published in France.

The Quintus Curtius of Vaugelas occupied him thirty years; generally every period was translated in the margin five or six several ways. Chapelain and Conrart, who took the pains to review this work critically, were many times perplexed in the choice of passages; they generally liked best that which had been first composed.

152. BOSSUET.

Whenever Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, had to compose a funeral sermon, he read Homer in the original Greek, to raise his style of composition to the due elevation of his subject. "and I light my lamp," said he, "with the rays of the sun."

153. BALZAC.

Balzac, the first writer in French prose who gave majesty and harmony to a period, it is said, did not grudge to bestow a week on a page, and was never satisfied with his first thoughts.

154. MALEBRANCHE, HOBBS, THOMAS, AND BUFFON.

Some profound thinkers could not pursue the operations of their mind in the distraction of light and noise. Malebranche, Hobbes, Thomas, and others closed their curtains to concentrate their thoughts, as Milton says of the mind, "in the spacious circuits of her musing." A secluded and naked apartment, with nothing but a desk, a chair, and a single sheet of paper, was for fifty years the study of Buffon; the single ornament was a print of Newton placed before his eyes: nothing broke into the unity of his reveries.

155. EVELYN.

Evelyn, who has written treatises on several subjects, was occupied for years on them. His manner of arranging his materials and his mode of composition appear excellent. Having chosen a subject, he analyzed it into its various parts, under certain heads, or titles, to be filled up at leisure. Under these heads he set down his own thoughts as they occurred, occasionally inserting whatever was useful from his reading. When his collections were thus formed, he digested his own thoughts regularly, and strengthened them by authorities from ancient and modern authors, or alleged his reasons for dissenting from them. His collections in time became voluminous; but he then exercised that judgment which the formers of such collections usually are deficient in. With Hesiod he knew that "half is better than the whole," and it was his aim to express the quintessence of his reading, but not to give it in a crude state to the world; and when his treatises were sent to the press, they were not half the size of his collections.

156. FENELON AND GIBBON.

Voltaire tells us of Fenelon's Telemachus, that the amiable author composed it in his retirement in the short period of three months. Fenelon had, before this, formed his style, and his mind overflowed with all the spirit of the ancients. He opened a copious fountain, and there were not ten erasures in the original manuscript. The same facility accompanied Gibbon after the experience of his first volume.

157. INTELLIGIBILITY.

It would be well, both for the public and the writers themselves, if some authors would but adopt Lord Falkland's method, before publishing his works, who, when he doubted whether a word was perfectly intelligible or not, used to consult one of his lady's chambermaids, (not the waiting woman, because it was possible she might not be conversant in romances,) and by her judgment was guided whether to receive or reject it. Swift pursued, it is said, a like method of reading his works to the unlearned.

158. ROUSSEAU AND POPE.

Rousseau, who was full of enthusiasm, devoted to the subject of his thoughts the long, sleepless intervals of his nights, and meditating in bed, with his eyes closed, he turned over his periods, in a tumult of ideas; but when he rose and had dressed, all was vanished, and when he sat down to his papers, he had nothing to write. Thus genius has its vespers and its vigils, as well as its matins, which we have been so often told are the true hours of its inspiration; but every hour may be full of inspiration for him who knows to meditate. No man was more practised in this art of the mind than Pope, and even the night was not an unregarded portion of his poetical existence.

159. JOHNSON'S RAMBLER.

Is it not surprising, says Alexander Chalmers, that Boswell, the friend and companion of Johnson, who had obliged the public with the most perfect delineations ever exhibited of any human being, and who declared so often that he was determined "To lose no drop of that immortal man," — that one so inquisitive after the most trifling circumstance connected with Dr. Johnson's character and history, should have never heard or discovered that Dr. Johnson almost rewrote the Rambler after the first folio edition? Yet the fact was, that he employed the limæ laborem, not only on the second, but on the third edition, to an extent, I presume, never known in the annals of literature, and may be said to have carried Horace's rule far beyond either its letter or spirit: —

"Vos O
— carmen reprehendite, quod non
Multa dies et multa litura coercuit, atque, Perfectum decies non castigavit ad unguem."

"Never the verse approve and hold as good,
Till many a day and many a blot has wrought
The polished work, and chastened every thought,
By tenfold labor to perfection brought."

The alterations made by Dr. Johnson in the second and third editions of the Rambler far exceed six thousand; a number which may perhaps justify the use of the word rewrote, although it must not be taken in its literal acceptation.

He foresaw that upon this foundation his future fame would rest, and he determined that the superstructure thrown up in haste should be strengthened and perfected at leisure.

160. JOHNSON'S MANNER OF COMPOSING.

"Johnson's manner of composing," says Bishop Percy, "has not been rightly understood. He was so extremely short-sighted from the defect in his eyes, that writing was inconvenient to him; for whenever he wrote, he was obliged to hold the paper close to his face. He therefore never composed what we call a foul draft on paper of any thing he published, but used to revolve the subject in his mind, and turn and form every period, till he had brought the whole to the highest correctness and the most perfect arrangement. Then his uncommonly retentive memory enabled him to deliver a whole essay, properly finished, whenever it was called for. I have often heard him humming and forming periods in low whispers to himself, when shallow observers thought he was muttering prayers, &c. But Johnson is well known to have represented his own practice in the following passage in his Life of Pope: 'Of composition there are different methods. Some employ at once memory and invention, and, with little intermediate use of the pen, form and polish large masses by continued meditation, and write their productions only when, in their own opinion, they have completed them.'"

161. JOHNSON'S LIMÆ LABOR.

"The general opinion entertained by Dr. Johnson's friends," says Alexander Chalmers, "was, that he wrote as correctly and elegantly in haste, and under various obstructions of person and situation, as other men can who have health, ease, and leisure for the limæ labor. Mr. Boswell says, with great truth, that 'posterity will be astonished when they are told, upon the authority of Johnson himself, that many of these discourses, which we should suppose had been labored with all the slow attention of literary leisure, were written in haste, as the moment pressed, without even being read over by him before they were printed.' And Sir John Hawkins informs us, that these essays hardly ever underwent a revision before they went to the press; and adds, 'The original manuscripts of the Rambler have passed through my hands, and by the perusal of them I am warranted to say, as was said of Shakspeare, by the players of his time, that he never blotted a line.”

162. JOHNSON'S LIFE OF SAVAGE.

Johnson asserted, and valued himself upon it, that he wrote the Life of Savage in six and thirty hours. In one night he also composed, after finishing an evening at Holborn, his Hermit of Teneriffe. He sat up a whole night to compose the preface to the Preceptor.

163. MACAULAY AND GOLDSMITH ON DR. JOHNSON.

Macaulay, in his Review of Boswell's Johnson, says he wrote in a style in which no one ever made love, quarrelled, drove bargains, or even thinks. When he wrote for publication, “he did his sentences into Johnsonese.”

Goldsmith remarked to him, “If you were to write a fable about little fishes, doctor, you would make the little fishes to talk like whales.”

164. HUME, ROBERTSON, BURKE, JOHNSON, AND GIBBON.

The craft of authorship is by no means so easy of practice as is generally imagined by the thousands who aspire to its practice. Almost all our works, whether of knowledge or of fancy, have been the product of much intellectual exertion and study; or, as it is better expressed by the poet, —

“The well-ripened fruits of wise decay.”

Hume wrote his History of England on a sofa, but he went quietly on correcting every edition till his death. Every edition varies from the preceding. Robertson used to write out his sentences on small slips of paper; and, after rounding them and polishing them to his satisfaction, he entered them in a book, which in its turn, underwent considerable revision. Burke had all his principal works printed two or three times at a private press before submitting them to his publisher. Johnson and Gibbon were the least laborious in arranging their copy for the press. Gibbon sent the first and only manuscript of his stupendous work (the Decline and Fall) to his printer; and Johnson's high-sounding sentences were written almost without an effort. Both, however, lived and moved, as it were, in the world of letters, thinking or caring of little else — one in the heart of busy London, which he dearly loved, and the other in his silent retreat at Lausanne.

165. ST. PIERRE AND ROUSSEAU.

St. Pierre copied his Paul and Virginia nine times, that he might render it the more perfect. Rousseau was a very coxcomb in these matters: the amatory epistles, in his New Heloise, he wrote on fine gilded card-paper, and having folded, addressed, and sealed them, he opened and read them in the solitary woods of Clarens, with the mingled enthusiasm of an author and lover. Sheridan watched long and anxiously for bright thoughts, as the manuscript of his School for Scandal, in its various stages, proves.

166. WALPOLE.

“I wrote the Castle of Otranto,” says Horace Walpole, “in eight days, or rather eight nights; for my general hours of composition are from ten o'clock at night till two in the morning, when I am sure not to be disturbed by visitants. While I am writing I take several cups of coffee.”

167. PREPARING TO COMPOSE.

Some men have been accustomed to prepare themselves for thinking and writing by a bodily or a mental stimulus. Dr. Johnson used to take ardent spirits; but he prudently abandoned this practice.

Sheridan accustomed himself to strong tea and brandy, before he delivered a speech.

Newton, Hobbes, and many others smoked.

Cicero prepared himself for composing by reading some of the Greek poets.

Milton did the same.

Gay was accustomed to read some of the most poetical passages of Scripture.

168. THOMAS.

Thomas, an intense thinker, would sit for hours against a hedge, composing with a low voice, taking the same pinch of snuff for half an hour together, without being aware that it had long disappeared. When he quitted his apartment, after prolonging his studies there, a visible alteration was observed in his person, and the agitation of his recent thoughts was still traced in his air and manner.

169. THOMAS PAINE.

The popularity of Paine's writings resulted rather from accident than from any merit which they possessed; but his political essays made him famous for a day, and every one connected with the press became anxious to engage his services. Aitken, the publisher of the Pennsylvania Magazine, contracted with him to write a certain number of pages for each number of that periodical; but Paine's indolence was such that he could rarely procure his articles in season, and on one occasion he went to his lodgings and complained with severity of his not finishing articles in the proper time. Paine heard him patiently, and coolly answered, “You shall have them in time.” Aitken expressed some doubts on the subject, and insisted on Paine's accompanying him and proceeding immediately to business, as the workmen were waiting for copy. He accordingly went home with Aitken, and was soon seated at the table with the necessary apparatus, which always included a glass and a decanter of brandy. Aitken observed, “he would never write without that.” The first glass put him in a train of thinking; Aitken feared the second would disqualify him, or render him untractable; but it only illuminated his intellectual system; and when he had swallowed the third glass, he wrote with rapidity, intelligence, and precision; and his ideas appeared to flow faster than he could commit them to paper. What he penned from the inspiration of the brandy was perfectly fit for the press without any alteration or correction.

170. WAKEFIELD.

Gilbert Wakefield tells us that he wrote his own Memoirs (a large octavo) in six or eight days. It cost him nothing, and, what is very natural, is worth nothing. One might yawn scores of such books into existence; but who could be the wiser or the better?

171. LAIDLAW.

Mr. William Laidlaw, a man of genius, feeling, and taste, was greatly affected by composing. Such was the influence upon his own nerves, that he frequently paused and placed his hands on his temples, from excess of sympathy; so that we might say of his racked faculties much more truly than was said of Prior, after his converse with the literary and titled great,—

"—— Strained to the height
In that celestial colloquy sublime,
Dazzled and spent, sunk down and sought repair."

172. COLEMAN.

"It has been my habit," says Coleman, "to write chiefly at night; and when I have grown heated with my subject, it has so chilled my limbs, that I have gone to bed as if I had been sitting up to my knees ———"

§ 15. COMPLIMENTS, HONORS, AND POPULARITY.

173. DEMOSTHENES, RAYNAL, AND SPINOSA.

Demosthenes confessed he was pleased when even a fish-woman of Athens pointed him out.

At the presence of Raynal in the House of Commons, the speaker was requested to suspend the debate till that illustrious foreigner, who had written on the English Parliament, was there placed and distinguished to his honor.

Spinosa, when he gained a humble livelihood by grinding optical glasses, at an obscure village in Holland, was visited by the first general in Europe, who, for the sake of this philosophical conference, suspended his march.

174. MORE'S RISE AND DECLINE.

The enthusiasm which at first was caught by the readers of the works of the platonic Dr. Henry More is remarkable; but Henry More was himself an enthusiast; so necessary is it that there should be some reality in every great illusion, if we hope to create the sympathy of those around us. Time, however, has long cast into the shade the visionary pages of Henry More, and he seems himself to have survived that fame which he had once promised to himself. A gentleman, who had died beyond sea, left a legacy of three hundred pounds for the translation of Dr. Henry More's works. The task was cheerfully undertaken by the doctor himself; but when he had finished it, he was compelled to give the bookseller the three hundred pounds to print them.

175. MADAME DE SEVIGNE.

The intellectual acquirements of this lady are well known to every admirer of French literature; and her letters to her daughter, the Countess de Grignan, are regarded as the best models of epistolary composition. "One day," says Menage, "I had hold of one of Madame de Sevigné's hands betwixt mine. Upon drawing it away, M. Pelletier, who was present, said, 'Menage, with all your talents, that is the finest work that ever came from your hands.'"

176. PRIOR AND MILTON NOT APPRECIATED.

Contemporaries, says Walpole, are tolerable judges of temporary merit, but often most erroneous in their estimate of lasting fame. Burnet speaks of "our Prior;" and Whitlock of "one Milton, a blind man." Burnet and Whitlock were men of reputation themselves. But what say you of Heath, the obscure chronicler of the civil wars? He says, "One Milton, since stricken with blindness," wrote against Salmasius; and composed "an impudent and blasphemous book, called Iconoclastes."

177. RESPECT FOR FENELON.

When, after the taking of Bouchain in 1721, the estates of the see of Cambrai were exposed to the plunder of the troops, such was the respect that the Duke of Marlborough bore to the good Archbishop Fenelon, that he ordered a detachment to guard the magazines of corn at Château Cambresis, and gave a safe conduct for their conveyance to Cambrai; and when even this protection, in consequence of the scarcity of bread, was not likely to be respected by the soldiery, he sent a corps of dragoons with wagons, to transport the grain, and escort it to the precincts of the town. Thus did the most illustrious of generals pay homage to the Christian philosopher, who honored letters by his genius, religion by his piety, France by his renown, and human nature by his amiable virtues; and thus did he, in his conduct towards the author of Telemachus, imitate Alexander at the capture of Thebes, when, in the language of Milton,—

"The great Emathian conqueror bid spare
The house of Pindarus, when temple and tower Went to the ground."

178. FONTENELLE, HOBBS, CAMDEN, AND POCOCK.

Fontenelle was never more gratified than when a Swede, arriving at the gates of Paris, inquired of the custom-house officers where Fontenelle resided, and expressed his indignation that not one of them had ever heard of his name.

Hobbes expresses his proud delight that his portrait was sought after by foreigners, and that the Grand Duke of Tuscany made the philosopher the object of his first inquiries.

Camden was not insensible to the visits of German noblemen, who were desirous of seeing the British Pliny; and Pocock, while he received no aid from patronage at home for his Oriental studies, never relaxed in those unrequited labors, from the warm personal testimonies of learned foreigners, who hastened to see and converse with this prodigy of Eastern learning.

179. THE MOST ENTERTAINING OF AUTHORS.

Ten gentlemen of acknowledged taste, when on a visit to a gentleman of rank, were each desired to write out a list of the ten most interesting works they ever read. One work only found its way into every list: this was Gil Blas.

Had Dr. Johnson been present, and been previously heard on the subject, the preference would probably have been given to Don Quixote. The doctor used to say, that there were few books of which one could ever possibly arrive at the last page; and that there was never any thing written by mere man that was wished longer by its readers, excepting Don Quixote, Robinson Crusoe, and the Pilgrim's Progress. After Homer's Iliad, he said, the work of Cervantes was the greatest in the world as a book of entertainment; and when we consider that every other author's admirers are confined to his countrymen, and perhaps to the literary classes among them; while Don Quixote is a sort of common property, a universal classic, equally enjoyed by the court and the cottage; equally applauded in France and England as in Spain; quoted by every servant, the amusement of every age, from infancy to decrepitude; the first book you see in every shop, where books are sold, through all the states of Italy,—who can refuse his consent to an avowal of the superiority of Cervantes to all modern writers?

Shakspeare himself has, until within the last half century, been worshipped only at home; while translators and engravers live by the hero of La Mancha in every nation; and the walls of the miserable inns and the cottages, all over England, France, and Germany, are adorned with the exploits of Don Quixote.

180. THE RAMBLER.

When Dr. Johnson's Rambler was first published, the sale was very inconsiderable, and seldom exceeded five hundred. It is a remarkable and curious trait of the age, that the only paper which had a prosperous sale, and may be said to have been popular, was one which Dr. Johnson did not write. This was No. 97, which was said to have been written by Richardson.

181. DR. JOHNSON'S INTERVIEW WITH THE KING.

The king being informed that Dr. Johnson occasionally visited the Royal Library, gave orders that he should be informed when the doctor came thither again, that he might have the pleasure of conversation. This was done; and no sooner was the doctor seated, than the librarian went to communicate the intelligence to his majesty, who condescended immediately to repair to the spot. Johnson, on being told that the king was in the room, started up and stood still. The king, after the usual compliments, asked some questions about the libraries of Oxford, where the doctor had lately been, and inquired if he was then engaged in any literary undertaking. Johnson replied in the negative; adding that he had pretty well told the world what he knew, and must now read to acquire more knowledge. The king said, "I do not think that you borrow much from any body." Johnson said he thought he had done his part as a writer. "I should have thought so too," replied his majesty, "if you had not written so well." The king having observed that he must have read a great deal, Johnson answered that he thought more than he read; that he had read a great deal in the early part of his life, but having fallen into ill health, he had not been able to read much, compared with others; for instance, he said he had not read much compared with Dr. Warburton. On this, the king said he had heard that Dr. Warburton was a man of such general knowledge that you could scarcely talk with him upon any subject on which he was not qualified to speak; and that his learning resembled Garrick's acting, in its universality.

His majesty then talked of the controversy between Warburton and Lowth, and asked Johnson what he thought of it. Johnson answered, "Warburton has more general, more scholastic learning; Lowth is the most correct scholar. I do not know which of them calls names best." The king was pleased to say he was of the same opinion; adding, "You do not think, then, Dr. Johnson, that there was much argument in the case?" Johnson said he did not think there was. "Why, truly," said the king, "when once it comes to calling names, argument is pretty well at an end."

His majesty then asked him what he thought of Lord Lyttleton's History. It was then just published. Johnson said he thought his style pretty good, but that he had blamed Henry too much. "Why," said the king, "they seldom do these things by halves." "No, sir," answered Johnson, "not to kings;" but fearing to be misunderstood, he subjoined, "that for those who spoke worse of kings than they deserved, he could find no excuse; but that he could most easily conceive how some might speak better of them than they deserved, without any ill intention; for, as kings had much in their power to give those who were favored by them, authors would frequently, from gratitude, exaggerate their praises; and, as this proceeded from a good motive, it could be excused."

The king then asked him what he thought of Dr. Hill. Johnson answered, that he was an ingenious man, but had no veracity; and immediately mentioned, as an instance of it, an assertion of that writer, that he had seen objects magnified to a much greater degree, by using three or four microscopes at a time, than by using one. "Now," added Johnson, "every one acquainted with microscopes knows that the more of them he looks through, the less the object will appear." "Why," replied the king, "this is not only telling an untruth, but telling it clumsily; for if that be the case, every one who can look through a microscope will be able to detect him." But that he might not leave an unfavorable impression against an absent man, the doctor added, that Dr. Hill was, notwithstanding, a very curious observer; and if he would have been contented to tell the world no more than he knew, he might have been a very considerable man, and needed not to have recourse to such mean expedients to raise his reputation. The king then talked of literary journals, mentioned particularly the Journal des Savans, and asked Dr. Johnson if it was well done. Johnson said it was formerly well done; and gave some account of the persons who began and carried it on for some years, enlarging at the same time on the nature and utility of such works. The king asked him if it was well done now.

Johnson answered, he had no reason to think it was. The king next inquired if there were any other literary journals published in this kingdom, except the Monthly and Critical Reviews; and, on being answered there was no other, his majesty asked which was the best. Johnson said that the Monthly Review was done with most care, the Critical upon the best principles; adding that the authors of the former were hostile to the church. This the king said he was sorry to hear.

The conversation next turned on the Philosophical Transactions; when Johnson observed, that the Royal Society had now a better method of arranging their materials than formerly. "Ay," said the king, "they are obliged to Dr. Johnson for that;" for his majesty remembered a circumstance which Johnson himself had forgotten. His majesty next expressed a desire to have the literary biography of the country ably executed, and proposed to the doctor to undertake it; and with this wish, so graciously expressed, Johnson readily complied.

During this interview, the doctor talked with profound respect; but still in his firm manner, with a sonorous voice, and never in that subdued tone which is common at the levees and drawing-room. Afterwards he observed to Mr. Barnard, the librarian, "Sir, they may talk of the king as they will, but he is the finest gentleman I have ever seen." And he also observed at another time to Mr. Layton, "Sir, his manners are those of as fine a gentleman as we may suppose Louis XIV. or Charles II. to have been."

182. MRS. THRALE'S VERSES.

Mrs. Thrale's poetical description of Dr. Johnson's character is well worth preserving, though somewhat hyperbolic and exaggerated. The circumstances which gave rise to them are thus described by herself: When Mr. Thrale built the new library at Streatham, and hung up over the books the portraits of his favorite friends, that of Dr. Johnson was last finished, and closed the number. It was almost impossible not to make verses on such an accidental combination of circumstances; so I made the following ones:—

"Gigantic in knowledge, in virtue, in strength,
Our company closes with JOHNSON at length;
So the Greaks from the cavern of Polypheme passed,
When, wisest and greatest, Ulysses came last.
To his comrades contemptuous, we see him look down
On their wit and their worth with a general frown;
Since from Science' proud tree the rich fruit he receives,
Who could shake the whole trunk while they turned a few leaves.
His plety pure, his morality nice —
Protector of virtue, and terror of vice;
In these features religion's firm champion displayed,
Shall make infidels fear for a modern crusade.
While the inflammable temper, the positive tongue,
Too conscious of right for endurance of wrong,
We suffer from Johnson, contented to find
That some notice we gain from so noble a mind,
And pardon our hurts, since so often we've found
The balm of instruction poured into the wound.
'Tis thus for its virtues the chemists extol
Pure rectified spirit, sublime alcohol;
Some noxious putrescence, preservative pure,
A cordial in health, and in sickness a cure;
But exposed to the sun, taking fire at his rays,
Burns bright to the bottom, and ends in a blaze."

183. SUBLIME AND BEAUTIFUL.

Barry, the eminent painter, on the exhibition of a production of genius, was denied the gratification he sought as his only reward, by a general doubt whether he could be the producer of the picture he claimed, as he had never been known as an artist. He burst into tears, and left the room. Burke sought him out, and it was at this interview (says the editor of the Sun) that Barry quoted the Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful, then just published anonymously. Burke sneered at it as a slight and unsubstantial performance, and the fiery artist was almost ready to eat his new friend for speaking thus of it. He commended it in the warmest language he could command, and Burke, smiling, then acknowledged himself the author. "Are you?" cried the artist: "I could not afford to buy the work, and transcribed it every line with my own hand," at the same time pulling the manuscript from his pocket.

184. DR. BEATTIE AND GEORGE III.

Tuesday, 24th August, 1773, I set out, says Dr. Beattie, for Dr. Majendie's at Kew Green. The doctor told me that he had not seen the king yesterday, but had left a note in writing, to intimate that I was to be at his house to-day; and that one of the king's pages had come to him this morning, to say that his majesty would see me a little after twelve. At twelve the doctor and I went to the king's house at Kew. We had been only a few minutes in the hall, when the king and queen came in from an airing; and as they passed through the hall, the king called me by my name, and asked how long it was since I came from town. I answered him, "About an hour." "I shall see you," said he, "in a little while." The doctor and I waited a considerable time, (for the king was busy,) and then we were called into a large room, furnished as a library, where the king was walking about, and the queen sitting in a chair. We were received in the most gracious manner possible by both their majesties. I had the honor of a conversation with them (nobody else being present but Dr. Majendie) for upwards of an hour, on a great variety of topics; in which both the king and the queen joined, with a degree of cheerfulness, affability, and ease, that was to me surprising, and soon dissipated the embarrassment which I felt at the beginning of the conference. They both complimented me in the highest terms on my Essay, which they said was a book they always kept by them; and the king said he had one copy of it at Kew, and another in town, and immediately went and took it down from the shelf. I found it was the second edition. "I never stole a book but once," said his majesty, "and that was yours," speaking to me. "I stole it from the queen, to give it to Lord Hertford to read." He had heard that the sale of Hume's Essays had failed since my book was published; and I told him what Mr. Strahan had told me in regard to that matter. He had even heard of my being at Edinburgh last summer, and how Mr. Hume was offended on the score of my book. He asked many questions about the second part of the Essay, and when it would be ready for the press. I gave him, in a short speech, an account of the plan of it, and said my health was so precarious, I could not tell when it might be ready, as I had many books to consult before I could finish it; but that, if my health was good, I thought I might bring it to a conclusion in two or three years. He asked me how long I had been in composing my Essay, praised the caution with which it was written, and said that he did not wonder that it had employed me five or six years. He asked about my poems. I said there was only one poem of my own on which I set any value, (meaning the Minstrel;) and that it was published about the same time with the Essay. My other poems, I said, were incorrect, being but juvenile pieces, and of little consequence, even in my own opinion. We had much conversation on moral subjects; from which both their majesties let it appear, that they were warm friends to Christianity.

185. THOMAS PAINE'S POLITICAL WRITINGS.

In 1791, Thomas Paine, a Norfolk stay-maker, a Sussex exciseman, an American patriot, and subsequently a political and personal friend of Mr. Burke, entered the lists as an opponent of the new principles of that gentleman, published in his Reflections on the French Revolution, in a pamphlet which he called The Rights of Man. A work by the author of the famous pamphlet called Common Sense, excited general expectation; and, in a few months, the Rights of Man passed through many large editions. It was then printed in a cheap form; and, within a year, at least two hundred thousand copies were sold by the autumn of 1792. Mr. Paine was now encouraged to write a second part of his Rights of Man, which became even more popular than the first; and, previously to their suppression by proclamation and prosecution, it is known that above a million of copies of both parts were sold. The bookseller with whom Mr. Paine engaged was Mr. Joseph Johnson, in St. Paul's Church-yard, who confided the sale to an agent, and this agent, after the prosecution commenced, refused to account for the proceeds, defying legal proceedings. At this period, another political writer one day challenged Mr. Paine on the unparalleled popularity of his works. "I write political pamphlets also," says he, "but they fall dead from the press, though their principles are the same; while whatever you write enjoys instant celebrity." "The reason is plain," said Paine: "if I were to cut my shoe lengthwise, and present one half to an American savage, he would be unable to tell what it was; but, if I had shown him a whole shoe, he would comprehend its uses in a moment. Just so it is with your writings and mine: you give the world half the truth, and I give them the whole: they don't understand you, but what I write comes home to their souls and feelings."

186. PETER PARLEY.

Daniel Webster, says the Newburyport Herald, after his return from Europe, asked a friend to guess whose were the American names better and more universally known and admired in England than all the other American names put together. His friend answered, Washington and Chief Justice Marshall. No, said Mr. Webster, I mean living persons; and they are Judge Story and Peter Parley; for while the former is known to every lawyer in England, and generally among the educated classes, the latter has entire possession of the young hearts of Old England—that whenever he went into an English family, and the children were brought in and presented to him as Mr. Webster, an American gentleman, they would be sure, with scarcely a single exception, to approach him, and looking him in the face, with the utmost anxiety expressed in theirs, would say, "Do you know Peter Parley?"

§ 16. PATRONAGE AND REMUNERATION.

187. RICHELIEU AND THE POLYGLOTIST.

We have heard of travellers getting authors to write their books of travels, and getting engravers to draw imaginary scenes for their embellishment: we have also heard of ladies, who could not sew, getting seamstresses to work beautiful needlework for them, which they exhibited as their own. But all this impudence is nothing to that of the famous Cardinal Richelieu. A man of great learning, called Le Jay, compiled a French Polyglot Bible in ten volumes folio, and having spent his fortune in its composition, he applied to the cardinal, then prime minister of France, for assistance to bring out his work. To this application the cardinal replied, that if his name were put on the title-page as author, he would then furnish means; but the noble Le Jay rejected the insolent offer, and submitted to poverty rather than lose the justly acquired honors of so great an undertaking.

188. J. J. ROUSSEAU.

Among other persons of literary eminence who were pensioned by George III., in the early part of his reign, was the celebrated Rousseau; but his majesty, on making the grant, insisted that the matter should not be made public; which was intended as a peculiar mark of respect for that wayward and extraordinary character. The philosopher of Geneva, however, after having gratefully accepted the favor, and returned his thanks for the manner in which it was bestowed, returned it on quarrelling with his friend, David Hume. He did this, however, in a manner which plainly indicated a desire to keep the grant, provided he was courted to it; but having once declined the royal bounty, it was not thought proper to make the monarch a suppliant to an adventurer.

Madame de Staël, in her extravagant panegyric on Rousseau, has most absurdly praised him for refusing a pension from the King of England, without, however, stating the particulars of the story, or noticing the excessive meanness of her hero, who actually endeavored to get the pension renewed when it was too late. Rousseau, however, bore testimony to the virtues of his majesty. "It is not," said he, "the great monarch whom I reverence, but the good husband, the good father, the virtuous, the benevolent man."

189. PATRONAGE OF AUTHORS.

In the reigns of William III., of Anne, and of George I., even such men as Congreve and Addison could scarcely have been able to live like gentlemen by the mere sale of their writings. But the deficiency of the natural demand for literature was, at the close of the seventeenth and at the beginning of the eighteenth centuries, more than made up by the artificial encouragement — by a vast system of bounties and premiums. There was, perhaps, never a time at which the rewards of literary merit were so splendid; at which men who could write well found such easy admittance into the most distinguished society, and to the highest honors of the state. The chiefs of both the great parties into which the kingdom was divided patronized literature with emulous munificence.

Congreve, when he had scarcely attained his majority, was rewarded for his first comedy with places which made him independent for life. Rowe was not only poet laureate, but land surveyor of the customs in the port of London, clerk of the council to the Prince of Wales, and secretary of the presentations to the lord chancellor. Hughes was secretary to the commissioners of the peace. Ambrose Phillips was judge of the prerogative court in Ireland. Locke was commissioner of appeals and of the board of trade. Newton was master of the mint. Stepney and Prior were employed in embassies of high dignity and importance. Gay, who commenced life as apprentice to a silk mercer, became a secretary of legation at five and twenty. It was to a poem on the death of Charles II., and to the City and Country Mouse, that Montague owed his introduction into public life, his earldom, his garter, and his auditorship of the Exchequer. Swift, but for the unconquerable prejudice of the queen, would have been a bishop. Oxford, with his white staff in his hand, passed through the crowd of his suitors to welcome Parnell, when that ingenious writer deserted the whigs. Steele was a commissioner of stamps, and a member of Parliament. Arthur Mainwaring was a commissioner of the customs, and auditor of the imprest. Tickell was secretary to the lords justices of Ireland. Addison was secretary of state.

But soon after the succession of the throne of Hanover, a change took place. The supreme power passed to a man who cared little for poetry or eloquence. Walpole paid little attention to books, and felt little respect for authors. One of the coarse jokes of his friend, Sir Charles Hanbury Williams, was far more pleasing to him than Thomson's Seasons or Richardson's Pamela.

190. SHUCKFORD AND PRIDEAUX'S WORKS.

The Historical Connection of the Old and New Testament, by Shuckford, is reported to have been seldom inquired after for about a twelvemonth's time. However, it made a shift, though not without some difficulty, to creep up to a second edition, and afterwards even to a third.

And, which is another remarkable instance, the manuscript of Dr. Prideaux's Connection is well known to have been bandied about, from hand to hand, among several, at least five or six, of the most eminent booksellers, during the space of at least two years, to no purpose, none of them undertaking to print that excellent work. It lay in obscurity till Archdeacon Echard, the author's friend, strongly recommended it to Tonson. It was purchased, and the publication was very successful.

191. LINNÆUS AND MABLY.

Linnaeus sold his works for a single ducat. The Abbé Mably, the author of many political and moral works, preserved the dignity of the literary character; for, while he lived on little, he would accept only a few presentation copies from the booksellers.

192. SMITH RELIEVED BY BENSON.

About the year 1735, a pamphlet was published entitled the Cure of Deism. The author, Mr. Elisha Smith, had the misfortune to be confined in the Fleet Prison for a debt of two hundred pounds. Fortunately for him, Mr. Benson, then auditor of the imprest, was much pleased with the work. He inquired who was the author; and, on learning his circumstances, not only sent him a very flattering letter, but discharged the whole debt, fees, &c., and set him at liberty. This was the same Mr. Benson who erected a monument in Westminster Abbey to the memory of Milton, and who gave one thousand pounds to Mr. Dobson, of New College, for translating Paradise Lost into Latin. He always preferred Johnson's Latin Psalms to Buchanan's. It was in allusion to these facts that Pope dragged Mr. Benson into the Dunciad.

"On two unequal crutches propped he came,
Milton on this, on that one Johnson's name."

193. JOHNSON ON SCOTCH WRITERS.

It was an annual custom for Dr. Johnson's bookseller to invite his authors to dine with him; and it was on such an occasion that Dr. Johnson and Dr. Rose, of Chiswick, met, when a dispute began on the preëminence of English and Scotch writers. In the course of conversation, Warburton's name was mentioned; when Dr. Rose observed, "What a proud, imperious man he was!" Dr. Johnson answered, —

"Sir, so he was; but he possessed more learning than has been imported from Scotland since the days of Buchanan."

Dr. Rose, after enumerating several Scotch authors, said, "What think you of David Hume, sir?"

"He was a deistical, scribbling fellow," was the answer.

"Well, be it so; but what think you of Lord Bute?"

Johnson. — I did not know that he ever wrote any thing.

Rose. — No! I think he has written one line that has outdone any thing that Shakspeare, or Milton, or any one else ever wrote.

Johnson. — Pray, what was that, sir?

Rose. — It was when he wrote an order for your pension, sir.

Johnson, who was quite confounded, exclaimed, "Why, that was a very fine line, to be sure, sir."

194. EVELINA, BIOGRAPHY OF THE POETS, AND VYSE'S SPELLING BOOK.

Evelina produced five guineas from the nig trader. Dr. Johnson fixed the price of his Biography of the Poets at two hundred guineas, and Mr. Malone observes, "The booksellers, in the course of twenty-five years, have probably got five thousand." It is, perhaps, useful to record, that, while the compositions of genius are but slightly remunerated, though sometimes as productive as "the household stuff" of literature, the latter is rewarded with princely magnificence. At the sale of the Robinsons, the copyright of Vyse's Spelling Book was sold at the enormous price of twenty-two thousand pounds, with an annuity of fifty guineas to the author.

195. DR. JOHNSON.

In the second year of his reign, his majesty granted a pension to Dr. Johnson of three hundred pounds a year, it having been represented to his majesty that he was a very learned and good man, without any certain provision. The Earl of Bute, then prime minister, announced this instance of his sovereign's bounty to the doctor, who, it is said, felt some hesitation in accepting it, after the definitions he had given in his Dictionary of pension and pensioner. Lord Bute, at the time of presenting him with it, expressly said to him, "It is not given you for any thing you are to do; but for what you have done."

196. BLAIR'S SERMONS.

Dr. Blair transmitted the manuscript of his first volume of sermons to Mr. Strahan, the king's printer, who, after keeping it for some time, wrote a letter to him, discouraging the publication. Such, at first, was the unpropitious state of one of the most successful theological books that has ever appeared. Mr. Strahan, however, had sent one of the sermons to Dr. Johnson for his opinion; and after his unfavorable letter to Dr. Blair had been sent off, he received from Johnson, on Christmas Eve, 1776, a note in which was the following paragraph: "I have read over Dr. Blair's first sermon with more than approbation; to say it is good, is to say too little." Mr. Strahan had, very soon after this time, a conversation with Dr. Johnson concerning them; and then he very candidly wrote again to Dr. Blair, enclosing Johnson's note, and agreeing to purchase the volume, for which he and Mr. Cadell gave one hundred pounds. The sale was so rapid and extensive, and the approbation of the public so high, that the proprietors made Dr. Blair a present, first of one sum, and afterwards of another, of fifty pounds; thus voluntarily doubling the stipulated price. And when he prepared another volume, they gave him at once three hundred pounds; and for the others he had six hundred pounds each. A fifth volume was prepared by him for the press, and published after his death, (1801,) to which is added a Short Account of his Life, by James Finlayson, D. D. The sermons contained in this last volume were composed at very different periods of his life; but were all written out anew in his own hand, and in many parts recomposed, during the course of the summer of 1800, after he had completed his eighty-second year.

197. DR. PALEY.

When Dr. Paley had finished his Moral Philosophy, the manuscript was offered to Mr. Faulder, of Bond Street, for one hundred guineas; but he declined the risk of publishing it on his own account. When it was published, and the success of the work had been in some degree ascertained, the author again offered it to the same bookseller for three hundred pounds; but he refused to give more than two hundred and fifty. While this negotiation was pending, a bookseller from Carlisle, happening to call on an eminent publisher in Paternoster Row, was commissioned by him to offer Dr. Paley one thousand pounds for the copyright of his work. The bookseller, on his return to Carlisle, duly executed his commission, which was communicated without delay to the Bishop of Clonfert, who, being at that time in London, had undertaken the management of the affair. "Never did I suffer so much anxious fear," said Dr. Paley, in relating this circumstance, "as on this occasion, lest my friend should have concluded the bargain with Mr. Faulder before my letter could reach him." Luckily, he had not; but, on receiving the letter, went immediately to Bond Street, and made his new demand. Mr. Faulder, though in no small degree surprised and astonished at the advance, agreed for the sum required before the bishop left the house.

198. HANNAH MORE.

"I know not," said Mrs. H. More, "whether my writings have promoted the spiritual welfare of my readers, but they have enabled me to do good by private charity and public beneficence. I am almost ashamed to say that they have brought me thirty thousand pounds."

199. WORKS OF DR. CHALMERS.

The copyright of Dr. Chalmers's works, including his life and letters, to be published by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, together with some additional volumes of sermons, and a commentary on the Bible, was sold for between fifty and sixty thousand dollars.

There are but few authors in America that ever realized any thing like such a sum as this for their productions. English publishers pay a much higher price for copyrights than is paid in America.

200. WEBSTER'S COPYRIGHTS.

Noah Webster probably got more for his Spelling Book than was ever paid for any other book in the United States. We are unable to state the entire sum that was paid him for the copyright of that little book, but think it must have been more than fifty thousand dollars. His large Dictionary, a work on which he spent the greatest part of his life, never yielded him a tenth part of the profits of his Spelling Book.

201. PATRONAGE OF LITERATURE.

When Victor Hugo was an aspirant for the honors of the French Academy, and called on M. Royer Collard to ask his vote, the sturdy veteran professed entire ignorance of his name. "I am the author of Notre Dame de Paris, Les Derniers Jours d'un Condamné, Bug-Jargal, Marian Delorme, &c." "I never heard of any of them," said Collard. "Will you do me the honor of accepting a copy of my works?" said Victor Hugo. "I never read new books," was the cutting reply.

§ 17. INFLUENCE.

202. EPICURUS, MACHIAVEL, AND OTHERS.

When Epicurus published his doctrines, men immediately began to express themselves with freedom on the established religion; the dark and fearful superstitions of paganism fell into neglect, and mouldered away—the inevitable fate of established falsehood. When Machiavel, living amidst the principalities of Italy, where stratagem and assassination were the politics of those wretched rivals, by lifting the veil from these cabinets of banditti, that calumniated man of genius alarmed the world by exposing a system subversive of all human virtue and happiness, and led the way to political freedom.

When Locke and Montesquieu appeared, the old systems of government were reviewed; the principles of legislation were developed; and many changes have succeeded, and are still to succeed.

Paley would not close his eyes on what was passing before him; and he has observed, that during the convulsive troubles at Geneva, the political theory of Rousseau was prevalent in their contests; while in the political disputes of our country, those ideas of civil authority displayed in the works of Locke recurred in every form.

203. WICKLIFFE.

Turner has thus observed on the character of Wickliffe: "To complete our idea of the importance of Wickliffe, it is only necessary to add, that as his writings made John Huss the reformer of Bohemia, so the writings of John Huss led Martin Luther to be the reformer of Germany; so extensive and so incalculable are the consequences which sometimes follow from human actions."

Our historian has accompanied this by giving the very feelings of Luther, in early life, on his first perusal of the works of John Huss; we see the spark of creation caught at the moment—a striking influence of the generation of character. Thus a father spirit has many sons; and several of the great revolutions in the history of man have been opened by such, and carried on by that secret creation of minds visibly operating on human affairs.

204. ROGER ASCHAM.

Before the reign of Henry VIII., great authors composed occasionally a book in Latin, which none but other great authors cared for, and which the people could not read. In the reign of Elizabeth, Roger Ascham appeared—one of those men of genius born to create a new era in the history of their nation. The first English author who may be regarded as the founder of our prose style was Roger Ascham, the venerable parent of our native literature.

At a time when our scholars affected to condemn the vernacular idiom, and in their Latin works were losing their better fame, that of being understood by all their countrymen, Ascham boldly avowed the design of setting an example, in his own words, to speak as the common people, to think as wise men. His pristine English is still forcible without pedantry, and still beautiful without ornament. The illustrious Bacon condescended to follow this new example, in the most popular of his works. This change in our literature was like a revelation; these men taught us our language in books.

205. EVELYN'S SYLVA.

House of Evelyn at Deptford.

"While Britain," says D'Israeli, "retains her awful situation among the nations of Europe, the Sylva of Evelyn will endure with her triumphant oaks. In the third edition of that work, the heart of the patriot exults at its result. He tells Charles I. 'how many millions of timber-trees, besides infinite others, have been propagated and planted at the instigation, and by the sole direction, of this work.'"

"It was an author in his studious retreat, who, casting a prophetic eye on the age we live in, secured the late victories of our naval sovereignty. Inquire at the Admiralty how the fleets of Nelson were constructed, and they can tell you that it was with the oaks which the genius of Evelyn planted."

206. INFLUENCE OF RAY, ROUSSEAU, AND OTHERS.

The naturalist Ray, though no man was more modest in his claims, delighted to tell a friend that "since the publication of his catalogue of Cambridge Plants, many were prompted to botanical studies, and to herbalize in their walks in the fields."

A work in France, under the title of L'Ami des

Hommes, first spread there a general passion for agricultural pursuits; and although the national ardor carried all to excess, yet marshes were drained and waste lands enclosed.

The Emilius of Rousseau, whatever errors and extravagances a system which would bring us back to nature may contain, operated a complete revolution in modern Europe, by changing the education of men; and the boldness and novelty of some of its principles communicated a new spring to the human intellect.

The commercial world owes to two retired philosophers, in the solitude of their study, Locke and Smith, those principles which dignify trade into a liberal pursuit, and connect it with the happiness of a people.

Beccaria, who dared to raise his voice in favor of humanity against the prejudices of many centuries, by his work on Crimes and Punishments, at length abolished torture; and Locke and Voltaire, on Toleration, have long made us tolerant.

307. ROUSSEAU AND NAPOLEON.

In Girardin's Memoirs it is said that when Bonaparte was first consul, he visited the tomb of Rousseau. "It had been better," said he, "for the repose of France if this man had never lived." He was asked the reason. He replied, "He it was who prepared the French revolution." Girardin remarked, "It surely is not for you, Citizen Consul, to complain of the revolution." "Eh bien," replied he, "the future will learn that it would have been better for the repose of the world, if neither Rousseau nor I had ever existed."

308. RESPONSIBILITY OF AUTHORS IN RUSSIA.

What the Russians think of authors may be collected from a plate, in which part of hell is represented. In the foreground are suspended two kettles; in one of them is a robber, in the other a bad writer. Under the kettle of the latter the devil is busily engaged in making a rousing fire, whereas under the bandit there is nothing but a heap of dry wood, and he seems to be enjoying a comfortable warmth. The author, who has lifted up the lid of his kettle a little, casting an envious glance at the robber, complains to the devil that he torments him more than so vile a criminal; but the devil fetches him a thump on the head, and says, "Thou wert worse than he, for his sins and misdeeds died with him, but thine continue to live for ages."

§ 18. WIT AND HUMOR.

309. SIR WALTER RALEIGH.

His pipe often furnished Raleigh with an opening for displaying his ready wit to the queen. One day he was conversing on the singular properties of the new herb.

"I can assure your majesty," said he, "that I have so well experienced the nature of it, that I can exactly tell even the weight of the smoke in any quantity I consume."

"I doubt it much, Sir Walter," replied Elizabeth, thinking only of the impracticability of weighing smoke in a balance, "and will wager you twenty angels that you do not solve my doubt."

A quantity was agreed upon to be thoroughly smoked. Carefully preserving the ashes, Raleigh weighed these with great exactness, and what was deficient of the original weight, he gave as the result.

"Your majesty," said he "cannot deny that the difference hath been evaporated in smoke."

"Truly I cannot," answered the queen. Then turning to those around her, who had been amused by Raleigh's calculations, she continued, in allusion to the alchemists, then very numerous, "Many laborers in the fire have I heard of who turned their gold into smoke, but Raleigh is the first who has turned smoke into gold."

310. VOLTAIRE AND ST. ANGE.

M. de St. Ange, translator of the Metamorphoses of Ovid, was noted for a certain languishing and mawkish air in his conversation and deportment. Having been, like every other member of the literary world, to pay his respects to Voltaire, and being ambitious of concluding his visit with some stroke of genius, said, twirling his hat prettily between his thumbs, "I am only come to-day, sir, to see Homer; another day I shall come to see Euripides and Sophocles; afterwards Tacitus, and then Lucian." "Sir," answered Voltaire, "I am very old; could you not make all the visits at once?"

311. BROWN AND HIS LADY.

The celebrated Dr. Brown (Sir William Brown, of London) paid his addresses to a lady for many years, but unsuccessfully, during which time he had always accustomed himself to propose her health, whenever he was called upon for a lady. But being observed one evening to omit it, a gentleman reminded him that he had forgotten to toast his favorite lady. "Why, indeed," said the doctor, "I find it all in vain; I have toasted her so many years, and cannot make her Brown, that I am determined to toast her no longer."

312. JOHNSON AND THE LADY.

said she, "if I could write like you, I should be always writing, merely for the pleasure of it." "Pray, madam," retorted he, "do you think that Leander swam across the Hellespont merely because he was fond of swimming?"

313. JOHNSON AND THE WAITER.

Dr. Johnson happening to sit in a coffee-room where a dog was very troublesome, he bade the waiter kick him out; but, in the hurry of business, he forgot it. The dog continuing to pester him, he told the waiter again to kick the dog out, or he would kick him out. "Sir," said a young coxcomb,

"I perceive you are not fond of dogs." "No," said the doctor, "nor of puppies, either."

214. SHERIDAN AND THE HEIR.

A numerous party was assembled at the mansion of a northern squire. Among them were Sheridan and a young, wealthy heir, belonging to a neighboring county. This youth prided himself on the accident of his birth, and on his consequent acquisition of riches. During the early part of the day, the stripling sneered at poverty, and spoke alightingly of authors, actors, and other classes of the community who afford occupation and amusement to thousands who would otherwise be devoured by ennui, or seek excitement in vicious pleasures. Sheridan was justly displeased at the want of tact, taste, and feeling in the rich young man, and waited for an opportunity of making him feel the edge of his keen rebuke. At dinner were twenty guests. Sheridan sat on the left hand, at the bottom of the table; the youth on the right, at the top; so that they were at opposite angles; and the whole party were so placed as to witness and hear what passed from either of them. The youth talked much of all that concerned him. He gave accounts of the wonderful leaping of his favorite hunter, of the distance his new double-barrelled gun killed a wild duck, of the extraordinary stanchness of a cross-bred setter, of his dexterity in catching a salmon with a single hair, of his prowess in London, &c., &c., to the number of eighteen different circumstances. After the removal of the second course, silence ensued. Sheridan availed himself of the moment, and thus addressed the youth, his voice insuring a continuation of the prevailing silence: "Sir, from the distance at which I sit from you, I did not hear with accuracy the whole of your interesting anecdotes. Permit me to ask you whose hunter performed those extraordinary leaps." The youth replied, "Mine, sir." Sheridan continued, "But whose gun killed so far?" Again the youth answered, "Mine, sir." "Whose setter was so stanch?" "Mine, sir," repeated the victim. "Who caught the salmon, sir?" "I did," was faintly answered. Sheridan was inexorable, and continued, with the utmost politeness of manner, until he had exhausted the whole eighteen items, and then dryly said, "So you were the chief actor in every anecdote, and the author of them all. Is it not impolitic to despise your own professions?" The youth left the mansion on the following day, and was cured of his illiberality and egotism.

215. TOOKE AND SHERIDAN.

"Shortly after," says Mr. Tooke, "I had published my two pairs of portraits of two fathers and two sons, (those of Pitt and Fox,) I met Sheridan, who said, with a saucy, satirical air, 'So, sir, you are the reverend gentleman, I am told, who sometimes amuses himself in drawing portraits.' 'Yes, sir, I am that gentleman; and if you will do me the favor of sitting to me for yours, I will take it so faithfully that even you yourself shall shudder at it.'"

216. TOOKE BEFORE THE COMMISSIONERS.

When Horne Tooke was called before the commissioners, to give an account of the particulars of his income, having answered a question which was asked, one of the wise men said, peevishly, that he did not understand his answer. "Then," said Tooke, "as you have not half the understanding of another man, you ought, at least, to have double the patience."

217. TOOKE AND THE FOREIGNER.

Horne Tooke, on being asked, by a foreigner of distinction, how much treason an Englishman might venture to write, without being hanged, replied that "he could not inform him just yet, but that he was trying."

218. SIDNEY SMITH AND LANDSEER.

The Rev. Sidney Smith was notoriously one of the greatest wits in England. A friend once sent him a note, requesting him to sit for his portrait to Landseer, the great animal painter. Sidney wrote back, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?"

219. SIDNEY SMITH AND BROUGHAM'S CARRIAGE.

On this witty clergyman's observing Lord Brougham's one-horse carriage, he remarked to a friend, alluding to the B surrounded by a coronet on the panel, "There goes a carriage with a B outside and a wasp within."

220. HOOK AND HIS FRIEND.

Theodore Hook met a friend, just after leaving the King's Bench Prison, who said to him that he was getting fat. "Yes," replied Hook, "I was enlarged to-day."

§ 19. PECULIARITIES AND ECCENTRICITIES.

221. BURNET'S ABSENCE OF MIND.

Bishop Burnet was famous for that absence of thought which constitutes the character of what the French call tétu. It happened that at Paris, about the year 1680, several ladies of quality were imprisoned on suspicion of poisoning, and among the rest the Countess of Soissons, niece of Cardinal Mazarin, and mother of the famous Prince Eugene of Savoy. In the latter end of Queen Anne's reign, when the prince came over to England, Bishop Burnet, whose curiosity was as eager as that of any woman in the kingdom, begged of the Duke of Marlborough that he might have the satisfaction of being in company with a person whose fame resounded throughout Europe. The duke complied with his request, on condition that he would be upon his guard against saying any thing that might give disgust. Accordingly, he was invited to dine with the prince, and other company, at Marlborough House. The bishop, mindful of the caution he had received, resolved to sit silent during the entertainment, and might have kept his resolution, had not Prince Eugene, seeing him a dignified clergyman, taken it in his head to ask who he was. He no sooner understood that it was Dr. Burnet, of whom he had often heard, than he addressed himself to the bishop, and, among other questions, asked when he was last at Paris. Burnet, fluttered by this unexpected address, and still more perplexed by an eager desire to give satisfaction, answered with precipitation, that he could not recollect the year, but it was at the time when the Countess of Soissons was imprisoned. He had scarcely pronounced the words, when, his eyes meeting those of the duke, he instantly perceived his blunder, and was deprived of all the discretion he had left. He redoubled his error by asking pardon of his highness. He stared wildly around, and seeing the whole company embarrassed, and out of countenance, retired in the utmost confusion.

The same bishop dining one day with Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, the conversation turned upon the ingratitude of the government to the great man, her husband, who was then deprived of his places. Burnet, aptly enough, compared the duke to Belisarius; when her grace asked what was the principal occasion of his misfortune and downfall. "O madam," said Burnet, "poor Belisarius had a sad brimstone of a wife!"

222. ROUSSEAU AND HIS FRIEND'S WINE.

If Jean Jacques Rousseau was not qualified at times for a lodging in Bedlam, it would be difficult to account for many parts of his conduct and his writings. An anecdote related in Helen Williams's Letters from France, will perhaps decide the matter.

At a friend's house, Rousseau praised the wine; his friend sent him fifty bottles. Rousseau felt himself offended; but as the present was offered by an old friend, he condescended to accept ten bottles, and returned the rest. A short time after, he invited his friend, with his family, to supper. When they arrived, they found Rousseau very busy turning the spit. "How extraordinary it is," exclaimed his friend, "to see the first genius in Europe employed in turning a spit!" "Why," answered Rousseau, with great simplicity, "if I were not to turn the spit, you would certainly lose your supper. My wife is gone to buy a salad, and the spit must be turned." At supper, Rousseau produced, for the first time, the wine which his friend had sent him; but no sooner had he tasted it, than he suddenly put the glass from his lips, exclaiming, with the most violent emotion, that it was not the same sort of wine he had drank at his friend's house, who, he perceived, had a design to poison him. In vain did the gentleman protest his innocence; Rousseau's imagination, once possessed by this idea, —

"Displaced the mirth, broke the good meeting
With most admired disorder."

His friend was immediately obliged to retire, and they never met again.

223. STEELE'S SERVANTS.

Sir Richard Steele having one day invited to his house a great number of persons of the first quality, they were surprised at the number of liveries which surrounded the table; and after dinner, when wine and mirth had set them free from the observation of rigid ceremony, one of them inquired of Sir Richard how such an extensive train of domestics could be consistent with his fortune. Sir Richard very frankly confessed that they were fellows of whom he would very willingly be rid; and being then asked why he did not discharge them, he declared that "they were bailiffs, who had introduced themselves with an execution, and whom, since he could not send them away, he had thought it convenient to embellish with liveries, that they might do him credit while they staid." His friends were diverted by the expedient, and, by paying the debt, discharged their attendance; having obliged Sir Richard to promise that they should never again find him graced with a retinue of the same kind.

224. REV. ALEXANDER NAUGHLEY.

The village of Threlkeld, in Cumberland, a curacy, was once in the possession of a clergyman remarkable for the oddity of his character. This gentleman, by name Alexander Naughley, was a native of Scotland. The curé in his time was very poor — only eight pounds sixteen shillings yearly; but, as he lived the life of a Diogenes, it was enough. His dress was mean, and even beggarly; he lived alone, without a servant to do the meanest drudgery for him; his victuals he cooked himself, not very elegantly we may suppose; his bed was straw, with only two blankets. But with all these outward marks of a sloven, few men possessed greater genius; his wit was ready, his satire keen and undaunted, and his learning extensive; add to this, that he was a facetious and agreeable companion; and, though generally fond of the deepest retirement, would unbend among company, and become the chief promoter of mirth. He had an excellent library, and, at his death, left behind him several manuscripts, on various subjects, and of very great merit. These consisted of a Treatise on Algebra, Conic Sections, Spherical Trigonometry, and other mathematical pieces. He had written some poetry, but most of this he destroyed before his death. His other productions would have shared the same fate, had they not been kept from him by a person to whom he had intrusted them. The state they were found in is scarcely less extraordinary than his other oddities; being written upon sixty loose sheets, tied together with a shoemaker's waxed thread.

225. JOHNSON'S DRESS.

"Dr. Johnson's best dress was," says Miss Reynolds, "in his early times, so very mean, that one afternoon, as he was following some ladies up stairs, on a visit to a lady of fashion, (Miss Cotterel,) the servant, not knowing him, suddenly seized him by the shoulder, and exclaimed, 'Where are you going?' striving at the same time to drag him back; but a gentleman, who was a few steps behind, prevented her from doing or saying more, and Mr. Johnson growled all the way up stairs, as well he might. He seemed much chagrined and discomposed. Unluckily, whilst in this humor, a lady of high rank happening to call upon Miss Cotterel, he was most violently offended with her for not introducing him to her ladyship, and still more so for her seeming to show more attention to her than to him. After sitting some time silent, meditating how to down Miss Cotterel, he addressed himself to Mr. Reynolds, who sat next him, and, after a few introductory words, with a loud voice said, 'I wonder which of us two could get most money at his trade in one week, were he to work hard at it from morning till night.' I don't remember the answer; but I know that the lady, rising soon after, went away without knowing what trade they were of. She might probably suspect Mr. Johnson to be a poor author by his dress, and because the trade of neither a blacksmith, a porter, or a chairman, which she probably would have taken him for in the street, was quite so suitable to the place she saw him in. This incident he used to mention with great glee — how he had downed Miss Cotterel, though at the same time he professed a great friendship and esteem for that lady."

226. JOHNSON'S ROUGHNESS.

That Dr. Johnson was of a rough, unaccommodating disposition, the following anecdote evinces: One evening, in company, he was displaying the misery of human life, and maintaining that no one, in whatever situation, could be happy in this world; when an old maiden lady, remarkable for her cheerfulness and resignation, observed, "I must be allowed, sir, to differ from you, for, thank Heaven, I am extremely happy." "Madam, 'tis impossible," cried Johnson, sternly, "for you are old, and ugly, and sickly, and poor."

227. JOHNSON AND STEELE.

Johnson used to bite his nails to the quick — an intimation of his dogmatism and crustiness.

Steele constantly preached economy to others, but forgot to practise it himself. He was always in debt, and once pulled the nose of an acquaintance who hesitated to lend him a large sum of money.

228. JOHNSON AT THE TEA TABLE.

"At the tea table," says Mr. Cumberland, "Johnson had considerable demands upon his favorite beverage, and I remember when Sir Joshua Reynolds, at my house, reminded him that he had drank eleven cups, he replied, 'Sir, I did not count your glasses of wine; why should you number up my cups of tea?' And then laughing, in perfect good humor, he added, 'Sir, I should have released the lady from any further trouble, if it had not been for your remark; but you have reminded me that I want one of a dozen, and I must request Mrs. Cumberland to round up my number.' When he saw the readiness and complacency with which my wife obeyed his call, he turned a kind and cheerful look upon her, and said, 'Madam. I must tell you, for your comfort, you have escaped much better than a certain lady did a while ago, upon whose patience I intruded greatly more than I have done on yours; but the lady asked me for no other purpose than to make a zany of me, and set me gabbling to a parcel of people I knew nothing of; so, madam. I had my revenge of her; for I swallowed five and twenty cups of the tea, and did not treat her with as many words.'"

229. BURMANN AND COUNT MARSIGLI.

The Dutch literati are not famous for politeness. Count Marsigli, an Austrian general, famous for his writings, once went to pay a visit to Peter Burmann, professor at Leyden, who was much addicted to the pleasures of the table. The count unluckily chose just the moment when the professor was at dinner. "Ego sum Comes Marsiglius," (I am Count Marsigli,) said he; to which the learned Dutchman replied, "Et ego sum Petrus Burmannus qui cum prandeo neminem videt." (And I am Peter Burmann, who, while eating his dinner, sees nobody.)

230. HARVEST DISAPPOINTED OF MARRIAGE.

Rev. Dr. George Harvest was once on the eve of being married to the bishop's daughter, when, having gone a gudgeon fishing, he forgot the circumstance, and overstayed the canonical hour, which so offended the lady that she indignantly broke off the match. If a beggar happened to take off his hat to him in the streets, in hopes of receiving alms, he would make him a bow, tell him he was his most humble servant, and walk on. He was known sometimes on Sundays to forget the days on which he was to officiate, and would walk into church with his gun under his arm, to ascertain what the people wanted there. Once, when he was playing at backgammon, he poured out a glass of wine, and, it being his turn to throw, having the box in one hand and the glass in the other, and, being extremely dry, he swallowed down both the dice, and discharged the wine upon the dice-board.

231. REV. GEORGE HARVEST

The Rev. George Harvest, author of an elaborate Treatise on Subscription to Articles of Faith, and a volume of excellent sermons, was a most extraordinary character. A friend and he walking together in the Temple Gardens one evening, previous to the meeting of the club called the Beefsteak Club, in Ivy Lane, to which they were going, and to which Smollet, Johnson, and others belonged, Mr. Harvest picked up a small pebble, of so odd a make that he said he would present it to Lord Bute, who was an eminent virtuoso. After they had walked some time, his friend asked him what o'clock it was; to which, pulling out his watch, he answered, that they had seven minutes good. Accordingly they took a turn or two more, when, to his friend's astonishment, he threw his watch into the Thames, and, with great sedateness, put the pebble into his fob.

Mr. Harvest, being once in company with Mr. Onslow in a boat, began to read a favorite Greek author with such strange theatrical gestures, that his wig fell into the water; and so impatient was he to get it, that he jumped into the river to fetch it out, and was with difficulty fished out himself.

232. MASON'S FORGETFULNESS.

William Mason, Esq., author of the Spiritual Treasury, while engaged in that work, was called upon by a gentleman on business. Instead of taking his name and address, as desired, and as he thought he had done, he wrote the chapter and verse on which he had been meditating; and when he came afterwards to look at the paper, in order to wait upon the gentleman, he found nothing upon it but "Acts the second, verse the eighth," so much was his mind absorbed in divine things.

233. ADAM SMITH'S ABSENCE OF MIND.

This distinguished philosopher was remarkable for absence of mind. As an anecdote of this peculiarity, it is related of him, that having, one Sunday morning, walked into his garden at Kirkaldy, dressed in little more than his night-gown, he gradually fell into a reverie, from which he did not awaken till he found himself in the streets of Dunfermline, a town at least twelve miles off. He had in reality trudged along the king's highway all that distance in the pursuit of a certain train of ideas, and he was only eventually stopped in his progress by the bells of Dunfermline, which happened at the time to be ringing the people to church. His appearance in a crowded church, on a Scotch Sunday morning, without clothes, is left to the imagination of the reader.

234. CHURCHILL ON WARBURTON.

The various and opposite studies of Warburton appeared in his rocket writings, whether they streamed in the Divine Legation, or sparkled in the Origin of Romances, or played about in giving double senses to Virgil, Pope, and Shakspeare. Churchill, with a good deal of ill nature and some truth, describes them thus:—

"A curate first, he read and read,
And laid in—while he should have fed
The souls of his neglected flock—
Of reading such a mighty stock,
That he o'ercharged the weary brain
With more than she could well contain;
More than she was with spirit fraught
To turn and methodize to thought;

*And which, like ill-digested food,
To humors turned, and not to blood."*

The opinion of Bentley, when he saw the Divine Legation, was a sensible one. "This man," said he, "has a monstrous appetite, with a very bad digestion."

235. EDGEWORTH'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

Richard Edgeworth, the literary father of the celebrated Maria Edgeworth, was eccentric, and he had a sort of autobiographical history, which he seldom failed to give to every new acquaintance at the first introduction. It ran thus: "Now, sir, you know the great Mr. Edgeworth, and you may possibly wish to know something of his birth, parentage, and education. I shall first give you my reasons for being an Englishman, and then for being an Irishman, and I shall leave you your choice to call me which you please. I was born in England; I married two English wives; I have several children who were born in England; and I have a small property in England. Now my reasons for being an Irishman. I married three Irish wives; I have a large estate in Ireland; I have a number of Irish children; my progenitors were Irish; and I have lived most of my life in Ireland. Sir, I am a man who despises vulgar prejudice; for two of my wives are alive, and two, who are dead, were sisters."

236. GOETHE.

The first literary efforts of Goethe, though displaying an original and creative genius, were disfigured by some peculiarities; and he not only affected singularity in his style of writing and tone of conversation, but also in his external appearance. He sought in his writings to exhibit involved periods, and to retrench vowels at the end of almost every phrase, recurring to signs significant of exclamation or repose, and calculated to excite either meditation or enthusiasm. A crowd of imitators seized on the weaknesses of a man of genius, and copied them servilely. It became the fashion at Weimar to express one's sentiments in an emphatic manner, and to deform every period with hyphens or marks of exclamation. The very physicians changed the usual methods of making out their prescriptions, to suit them to the new fashion.

When Goethe saw how his weaknesses were imitated, he shook off those singularities into which his ardent imaginations had betrayed him, and rose to that rank in literature which left him few imitators.

237. CHARACTER OF HAZLITT.

A gentleman who had become personally acquainted with Hazlitt gives the following account of him in a letter to Mr. Wedgwood: "William Hazlitt is a thinking, observant, original man; of great power as a painter of character portraits, and far more in the manner of the old painters than any living artist. But the objects must be before him; he has no imaginative memory. So much for his intellects. His manners are ninety-nine in one hundred singularly repulsive, brow-hanging, shoe-contemplating, strange. Sharp seemed to like him; but Sharp saw him only for half an hour, and that walking. He is, I verily believe, kindly-natured; is very fond of, attentive to, and patient with, children; but he is jealous, gloomy, and of an irritable pride. With all this, there is much good in him. He is disinterested; an enthusiastic lover of the great men who have been before us. He says things of his own in a way of his own; and though, from habitual shyness, and, at least, the outside bearskin of misanthropy, he is strangely confused and dark in his conversation, and delivers himself of almost all his conceptions with a forceps, yet he says more than any man I ever knew (you yourself only excepted) of that which is his own; and oftentimes, when he has wearied his mind, and the juice is come out and spread over his spirits, he will gallop for half an hour together with real eloquence. He sends well-feathered thoughts straight forward to the mark with a twang of the bowstring. If you could recommend him as a portrait painter, I should be glad. To be your companion, he is, in my opinion, utterly unfit. His own health is fitful."

238. EVERY-DAY LIFE OF JAMES SMITH.

James Smith.

One of the authors of the Rejected Addresses thus writes to a friend: *—

"Let me enlighten you as to the general disposal of my time. I breakfast at nine, with a mind undisturbed by matters of business; I then write to you or to some editor, and then read till three o'clock. I then walk to the Union Club, read the journals, hear Lord John Russell deified or diablerized, (that word is not a bad coinage,) do the same with Sir Robert Peel or the Duke of Wellington, and then join a knot of conversationists by the fire till six o'clock, consisting of lawyers, merchants, members of Parliament, and gentlemen at large. We then and there discuss the three per cent. consols, (some of us preferring Dutch two and a half per cent.,) and speculate upon the probable rise, shape, and cost of the New Exchange. If Lady Harrington happens to drive past our window in her landau, we compare her equipage to the Algerine ambassadors, and, when politics happen to be discussed, rally whigs, radicals, and conservatives alternately, but never seriously—such subjects having a tendency to create acrimony. At six, the room begins to be deserted; wherefore I adjourn to the dining-room, and, gravely looking over the bill of fare, exclaim to the waiter, 'Haunch of mutton and apple tart.' These viands despatched, with the accompanying liquids and water, I mount upward to the library, take a book and my seat in the arm-chair, and read till nine; then call for a cup of coffee and a biscuit, resuming my books till eleven; afterwards return home to bed. If I have any book here which particularly excites my attention, I place my lamp on a table by my bedside, and read in bed until twelve. No danger of ignition, my lamp being quite safe, and my curtains moreen. 'Thus ends this strange, eventful history.'"

239. SOME OF SIR WALTER SCOTT'S CHARACTERISTICS.

A writer of a Transatlantic Tour, published in the Christian Observer, gives a very interesting account of his visit to Abbotsford, the celebrated residence of the "wizard of the north," in the course of which, describing the library, he says, —

"But by far the most interesting object is the bust of Scott himself, by Chantrey. 'There he stands,' said my conductress, 'just as if he were going to speak to you.' It is considered an admirable likeness—the only faithful one, indeed—of Scott, such as he was in animated conversation. The finest portraiture of him, at such times, that words could give, has been supplied by Mr. Adolphus, a keen observer of Scott's person and manner, as well as a most accomplished critic of his writings. 'His eyes were wonderfully calculated for showing great varieties of emotion. Their mournful aspect was extremely earnest and affecting; and when he told some dismal and mysterious story, they had a doubtful, melancholy, exploring look, which appealed irresistibly to the hearer's imagination. Occasionally, when he spoke of something very audacious and eccentric, they would dilate and light up with a tragic-comic, hairbrained expression, quite peculiar to himself; one might see in it a whole chapter of Cœur de Lion and the clerk of Copmanhurst. Never, perhaps, did a man go through all the gradations of laughter with such complete enjoyment, and a countenance so radiant. The first dawn of a humorous thought would show itself sometimes, as he sat silent, by an involuntary lengthening of the upper lip, followed by a shy, sidelong glance at his neighbors, indescribably whimsical, and seeming to ask, from their looks, whether the spark of drollery should be suppressed or allowed to blaze out. In the full tide of mirth, he did, indeed, 'laugh the heart's laugh;' but it was not boisterous and overpowering, nor did it check the course of his words: he could go on, telling or discanting, while his lungs did 'crow like chanticleer, his syllables in the struggles growing more emphatic, his accent more strongly Scotch, and his voice plaintive with excessive merriment.'"

240. M. GUIZOT.

The Court Journal of 184— states that M. Guizot's facility for going to sleep after extreme excitement and mental exertion is prodigious; and it is fortunate for him he is so constituted, otherwise his health would materially suffer. A minister in France ought not to be a nervous man; it is fatal to him if he is. After the most boisterous and tumultuous sitting at the Chamber, after being baited by the opposition in the most savage manner, he arrives home, throws himself upon a couch, and sinks immediately into a profound sleep, from which he is undisturbed till midnight, when proofs of the Moniteur are brought to him for inspection. Madame Guizot, who lives with her son, is upwards of eighty years of age. Never was there a more vigilant, tender, nervous mother. Her husband lost his life upon the scaffold of the revolution, and nothing can divest her of the idea that her son will undergo the same fate. This keeps her in perpetual alarm; and whenever she hears there is to be a violent discussion, she watches for the return of her son with the greatest anxiety and misgiving.

§ 20. EGOTISM, VANITY, ENVY, AND IRRITABILITY.

241. RUFUS, PLINY, TACITUS, AND OTHERS.

Virginius Rufus directed the following lines to be inscribed upon his tomb:

"Here Rufus lies, who Vindex' arms withstood
Not for himself, but for his country's good."

Pliny defends this ostentation, and says the action could never be sufficiently applauded. Let us compare this with the sentiment of Frontinus. "The expense of a monument," says he, "is superfluous; remembrance of me will remain, if my actions deserve it." "Is there less vanity," asks Pliny, "in declaring to all the world that his works will remain, than placing two lines upon a stone commemorative of the actions the other had performed?"

A person sitting next to Tacitus, at a public feast, was surprised at his various points of erudition, and asked if he was an Italian or a provincial. "Your acquaintance with literature must have informed you who I am," was the answer.

Pliny, in a letter to Venator, thus ingeniously "tones down" his egotism: "The longer your letter was, so much the more agreeable I thought it, especially as it turned entirely upon my works. I am not surprised you should find a pleasure in them, since I know you have the same affection for every composition of mine that you have for the author."

Modesty is the custos virtutum omnium, as Tully emphatically calls her—the guardian and protectress of the whole train of human virtues. Is she not shamed, therefore, at the whole tenor of antiquity in the article of self-commendation? Homer's Ulysses calls himself the wisest of the Grecians, as does Achilles call himself the most valiant and just. Plato quotes the oracle which pronounces him to be the wisest of men. Cæsar frequently commends himself; so does Cicero. Xenophon represents Cyrus, upon his death bed, as descanting upon the great beauty of his character.

242. ROUSSEAU IN ENGLAND.

The effects of a morbid mind, in regard to vanity, though sources of regret to the benevolent, cannot fail sometimes of being amusing, when they happen to a professed philosopher and contemner of the world. This was the case with Rousseau, who, having pertinaciously quarrelled with his best friends, indeed with all the world in France, had sought a refuge in England, under the personal guidance of his friend David Hume. Even here, the object of some admiration, and of royal generosity in a pension, the philosopher of Geneva could not be happy; but having quarrelled, as usual, with Hume, and all his English friends, he became bent on making his escape, as he termed it, into France; and stopping on his way at a village between London and Canterbury, he from thence wrote a long official letter to General Conway, then secretary of state, informing him that, although he had got so far in safety, yet he had reason to believe that the remainder of his route was so beset with his inexorable enemies, that, without government protection, he would not be able to escape. He therefore formally claimed the protection of the king, and further desired that a party of cavalry should be ordered to protect him to Dover! It is needless to add, that General Conway wrote to him to say that his postilion was a safeguard to him throughout the British dominions.

243. VOLTAIRE AND DR. YOUNG.

Voltaire consulted Dr. Young about his Essay in English, and begged him to correct any gross faults he might find in it. The doctor set very honestly to work, marked the passages most liable to censure, and when he went to explain himself about them, Voltaire could not avoid bursting out a laughing in his face. It was on the occasion of Voltaire's episode on Death and Sin, that Dr. Young spoke that couplet to him,—

"Thou'rt so ingenious, profligate, and thin,
That thou thyself art Milton's Death and Sin."

244. THE HIGH-MINDED AUTHOR.

A poor but high-spirited author once presented a book to King James II., in the great chamber at Whitehall, as he passed from the chapel, but omitted the usual ceremony of kneeling to the king.

The Duke of Richmond, who was in attendance, said, "Sir, where did you learn manners, not to kneel?" The author replied, "If it please your grace, I do give now; but when I come to beg any thing, then will I kneel."

245. PORSON.

Professor Porson was so far from lending an ear to flattery, that he was averse to that praise which was justly his due. An author, to whom, in the most obliging manner, he had given some literary assistance, said to him, "I wish to make you a public acknowledgment in the next edition of my work." "I decline your offer," said Porson; "for you may say something in compliment to me that we may both be ashamed of ten years hence."

246. GETTING UP A SENSATION.

Hook's "mononag excursions," as he called them, were occasionally prolonged to some weeks. He once made a tour through Wales in this way, accompanied by an intimate friend in the treasury, who had provided a gig, drawn by a white horse, for the journey. Every thing passed off pleasantly enough; fine weather—magnificent scenery—a stream to be whipped one day, a mountain to be climbed the next—a mine to be explored at one spot, a Druid temple to be traced at another—castles, cataracts, and coal mines, all inviting inspection.

"Ah!" said Hook, as they lounged along one bright morning, "this is very well in its way—very delightful, of course—plenty to look at—but then, somehow, nobody looks at us! The thing is getting quite dull: don't you think so?"

His companion assented. "Well, we can't go on in this manner," continued the other. "I must hit upon something, and get up a digito monstrari, somehow or another."

And at the next town from which they started, his friend had a taste of his quality in that line; for, having procured a box of large black wafers, he had completely spotted the snowy coat of the animal they were driving, after the pattern of those wooden quadruegs which, before the diffusion of useful knowledge, used to form the study of childhood. The device fully answered its purpose, and the happy pair drove off, attracting, throughout the remainder of the day, the gaze, wonder, and unequalled admiration of Cadwallader and all his goats.

247. BROUGHAM—THE PHRENOLOGIST.

It is said that a lady once asked Lord Brougham, the great English orator and author, who was the best debater in the House of Lords. His lordship modestly replied, "Lord Stanley is the second, madam."

The modesty of his lordship is equal to that of a distinguished lecturer on phrenology. He told his audience there were three remarkable heads in the United States: one was that of Daniel Webster, another John C. Calhoun: "the third, ladies and gentlemen," said the lecturer, "modesty forbids me to mention."

§ 21. CONTROVERSIES AND COLLISIONS.

248. THEOPHILUS RAYNAUD.

Among the worthies of the scribleri, we may rank the Jesuit Theophilus Raynaud, once a celebrated name, eulogized by Bayle and Patin. His collected works fill twenty folios—an edition, indeed, which finally sent the booksellers to the poorhouse.

This enterprising biblioplist had heard much of the prodigious erudition of the writer, but he had not the sagacity to discover that other literary qualities were also required to make twenty folios at all salable.

Of these "opera omnia," perhaps not a single copy can be found in England; but they may be a pennyworth on the continent. Raynaud's works are theological; but a system of grace, maintained by one work and pulled down by another, has ceased to interest mankind. The literature of the divine is of a less perishable nature. Reading and writing through a life of eighty years, and giving only a quarter of an hour to his dinner, with a vigorous memory, and a whimsical taste for some singular subjects, he could not fail to accumulate a mass of knowledge which may still be useful for the curious; and, besides, Raynaud had the Ristonian characteristic.

He was one of those who, exemplary in their own conduct, with a bitter zeal condemn whatever does not agree with their notions; and, however gentle in their nature, yet will set no limits to the ferocity of their pen. Raynaud was often in trouble with the censors of his books, and much more with his adversaries; so that he frequently had recourse to publish under a fictitious name. A remarkable evidence of this is the entire twentieth volume of his works. It consists of the numerous writings published anonymously, or to which were prefixed "noms de guerre." This volume is described by the whimsical title of Apopompæus, explained to us as the name given by the Jews to the scapegoat, which, when loaded with all their maledictions on its head, was driven away into the desert. These contain all Raynaud's numerous diatribes; for whenever he was refuted, he was always refuting; he did not spare his best friends. The title of a work against Arnould will show how he treated his adversaries: "Arnauldus redivivus natus Brixia seculo XII. renatus in Galliæ etate nostra." He dexterously applied the name of Arnould, by comparing him with one of the same name in the twelfth century, a scholar of Abelard's, and a turbulent enthusiast, say the Romish writers, who was burnt alive for having written against the luxuries and power of the priesthood, and for having raised a rebellion against the pope. When the learned De Launoi had successfully attacked the legends of saints, and was called the "denicheur de saints," "the unniccher of saints," every parish priest trembled for his favorite. Raynaud entitled a libel on this new iconoclast, "Hercules Commodianus Joannes Launoius repulsus." &c. He compared Launoi to the Emperor Commodus, who, though the most cowardly of men, conceived himself formidable when he dressed himself as Hercules. Another of these maledictions is a tract against Calvinism, describing a "religio bestiarum," (a religion of beasts,) because the Calvinists deny free will; but as he always fired with a double-barrelled gun, under the cloak of attacking Calvinism, he aimed a deadly shot at the Thomists, and particularly at a Dominican friar, whom he considered as bad as Calvin. Raynaud exults that he had driven one of his adversaries to take flight into Scotland, "ad pulas Scoticas transgressus," (to a Scotch pottage)—an expression which St. Jerome used in speaking of Pelagius. He always rendered an adversary odious by coupling him with some odious name. On one of these controversial books, where Casalas refuted Raynaud, Monnoye wrote, "Raynaudus et Casalas inepti: Raynaudo tamen Casalas ineptior."

Some of his most remarkable treatises may be mentioned as so many curiosities of literature.

The seventh volume bears the general title of Mariolia. All the treatises have for their theme the perfections and the worship of the Virgin. Many extraordinary things are here. One is a dictionary of names given to the Virgin, with observations on these names. Another, on the devotion of the scapulary, and its wonderful effects, written against De Lanou, and for which the order of the Carmes, when he died, bestowed a solemn service and obsequies on him. Another of these Mariolia is mentioned by Gallois, in the Journal des Sçavans. 1667, as a proof of his fertility. Having to preach on the seven solemn anthems which the church sings before Christmas, and which begin with an "O!" he made this letter only the subject of his sermons; and, barren as the letter appears, he has struck out "a multitude of beautiful particulars." This literary folly invites our curiosity.

In the eighth volume is a table of saints, classed by their station, condition, employment, and trades; a list of titles and prerogatives which the councils and the fathers have attributed to the sovereign pontiff.

The thirteenth volume has a subject which seems much in the taste of the sermons on the letter O. It is entitled Laus Brevitatis, in praise of brevity. The maxims are brief, but the commentary long. One of the natural subjects treated on is that of Noses; he reviews a great number of noses, and, as usual, does not forget the holy Virgin's. According to Raynaud, the nose of the Virgin Mary was long and aquiline, the mark of goodness and dignity; and as Jesus perfectly resembled his mother, he infers that he must have had such a nose. A treatise directed against the new custom of hiring chairs in churches, and being seated during the sacrifice of the mass. Another on the Cæsarean operation, which he stigmatizes as an act against nature. Another on eunuchs. Another, entitled Hipparchus de Religioso Negotiatore, is an attack on those of his own company—the monk turned merchant; the Jesuits were then accused of commercial traffic with the revenues of their establishment. The rector of a college at Avignon, who thought he was portrayed in this honest work, confined Raynaud in prison for five months.

After all, Raynaud was a man of vast acquirement, with a great flow of ideas, but tasteless, and void of all judgment. An anecdote may be recorded of him, which puts in a clear light the state of these literary men. Raynaud was one day pressing hard a reluctant bookseller to publish one of his works, who replied, "Write a book like Father Barri's, and I shall be glad to print it." It happened that the work of Barri was pillaged from Raynaud, and was much liked, while the original lay on the shelf. However, this only served to provoke a fresh attack from our redoubtable hero, who vindicated his rights, and emptied his quiver on him who had been ploughing with his heifer.

249. MILTON AND SALMASIUS.

The celebrated controversy of Salmasius, continued by Morus with Milton,—the first the pleader of King Charles, the latter the advocate of the people,—was of that magnitude, that all Europe took a part in the paper war of these two great men. The answer of Milton, who perfectly massacred Salmasius, is now read but by a few. Salmasius was a man of vast erudition, but no taste. His writings are learned, but sometimes ridiculous. He called his work Defensio Regia, Defence of Kings.

The opening of this work provokes a laugh. "Englishmen! who toss the heads of kings as so many tennis-balls, who play with crowns as if they were bowls, who look upon sceptres as so many crooks." Salmasius sometimes reproaches Milton as being but a puny piece of man; a humunculus, a dwarf deprived of the human figure, a bloodless being, composed of nothing but skin and bone; a contemptible pedagogue, fit only to flog his boys; and sometimes elevating the ardor of his mind into a poetic frenzy, he applies to him the words of Virgil, "Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum." Our great poet thought this senseless declamation merited a serious refutation; perhaps he did not wish to appear despicable in the eyes of the ladies; and he would not be silent on the subject, he says, lest any one should consider him as the credulous Spaniards are made to believe by their priests, that a heretic is a kind of rhinoceros, or a dog-headed monster. Milton says that he does not think any one ever considered him as unbeautiful; that his size rather approaches mediocrity than the diminutive; that he still felt the same courage and the same strength which he possessed when young, when, with his sword, he felt no difficulty to combat with men more robust than himself; that his face, far from being pale, emaciated, and wrinkled, was sufficiently creditable to him; for though he had passed his fortieth year, he was, in all other respects, ten years younger. And very pathetically he adds, "that even his eyes, blind as they are, are unblemished in their appearance; in this instance alone, and much against my inclination, I am a deceiver." When Salmasius found that his strictures on the person of Milton were false, and that, on the contrary, it was uncommonly beautiful, he then turned his battery against those graces with which nature had so liberally adorned his adversary. And it is now that he seems to have laid no restrictions on his pen; but, raging with the irritation of Milton's success, he throws out the blackest calumnies, and the most infamous aspersions.

It must be observed, when Milton first proposed to answer Salmasius, he had lost the use of one of his eyes; and his physicians declared that if he applied himself to the controversy, the other would likewise close forever. His patriotism was not to be baffled but with life itself. Unhappily, the predictions of his physicians took place! Thus a learned man in the occupations of study falls blind—a circumstance even now not read without sympathy. Salmasius considers it as one from which he may draw caustic ridicule and satiric severity.

Salmasius glories that Milton lost his health and his eyes in answering his apology for King Charles. He does not now reproach him with natural deformities; but he malignantly sympathizes with him, that he now no more is in possession of that beauty which rendered him so amiable during his residence in Italy. He speaks more plainly in a following page, and, in a word, would blacken the austere virtues of Milton with a crime too infamous to name.

Impartiality of criticism obliges us to confess that Milton was not destitute of rancor. When he was told that his adversary boasted he had occasioned the loss of his eyes, he answered, with the ferocity of the irritated Puritan, "And I shall cost him his life!"—a prediction which was soon after verified; for Christina, Queen of Sweden, withdrew her patronage from Salmasius, and sided with Milton. The universal neglect the proud scholar felt hastened his death in the course of a twelvemonth.

250. DES FONTAINES AND PIRON.

Des Fontaines, the journalist, who had wit and malice, inserted the fragment of a letter which the poet Rousseau wrote to the younger Racine, whilst he was at the Hague. These were the words: "I enjoy the conversation, within these few days, of my associates in Parnassus. Mr. Piron is an excellent antidote against melancholy; but," &c. Des Fontaines maliciously stopped at this but. In the letter of Rousseau it was, "but unfortunately he departs soon." Piron was very sensibly affected at this equivocal but, and resolved to revenge himself by composing one hundred epigrams against the malignant critic. He had written sixty before Des Fontaines died; but of those only two attracted any notice.

251. WARBURTON AND EDWARDS.

Bishop Warburton.

Warburton, who committed so many personal injuries, has, in his turn, most eminently suffered from the same motive. The personal animosity of a most ingenious man was the real cause of the utter destruction of Warburton's critical reputation. Edwards, the author of Canons of Criticism, when young and in the army, was a visitor at Allen's, of Prior Park, the patron of Warburton; and in those literary conversations which usually occupied their evenings, Warburton affected to show his superiority in his acquaintance with the Greek writers, never suspecting a red coat covered more Greek than his own, which happened unluckily to be the case. Once Edwards, in the library, taking down a Greek author, explained a passage in a manner which did not suit, probably, with some new theory of the great inventor of so many. A contest arose, in which Edwards discovered how Warburton came by his illegitimate knowledge of Greek authors. Edwards attempted to convince him that he did not really understand Greek, and that his knowledge, such as it was, was derived from French translations—a provoking act of literary kindness, which took place in the presence of Ralph Allen and his niece, who, though they could not stand as umpires, did as witnesses. An incurable breach took place between the parties, and from this trifling altercation, Edwards produced the bitter Canons of Criticism, and Warburton those foaming notes in the Dunciad.

252. WARBURTON AND DR. TAYLOR.

Dr. Taylor, the chancellor of Lincoln, once threw out, in company, an opinion derogatory to the scholarship of Warburton, who seems always to have had some choice spirits of his legion as spies in the camp of an enemy, and who sought their tyrant's grace by their violation of the social compact. The tyrant himself had an openness quite in contrast with the dark under-works of his satellites. He boldly interrogated our critic, and Taylor replied undauntedly, and more poignantly than Warburton might have suspected, that "he did not recollect ever saying that Dr. Warburton was no scholar, but that, indeed, he had always thought so." To this intrepid spirit, the world owes one of the remarkable prefaces to the Divine Legation, in which the chancellor of Lincoln, intrepid as he was, stands like a man of straw, to be buffeted and tossed about with all those arts of distortion which the wit and virulence of Warburton almost every day was practising at his "established places of execution," as his prefaces and notes have been wittily termed.

253. WALPOLE AND GRAY.

Walpole could not endure equality in literary men. His pride and hauteur were excessive, which betrayed themselves in the treatment of Gray, who had himself too much pride and spirit to forgive it, though matters were made up between them, and Walpole invited Gray to Strawberry Hill. When Gray came, he, without any ceremony, told Walpole that, though he waited on him, as civility required, yet by no means would he ever be there on the terms of their former friendship, which he had totally cancelled.

254. SHERIDAN AND CUMBERLAND.

When the School for Scandal was performing at Drury Lane Theatre with uncommon applause, the first season, Cumberland sat in the stage box, and was observed never to smile at any of the good things which the author had put into the mouths of the scenic personages. When the comedy was concluded, he improperly remarked, "I am much surprised that the audience should laugh so immoderately at what could not make me smile." As there are social traitors in all circles, this sarcasm was conveyed to Sheridan, who very coolly observed that Cumberland was truly ungrateful for not smiling at his comedy, as he had seen a tragedy of Cumberland's at Covent Garden Theatre, but a fortnight before, and had laughed from the beginning to the end!"

§ 22. PERSONAL AND LITERARY CHARACTER.

255. SENECA, SALLUST, LUCIAN, AND OTHERS.

We find Seneca, the disinterested usurer of seven millions, writing on moderate desires, on a table of gold.

Sallust, who so eloquently declaims against the licentiousness of the age, was repeatedly accused in the senate of public and habitual debaucheries; and when this inveigher against the spoilers of provinces attained to a remote government, Sallust pilaged like Verres.

Lucian, when young, declaimed against the friendship of the great, as another name for servitude; but when his talents procured him a situation under the emperor, he facetiously compared himself to those quacks who, themselves plagued with a perpetual cough, offer to sell an infallible remedy for one.

Sir Thomas More, in his Utopia, declares that no man ought to be punished for his religion; yet he became a fierce persecutor, racking and burning men, when his own true faith in England was at the ebb.

At the moment the poet Rousseau was giving versions of the Psalms, full of unction, as our neighbors say, he was profaning the same pen with the most infamous of epigrams.

256. ROBERT BURTON.

That singular writer, Robert Burton, is said, by Anthony Wood, to have composed his Anatomy in order to divert his own "melancholy." So great was the demand for this book, when first published, that the bookseller is said to have acquired an estate by it. In the intervals of his vapors, he was the most facetious companion in the university. When he felt a depression coming upon him, he used to relieve his melancholy by going to the foot of the bridge, and listening to the coarse ribaldry of the bargemen, which seldom failed to throw him into a fit of laughter. He bequeathed a great part of his books to the Bodleian Library, and one hundred pounds to purchase five pounds' worth of books yearly, to the library of Christ Church, Oxford.

257. SIR PHILIP SIDNEY.

Sir Philip Sidney was one of the brightest ornaments of Queen Elizabeth's court. In early youth, he discovered the strongest marks of genius and understanding. Sir Frederick Greville—Lord Brooke—who was his intimate friend, says of him, "Though I lived with him, and knew him from a child, yet I never knew him other than a man with such steadiness of mind, lovely and familiar gravity, as carried grace and reverence above greater years. His talk was ever of knowledge, and his very play tended to enrich the mind."

258. MOLIÈRE AND PASCAL.

Molière, whose humor was so perfectly comic, and even ludicrous, was a very thoughtful and serious man, and perhaps even of a melancholy temper. His strongly-featured physiognomy exhibits the face of a great tragic, rather than of a great comic, poet. Could one have imagined that the brilliant wit, the luxuriant raillery, and the fine and deep sense of Pascal, could have combined with the most opposite qualities—the hypochondriacism and bigotry of an ascetic?

259. RACINE NO LOVER.

When Valincour attributed the excessive tenderness, in the tragedies of Racine, to the poet's own impassioned character, the younger Racine amply showed that his father was by no means this slave of love; that his intercourse with a certain actress was occasioned by his pains to form her who, with a fine voice, and memory, and beauty, was incapable of comprehending the verses she recited, or accompanying them with any natural gesture. The tender Racine never wrote a single love poem, nor had a mistress; and his wife had never read his tragedies, for poetry was not her delight. Racine's motive for making love the constant source of action in his tragedies was on the principle which has influenced so many poets, who usually conform to the prevalent taste of the times. In the court of a young monarch, it was necessary that heroes should be lovers; and since Corneille had so nobly run in one career, Racine could not have existed as a great poet had he not rivalled him in an opposite one. The tender Racine was no lover; but he was a subtle and epigrammatic observer, before whom his convivial friends never cared to open their minds.

260. LE VAYER, BAYLE, AND OTHERS.

Many licentious writers have led chaste lives. La Mothe le Vayer wrote two works of a free nature; yet his was the unblemished life of a retired sage.

Bayle is the too faithful compiler of impurities; but he resisted the corruption of the senses as much as Newton.

La Fontaine wrote tales fertile in intrigues, yet the "bon homme" has not left on record a single illicit amour.

Smollet's character is immaculate; yet he has described two scenes which offend even in the freedom of imagination.

Cowley, who boasts with such gayety of the versatility of his passion among so many mistresses, wanted even the confidence to address one. Thus licentious writers may be very chaste men; for the imagination may be a volcano, while the heart is an Alp of ice.

261. HERON, BERESFORD, AND BURTON.

The Comforts of Human Life, by R. Heron, were written in a prison, under the most distressing circumstances. The Miseries of Human Life, by Beresford, were, on the contrary, composed in a drawing-room, where the author was surrounded by all the good things of this world. A striking contrast will often be found to exist between authors and their works, melancholy writers being usually the most jocular and lively in society, and humorists in theory the most lugubrious of animals in practice.

Burton, the author of the Anatomy of Melancholy, was extremely facetious in conversation; and the most dolorous poet of our own day, Lord Byron, was one of the most brilliant and humorous of associates when he mingled with the world.

262. ROCHEFOUCAULD AND DE RETZ.

"Rochefoucauld," says the eloquent Dugald Stewart, "in private life was a conspicuous example of all those moral qualities of which he seemed to deny the existence, and exhibited, in this respect, a striking contrast to the Cardinal de Retz, who has presumed to censure him for his want of faith in the reality of virtue; and to which we must add that De Retz was one of those pretended patriots, without a single of those virtues for which he was the clamorous advocate of faction."

263. COLTON'S LACON.

This remarkable book was written upon covers of letters and scraps of paper of such description as was nearest at hand; the greater part at a house in Princes Street, Soho. Colton's lodging was a penuriously furnished second floor, and upon a rough deal table, with a stumpy pen, our author wrote.

Though a beneficed clergyman, holding the vicarage of Kew, with Petersham, in Surrey, Colton was a well-known frequenter of the gaming table; and suddenly disappearing from his usual haunts in London about the time of the murder of Weare, in 1823, it was strongly suspected he had been assassinated. It was, however, afterwards ascertained that he had absconded to avoid his creditors; and in 1828 a successor was appointed to his living. He then went to reside in America, but subsequently lived in Paris, a professed gamester; and it is said that he thus gained, in two years only, the sum of 25,000*l*. He blew out his brains while on a visit to a friend at Fontainebleau, in 1832, bankrupt in health, spirits, and fortune. What a contrast between the sentiments of Lacon and the life and death of the author!

264. QUINTILIAN'S BEREAVEMENTS.

No event in literary history is more impressive than the fate of Quintilian; it was in the midst of his elaborate work, composed to form the literary character of a son, his great hope, that he experienced the most terrible affliction in the domestic life of genius—the death of his wife, and one child after the other. It was a moral earthquake with a single survivor amidst the ruins. An awful burst of parental and literary affliction breaks forth in Quintilian's lamentation: "My wealth, and my writings, the fruits of a long and painful life, must now be reserved only for strangers; all I possess is for aliens, and no longer mine." The husband, the father, and the man of genius, utter one cry of agony.

265. COOPER, WHITELOCKE, AND SAVILLE.

If the literary man unites himself to a woman whose taste and whose temper are adverse to his pursuits, he must courageously prepare for a martyrdom. The wife of Bishop Cooper, while her husband was employed on his Lexicon, one day consigned the volume of many years to the flames, and obliged that scholar to begin a second siege of Troy in a second Lexicon.

The wife of Whitelocke often destroyed his manuscripts, and the marks of her nails have come down to posterity in the numerous lacerations still gaping in his Memorials.

The learned Sir Henry Saville, who devoted more than half of his life, and near ten thousand pounds, to his magnificent edition of St. Chrysostom, led a very uneasy life between that saint and Lady Saville; what with her tenderness for him and her own want of amusement, St. Chrysostom incurred more than one danger.

One of those learned scholars who translated the Scriptures kept a diary of his studies and his domestic calamities, for they both went on together; busied only among his books, his wife, from many causes, plunged him into debt; he was compelled to make the last sacrifice of a literary man, by disposing of his library. But now, he without books, and she worse and worse in temper, discontents were of fast growth between them. Our man of study found his wife, like the remora, a little fish, sticking at the bottom of his ship, impeding its progress. He desperately resolved to fly from the country and his wife. There is a cool entry in the diary, on a warm proceeding, one morning, wherein he expresses some curiosity to know the cause of his wife being out of temper. Simplicity of a patient scholar! The present matrimonial case, however, terminated in unexpected happiness; the wife, after having forced her husband to be deprived of his library, to be daily chronicling her caprices, and, finally, to take the serious resolution of abandoning his country, yet, living in good old times, religion and conscience united them again; and, as the connubial diarist ingeniously describes this second marriage of himself and his wife, "made it be with them, as surgeons say it is with a fractured bone, if once well set, the stronger for a fracture." A new consolation for domestic ruptures.

266. MELANTHON AND HIS FAMILY.

Melanthon is reported to have frequently studied the gravest points of theology with his book in one hand, and in the other the edge of a cradle which he incessantly rocked; and M. Esprit, a celebrated author and scholar, "has been caught by me," says M. Marville, "reading Plato with great attention, considering the interruptions which he met with from the necessity of sounding his little child's whistle."

267. MILTON, MOLIERE, STEELE, AND ROUSSEAU.

Observe the errors and infirmities of the greatest men of genius in their matrimonial connections. Milton carried nothing of the greatness of his mind in the choice of his wives; his first wife was the object of sudden fancy. He left the metropolis, and unexpectedly returned a married man; united to a woman of such uncongenial dispositions, that the romp was frightened at the literary habits of the great poet, found his house solitary, beat his nephews, and ran away after a single month's residence. To this circumstance, we owe his famous treatise on divorce, and a party, by no means extinct, who, having made as ill choices in their wives, were for divorcing as fast as they had been for marrying, calling themselves Miltonists.

When we find that Moliere, so skilful in human life, married a girl from his own troop, who made him experience all those bitter disgusts and ridiculous embarrassments which he himself played off at the theatre; that Addison's fine taste in morals and in life could suffer the ambition of a courtier to prevail with himself to seek a countess, whom he describes under the stormy character of Oceana, who drove him contemptuously into solitude, and shortened his days; and that Steele, warm and thoughtless, was united to a cold, precise "Miss Prue," as he calls her, and from whom he never parted without bickerings; in all these cases we censure the great men, not their wives. Rousseau has honestly confessed his error; he had united himself to a low, illiterate woman, and when he retreated into solitude, he felt the weight which he carried with him.

268. HOLLIS, THE LITERARY BACHELOR.

If ever a man of letters lived in a state of energy and excitement which might raise him above the atmosphere of social love, it was assuredly the enthusiast, Thomas Hollis, who, solely devoted to literature and to republicanism, was occupied in furnishing Europe and America with editions of his favorite authors. He would not marry, lest marriage should interrupt the labors of his Platonic politics. But his extraordinary memoirs, while they show an intrepid mind in a robust frame, bear witness to the self-tormentor who had trodden down the natural bonds of domestic life. Hence the "deep dejection of his spirits;" those incessant cries, that he has "no one to advise, assist, or cherish these magnanimous pursuits in him." At length he retreated into the country in utter hopelessness.

"I go not into the country for attention to agriculture as such, nor attentions of interest of any kind, which I have ever despised as such; but as a used man, to pass the remainder of a life in tolerable sanity and quiet, after having given up the flower of it, voluntarily, day, week, month, year after year successive to each other, to public service, and being no longer able to sustain, in body or mind, the labors that I have chosen to go through, without falling speedily into the greatest disorder, and, it might be, imbecility itself. This is not coloring, but the exact plain truth."

269. EVELYN AND HIS FAMILY.

Evelyn, in his beautiful retreat at Sayes Court, had inspired his family with that variety of tastes which he himself was spreading throughout the nation. His son translated Rapin's Gardens, which poem the father proudly preserved in his Sylva; his lady, ever busied in his study, excelled in the arts her husband loved, and designed the frontispiece to his Lucretius; she was the cultivator of their celebrated garden, which served as an example of his great work on "forest trees."

270. DR. JOHNSON'S MARRIAGE.

The artless manners and rustic prettiness of Lucy Porter had won Johnson's youthful heart when she was on a visit at the Rev. John Hunter's, master of the free school, Lichfield, in Johnson's youthful days. The peculiar appearance, however, of Johnson could not tempt the lady to a return of his passion; and at length she returned to her parents at Birmingham. Business requiring Johnson's presence in that neighborhood on the death of his father, and calling upon his former mistress there, he found her parent dying. With that affectionate friendship which particular situations always experienced from him, he passed all his leisure hours at Mr. Porter's, attending his sick bed, and a few months after his death, asked Mrs. Johnson's consent to his marriage with the widow.

Mrs. Porter has been represented as very fat, with a red face, and indifferent features, and in her speech and manners affected, and bordering on girlish levity; while Johnson, on his first introduction to her, exhibited an appearance yet more singular. He was then lean and lank, so that his immense structure of bones was hideously striking to the eye, while the scars occasioned by the scrofula were deeply visible. His hair, which was straight and stiff, he wore separated behind; and he often had, seemingly, convulsive starts and odd gesticulations, which tended to excite at once surprise and ridicule. Mrs. Porter, however, was so much engaged by his conversation, that she overlooked all these external disadvantages, and expressed to her daughter, "This is the most sensible man that I ever saw in my life."

Johnson's mother, as might naturally be expected, expressed her surprise at a request so imprudent and extraordinary, both on account of their disparity of years and her want of fortune.

"No, Sam," said she, "my willing consent you will never have to so preposterous a match. You are twenty-five, and she is turned of fifty. If she had any prudence, this request would never have been made to me. Where are your means of subsistence? Porter has died poor, in consequence of his wife's expensive habits. You have great talents, but as yet have turned them into no profitable channel."

"Mother," replied Johnson, "I have not deceived Mrs. Porter; I have told her the worst of me, that I am of mean extraction; that I have no money; and that I have had an uncle hanged. She replied that she valued no one more or less for his descent; that she had no more money than myself; and that though she had not had a relation hanged, she had fifty who deserved hanging."

After some little lapse of time, however, matters were brought to a conclusion, and Derby was fixed on as the place where the ceremony should be performed, on the 9th of July, 1736, for which place the bride and bridegroom set out on horseback. The singular account of their journey to church, on the nuptial morning, is given by Boswell, in the doctor's own words to him. "Sir, she had read the old romances, and had got into her head the fantastical notion that a woman of spirit should use her lover like a dog. So, sir, at first she told me that I rode too fast, and that she could not keep up with me; and when I rode a little slower, she passed me, and complained that I lagged behind. I was not to be made the slave of caprice, and I resolved to begin as I meant to end. I therefore pushed on briskly till I was fairly out of her sight; the road lay between two hedges, so I was sure she could not miss it; and I contrived that she should soon come up with me; when she did, I observed her to be in tears."

This, it must be allowed, was a singular beginning of connubial felicity, yet he proved a most affectionate and indulgent husband to the last moment of her life. He once told Topham Beauclerk, with much gravity, "Sir, it was a love match on both sides;" and in his Prayers and Meditations, we find very remarkable evidence that his regard and fondness for her never ceased, even after her death.

§ 24. TRIALS AND MISERIES.

271. THOMAS NASH.

It appears by a confession of Thomas Nash, that an author would in his days, pressed by the res angusta domi, when "the bottom of his purse was turned upward," submit to compose pieces for gentlemen who aspired to authorship. He tells us on some occasion that he was then in the country composing poetry for some country squire, and says, "I am fain to let my plow stand still in the midst of a farrow, to follow these senior fantastics, to whose amorous villanellas I prostitute my pen," and this, too, "twice or thrice in a month;" and he complains that it is "poverty which alone maketh me so inconstant to my determined studies, trudging from place to place, to and fro, and prosecuting the means to keep me from idleness." An author was then much like a vagrant.

272. PRIDEAUX'S POVERTY.

John Prideaux, Bishop of Worcester, was originally very poor. Before he applied himself to learning, he stood candidate for the office of parish clerk at Wyborow, in Devonshire, and, to his great mortification, another was chosen into that place. Such was his poverty on his first coming to Oxford, that he was employed in servile offices in the kitchen of Exeter College for his support. He has been after heard to say, that if he had been elected clerk of Wyborow, he should never have been a bishop. He was so far from being ashamed of his former poverty, that he kept the leather breeches which he wore at Oxford as a memorial of it.

273. PRYNNE'S IMPRISONMENT.

Prynne, says D'Israeli, seldom dined : every three or four hours he munched a manchet, and refreshed his exhausted spirits with ale brought to him by his servant; and when "he was put into this road of writing," as crabb'd Anthony telleth, he fixed on "a long quilted cap, which came an inch over his eyes, serving as an umbrella to defend them from too much light;" and then, hunger nor thirst did he experience, save that of his voluminous pages. Prynne has written a library, amounting, I think, to nearly two hundred books. Our unlucky author, whose life was involved in authorship, and his happiness, no doubt, in the habitual exuberance of his pen, seems to have considered the being debarred from pen, ink, and books, during his imprisonment, as an act more barbarous than the loss of his ears. The extraordinary perseverance of Prynne in this fever of the pen appears in the following title of one of his extraordinary volumes: "Comfortable Cordials against discomfortable Fears of Imprisonment; containing some Latin Verses, Sentences, and Texts of Scripture, written by Mr. Wm. Prynne on his Chamber Walls, in the Tower of London, during his Imprisonment there; translated by him into English Verse, 1641."

274. JOSHUA BARNES.

Joshua Barnes was the editor of Homer, Euripides, and Anacreon, and the writer of a vast number of miscellaneous compositions in history and poetry. Besides the works he published, he left behind him nearly fifty unfinished ones; many were epic poems, all intended to be in twelve books, and some had reached their eighth. His folio volume of the History of Edward III. is a labor of valuable research. He wrote with equal facility in Greek, Latin, and his own language, and he wrote all his days; and, in a word, having little or nothing but his Greek professorship, not exceeding forty pounds a year, Barnes, who had a great memory, a little imagination, and no judgment, saw the close of a life, devoted to the studies of humanity, settle around him in gloom and despair. The great idol of his mind was the edition of his Homer, which seems to have completed his ruin: he was haunted all his days with a notion that he was persecuted by envy, and much undervalued by the world; the sad consolation of the secondary and third-rate authors, who often die persuaded of the existence of ideal enemies. To enable him to publish his Homer at an enormous charge, he wrote a poem, the design of which is to prove that Solomon was the author of the Iliad, and it has been said that this was done to interest his wife, who had some property, to lend her aid towards the publication of so divine a work. This happy pun was applied for his epitaph:—

JOSHUA BARNES,
Fœlicis memorie, judicium expectans.
Here lieth
Joshua Barnes,
Of happy memory, awaiting judgment!

275. DEFOE'S INSOLVENCY.

Daniel Defoe died insolvent, author of two hundred and ten books and pamphlets.

276. SIR RICHARD STEELE AND SAVAGE.

Sir Richard desired Mr. Savage to come very early to his house one morning. Mr. Savage came as he had promised, found the chariot at the door, and Sir Richard waiting for him, and ready to go out. What was intended, or whether they were to go, Savage could not conjecture, and was not willing to inquire, but immediately seated himself with Sir Richard. The coachman was ordered to drive, and they hurried with the utmost expedition to Hyde Park Corner, where they stopped at a petty ale-house, and retired to a private room. Sir Richard then informed him that he intended to publish a pamphlet, and that he had desired him to come thither that he might write for him. They soon sat down to the work. Sir Richard dictated, and Savage wrote, till the dinner that was ordered had been put upon the table. Savage was surprised at the meanness of the entertainment, and, after some hesitation, ventured to ask for wine, which Sir Richard, not without reluctance, ordered to be brought. They then finished their dinner, and proceeded in their pamphlet, which they concluded in the afternoon. Mr. Savage then imagined his task over, and expected that Sir Richard would call for the reckoning and return home; but his expectations deceived him, for Sir Richard told him that he was without money, and that the pamphlet must be sold before the dinner could be paid for; and Savage was therefore obliged to go and offer the new production to sale for two guineas, which, with some difficulty, he obtained. Sir Richard then returned home, having retired that day only to avoid his creditors, and composed the pamphlet to discharge his reckoning.

277. INTERRUPTIONS OF AUTHORS.

Those unhappy beings who wander from house to house, privileged by the charter of society to obstruct the knowledge they cannot impart, to tire because they are tired, or to seek amusement at the cost of others, belong to that class of society which have affixed no other value to time than that of getting rid of it: these are judges not the best qualified to comprehend the nature and evil of their depredations in the silent apartment of the studious. "We are afraid," said some of those visitors to Baxter, "that we break in upon your time." "To be sure you do," replied the disturbed and blunt scholar.

Ursinus, to hint as gently as he could to his friends that he was avaricious of time, contrived to place an inscription over the door of his study, which could not fail to fix their eye, intimating that whoever remained there must join in his labors.

The amiable Melancthon, incapable of a harsh expression, when he received these idle visits, only noted down the time he had expended, that he might reanimate his industry, and not lose a day. The literary character has been driven to the most inventive shifts to escape the irruption of a formidable party at a single rush, who enter without "besieging or beseeching," as Milton has it.

The late elegant, poetical Mr. Ellis, on one of these occasions, at his country-house, showed a literary friend, that, when driven to the last, he usually made his escape by a leap out of the window.

Brand Hollis endeavored to hold out the idea of singularity as a shield; and the great Robert Boyle was compelled to advertise in a newspaper that he must decline visits on certain days, that he might have leisure to finish some of his works.

278. LOSS OF ERASMUS.

The celebrated Erasmus lost his whole substance (quæ tum erat exigua, sed mihi maxima quam nihil superasset) from a seizure by the custom-house officers at Dover, under one of those laws. Previous to his leaving England, he had consulted his friend, Sir T. More, who informed him he might carry any money out of the kingdom, which was not English coin. Erasmus protests that what he had with him was neither coined in England, nor paid him by any one here on English account. The money was, however, taken from him, and, on his landing in France, he made a hasty collection of proverbs, which he printed for subsistence.

279. MONTESQUIEU'S EXPERIENCE.

A confession by Montesquieu states, with open candor, a fact in his life, which shows the jealousy of the great towards the literary character.

"On my entering into life, I was spoken of as a man of talents, and people of condition gave me a favorable reception; but when the success of my Persian Letters proved perhaps that I was not unworthy of my reputation, and the public began to esteem me, my reception with the great was discouraging, and I experienced innumerable mortifications." Montesquieu subjoins a reflection sufficiently humiliating for the mere nobleman: "The great, inwardly wounded with the glory of a celebrated name, seek to humble it. In general, he only can patiently endure the fame of others who deserves fame himself."

280. COLE'S CHRONICLES.

William Cole, the college friend of Walpole, Mason, and Gray, had a gossip's ear, and a tattler's pen, and, among better things, wrote down every grain of literary scandal his insatiable and minute curiosity could lick up. These scandalous chronicles, which only show the violence of his prejudices, without the force of genius, or the acuteness of penetration, were ordered not to be opened till twenty years after his decease; he wished to do as little mischief as he could, but he loved to do some. I well remember, says D'Israeli, the cruel anxiety which prevailed in the nineteenth year of these enclosures; it spoiled the digestions of several of our literati who had had the misfortune of Cole's intimate friendship or enmity.

When the lid was removed from this Pandora's box, it happened that some of his intimate friends were alive to perceive in what strange figures they were exhibited by their quondam admirer!

Cole had passed a long life in the pertinacious labor of forming an Athenæ Cantabrigienses, and other literary collections, designed as a companion to the work of Anthony Wood. These mighty labors exist in more than fifty folio volumes in his own writing. He began these collections about the year 1745. In a fly leaf of 1777, I found the following melancholy state of his feelings and a literary confession, as forcibly expressed as it is painful to read, when we consider that they are the wailings of a most zealous votary.

"In good truth, whoever undertakes this drudgery of an Athenæ Cantabrigienses, must be contented with no prospect of credit and reputation to himself, and with the mortifying reflection that, after all his pains and study through life, he must be looked upon in a humble light. However, as I have begun, and made so large a progress in this undertaking, it is death to think of leaving it off, though, from the former considerations, so little credit is to be expected from it."

281. MYLES DAVIES.

To paint the distresses of an author in the early part of the eighteenth century soliciting alms for a book which he presents, is a case so uncommon in English literary history, that the invention of the novelist seems necessary to fill up the picture. But Myles Davies is an artist, in his own simple narrative.

Our author has given the names of several of his unwilling customers.

"Those squeeze-farthing and hoard-penny ignoramus doctors, with several great personages who formed excuses for not accepting my books; or they would receive them, but give nothing for them; or else deny they had them, or remembered any thing of them; and so gave me nothing for my last present of books, though they kept them gratis et ingratiss."

"But his grace of the Dutch extraction in Holland (said to be akin to Mynheer Vander B—nk) had a peculiar grace in receiving my present of books and odes, which, being bundled up together with a letter and an ode upon his graceship, and carried in by his porter, I was bid to call for an answer five years hence. I asked the porter what he meant by that. I suppose, said he, four or five days hence; but it proved five or six months after, before I could get any answer, though I had writ five or six letters in French with fresh odes upon his graceship, and an account where I lived, and what noblemen had accepted of my present. I attended about the door three or four times a week, and all that time constantly from twelve to four or five o'clock in the evening; and walking under the fore windows of the parlors, once that time his and her grace came after dinner to stare at me, with open windows and shut mouths, but filled with fair water, which they spouted with so much dexterity that they twisted the water through their teeth and mouth-screw, to fash near my face, and yet just to miss me, though my nose could not well miss the natural flavor of the orange-water showering so near me. Her grace began the water-work, but not very gracefully, especially for an English lady of her description, airs, and qualities, to make a stranger her spitting-post, who had been guilty of no other offence than to offer her husband some writings. His grace followed, yet first stood looking so wistfully towards me, that I verily thought he had a mind to throw me a guinea or two for all these indignities, and two or three months' then sleeveless waiting upon him; and accordingly I advanced to address his grace to remember the poor author, but, instead of an answer, he immediately undamns his mouth, out fly whole showers of lymphatic rockets, which had like to have put out my mortal eyes."

Still he was not disheartened, and still applied for his bundle of books, which were returned to him at length unopened, with "half a guinea upon top of the cargo," and "with desire to receive no more."

"I plucked up courage, murmuring within myself,— 'Tu ne cede malis, sed contra audentior esto.'"

282. JOHNSON BEHIND THE SCREEN.

Soon after the publication of the Life of Savage, which was anonymous, Mr. Walter Harte, dining with Mr. Cave, the projector of the Gentleman's Magazine, at St. John's Gate, took occasion to speak very handsomely of the work. The next time Cave met Harte, he told him that he had made a man very happy the other day at his house by the encomiums he bestowed on the author of Savage's Life. "How could that be?" says Harte; "none were present but you and I." Cave replied, "You might observe I sent a plate of virtuels behind the screen. There skulked the biographer, one Johnson, whose dress was so shabby that he durst not make his appearance. He overheard our conversation, and your applauding his performance delighted him exceedingly."

283. BOYCE AND DR. JOHNSON.

Samuel Boyce was a well-known literary character of the last century. Dr. Johnson, among other acts of friendly sympathy, frequently solicited alms or subscriptions for Boyce; and having once received a guinea, he bought some roast beef and a bottle of port wine. But when Boyce sat down to enjoy "this manna in the wilderness," he commenced a serious quarrel with the doctor because he had not added also some mushrooms or catsup.

284. GOLDSMITH'S EXPERIENCE.

At the sale of a very curious collection of rare autograph letters in London, there was one of Oliver Goldsmith, in which he says, "I know of no misery but a jail to which my own imprudence and your letter seem to point. I have seen it inevitable this three or four weeks, and from Heaven request it as a favor — as a favor that may prevent something more fatal. I have been years struggling with a wretched being, with all that contempt which indigence brings with it, with all those strong passions which make contempt insupportable." This interesting document sold for £6 8s. 6d.

285. GOLDSMITH AT GREEN ARBOR COURT

The lover of literature will walk up the Break-neck Stairs, between Seacoal Lane and the Old Bailey, with great pleasure, when he reflects that it will lead to Green Arbor Court, where Goldsmith wrote his Vicar of Wakefield and his Traveller.

A friend of the doctor, paying him a visit in this place in March, 1759, found him in a lodging so poor and miserable that, he says, he should not have thought it proper to have mentioned the circumstance, did he not consider it as the highest proof of the splendor of Goldsmith's genius and talents, that, by the bare exertion of their powers, under every disadvantage of person and fortune, he could gradually emerge from such obscurity to the enjoyment of all the comforts and even the luxuries of life, and admission into the best societies of London.

The doctor was writing his Inquiry into the present State of polite Learning in a wretched, dirty room, in which there was but one chair; and when he, from civility, offered it to his visitant, he was obliged to seat himself in the window. Such was the humble abode of one of the first of English writers; and such was the place where two of the finest productions of English literature were written.

286. SHERIDAN AND HIS WIFE IN POVERTY.

When Sheridan was in distress, in early life, one of his resources was that of writing for the fugitive publications of the day, in which he was materially assisted by his wife; and many years after his entrance into the spheres of politics, he was heard to say that, "if he had stuck to the law, he believed he should have done as much as his friend Tom Erskine; but," continued he, "I had no time for such studies. Mrs. Sheridan and myself were often obliged to keep writing for our daily leg or shoulder of mutton; otherwise we should have had no dinner." One of his friends, to whom he confessed this, wittily replied, "Then I perceive it was a joint

287. ST. PIERRE.

In a garret, the author of the Studies of Nature exultingly tells us that he arranged his work. "It was in a little garret, in the new street of St. Etienne du Mont, where I resided four years in the midst of physical and domestic afflictions. But there I enjoyed the most exquisite pleasure of my life, amid profound solitude and an enchanting horizon; there I put the finishing hand to my Studies of Nature, and there I published them."

288. MRS. INCHBALD AND MADAME DE STAEL.

"I will not mention the calamity of a neighbor," says Mrs. Inchbald, "by many degrees the first female writer in the world, as she is called by the Edinburgh reviewers. Madame de Staël asked a lady of my acquaintance to introduce her to me. The lady was our mutual acquaintance, of course, and so far my friend as to conceal my place of abode; yet she menaced me with a visit from the Baroness of Holstein, if I would not consent to meet her at a third house. After much persuasion I did so. I admired Madame de Staël much. She talked to me the whole time; so did Miss Edgeworth, whenever I met her in company. These authoresses supposed me dead, and seemed to pay a tribute to my memory; but with Madame de Staël it seemed no passing compliment. She was inquisitive as well as attentive, and entreated me to explain to her the motive why I shunned society. 'Because,' I replied, 'I read the loneliness that will follow.' 'What! will you feel your solitude more when you return from this company, than you did before you came hither?' 'Yes.' 'I should think it would elevate your spirits. Why do you feel your loneliness more?' 'Because I have no one to tell that I have seen you; no one to describe your person to; no one to whom I can repeat the many encomiums you have passed on me.' 'Simple story; no one to enjoy any of your praises but yourself. Ah, ah! you have no children;' and she turned to an elegant daughter with pathetic tenderness. She then so forcibly depicted a woman's joys, that she sent me home more melancholy at the comparison of our situation in life than could have arisen from the consequence of riches or poverty.

"I called by appointment at her house two days after. I was told she was ill. The next morning my paper explained her illness. You have seen the death of her son in the papers. He was one of Bernadotte's aid-de-camps; the most beautiful young man that ever was seen — only nineteen — a duel with sabres, and the first stroke literally cut off his head! Necker's grandson!"

289. JOHN MITFORD'S ECCENTRICITIES AND SUFFERINGS.

John Mitford was, perhaps, the most eccentric character of his day. He was originally in the navy, and fought under Hood and Nelson. He was born at Mitford Castle, Northumberland; and the authoress of Rienzi and Our Village, and the author of the History of Greece, were his cousins. He was also related to Lord Redesdale. His name will long be remembered in connection with Lady Percival in the Blackheath affair, for his share of which he was tried and acquitted. For several years he lived by chance, and slept three nights in the week in the open air, when his finances did not admit of his paying threepence for a den in St. Giles's. Though formerly a nautical fop, for the last fourteen years he was ragged and loathsome. He never thought of necessities but for the present moment. Having had a handsome pair of Wellington boots given him, he sold them for one shilling. The fellow who bought them went and pawned them for fifteen shillings, and came back in triumph with the money. "Ah," said Jack, "but you went out in the cold for it!"

He was the author of Johnny Newcome in the Navy. The publisher gave him a shilling a day until he finished it. Incredible as it may appear, he lived the whole of this time in Bayswater Fields, making a bed at night of grass and nettles. Two-penny worth of bread and cheese, with an onion, was his daily food; the rest of the shilling he expended for gin. He thus passed forty-three days, washing his shirt and stockings himself in a pond when he required clean linen. He formerly edited the Scourge and Bon Ton Magazine. He was latterly employed by publishers of a certain description. A hundred efforts were made to reclaim him, but without avail. Mr. Elliott, a printer and publisher, took him into his house, and endeavored to render him decent. For a few days he was sober; and a relative having sent him some clothes, he made a respectable appearance. But he soon degenerated into his former habits; and, whilst editing the Bon Ton Gazette, Mr. Elliott was obliged to keep him in a place, half kitchen, half cellar, with a loose grate tolerably well filled, a candle, a bottle of gin, where he passed his days, and, with the covering of an old carpet, his nights, never issuing from his lair but when the bottle was empty. Sometimes he got furious with drink, and his shoes were taken from him to prevent his migrating; he would then run out without them, and has taken his coat off in winter and sold it for half a pint of gin. At the time of his death, he was editing a penny publication called the Quizical Gazette. He wrote the popular song, the King is a true British Sailor, and sold it to seven different publishers. Notwithstanding his habits, he was employed by several religious publishers.

This miserable man was buried by Mr. Green, of Will's Coffee-house, Lincoln's Inn Fields, who had formerly been his shipmate. He left a wife and family; but they were provided for by Lord Redcudale. John Mitford was a respectable classic, and of varied attainments; yet for fourteen years "he had not where to lay his head;" and he was heard to say, "if his soul was placed on one table, and a bottle of gin on another, he would sell the former to taste the latter." He died December 25, 1831.

290. EFFECT OF THE MIND ON THE STOMACH.

Literary men, according to Celsus, have universally weak stomachs — "imbeciles stomachos omnes pene cupidi litterarum sunt."

Aristotle had this organ so feeble that he was obliged to strengthen it by the application of an aromatic oil to the region of the stomach, which never failed to impart its cordial effect. A respectable physician asserted that he could estimate the capacity of mind by the delicacy of the stomach; for, in fact, you scarce ever find a man of genius who does not labor under complaints of the stomach.

291. JOHN MACDIARMID.

John Macdiarmid was one of those Scotch students whom the golden fame of Hume and Robertson attracted to the metropolis. He mounted the first steps of literary adventure with credit, and passed through the probation of editor and reviewer, till he strove for more heroic adventures. He published some volumes, whose subjects display the aspirings of his genius — an Inquiry into the Nature of Civil and Military Subordination; another into the System of Military Defence. "It was during these labors," says D'Israeli, "I beheld this inquirer, of a tender frame, emaciated, and study-worn, with hollow eyes, where the mind dimly shone like a lamp in a tomb. With keen ardor he opened a new plan of biographical politics. When, by one who wished the author was in better condition, the dangers of excess in study were brought to his recollection, he smiled, and, with something of a mysterious air, talked of unalterable confidence in the powers of his mind; of the indefinite improvement in our faculties; and, with this enfeebled frame, considered himself capable of continuous labor. His whole life, indeed, was one melancholy trial. Often the day cheerfully passed without its meal, but never without its page. The new system of political biography was advancing, when our young author felt a paralytic stroke. He afterwards resumed his pen, and a second one proved fatal. He lived just to pass through the press his Lives of British Statesmen, a splendid quarto, whose publication he owed to the generous temper of a friend, who, when the author could not readily procure a publisher, would not see the dying author's last hope disappointed. Some research and reflection are combined in this literary and civil history of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; but it was written with the blood of the author, for Macdiarmid died of over study and exhaustion.

292. HAZLITT'S DEATH BED.

William Hazlitt was hailed at the commencement of his term of authorship as a star. Vast things were predicted of him; and he, looking at the flattering picture, presaged a happy voyage through life. But how soon was the scene changed! His determined bent of thought having been ascertained to be on the popular side, he was soon marked down as a fit object for legal calumny — the fitter because the more conspicuous. We use the term legal calumny with the intention of distinguishing that sort of wrong from illegal calumny, or libel. To say he was an infidel, that his associates were the same, to assail the integrity of his opinions and the motives from which he supported them, were the lightest missiles hurled at him by his enemies.

The harassing nature of his occupation, the periodical supply of a certain quantum of copy, at length produced its effect. Those alone who are doomed to the same drudgery can appreciate our simile when we liken the press to "the horseleech, which cries, Give! give!" and this eternal cry, together with the application of stimuli to enable him to supply the demand, brought on that depravation of the stomach which is the usual effect of such a course of life.

Reluctantly, nay, tremblingly, do we lift the veil which hangs over the death bed of poor Hazlitt. Imagine this highly-gifted man stretched on a couch in the back room of a second floor, his only child, and Martin, his faithful companion and friend, watching over him. Others were not deficient in their attentions, and in providing the means of existence for him; for know, reader, that the death bed of this author was not distinguished by the circumstance of his possessing wherewith to support life when exertion was not in his power. It seems that some sudden turn of memory caused a pang in the dying man's bosom; and, calling to one whom we shall conceal under the name of Basilus,* he gently said, "Basilus, stoop down, and let me talk to you."

Basilus, (crouching by the bed side.) — What can I do for you, my dear Hazlitt?

Hazlitt. — Rid me of a pang.

Basilus. — Willingly, dear friend.

Hazlitt. — Lend me forty pounds.

Basilus. — Forty pounds? Dear Hazlitt, what can you want with forty pounds?

Hazlitt. — Lend me forty pounds.

Basilus. — Do not talk so, my dear Hazlitt. You cannot want forty pounds.

Hazlitt. — I know — I know, Basilus, what I ask. Lend it me — lend it me — I want it. 'Twill ease my mind — I want it. Lend it me; and think, Basilus, think what the world will say when it is known that you lent a dying man forty pounds without a hope of being repaid.

The argument of Hazlitt did not prevail. Very shortly after, he said to Martin, (whose attendance was constant,) "Martin, come here."

Martin approached.

Hazlitt. — Martin, I want you to write a letter for me, (starting up with energy.) Swear you'll do it.

* To the gentleman thus designated poor Hazlitt was already under deep obligations.

Martin went through the ceremony of an oath.

Hazlitt. — Now write, "Dear sir."

Martin. — "Dear sir."

Hazlitt. — "I am at the last gasp."

Martin. — "I am at the last gasp."

Hazlitt. — "Pray send me a hundred pounds."

Martin. — "Pray send me a hundred pounds."

Hazlitt. — "Yours truly —"

Martin. — "Yours truly —"

Hazlitt. — "William Hazlitt."

Martin. — "William Hazlitt."

Hazlitt. — Now fold the letter.

Martin folded it.

Hazlitt. — Write, To Francis Jeffrey, Esq., Edinburgh.

Martin superscribed the letter.

Hazlitt. — Now I am satisfied.

Martin. — Shall I not put in a word, Hazlitt, explaining who wrote it?

Hazlitt, (starting up.) Swear, Martin, you won't do so; swear you'll send it as it is.

Martin sent the letter: Hazlitt died soon after; and on the day subsequent to his death, a letter from Jeffrey arrived with an enclosure of fifty pounds.

Hone called on the previous day; he met a physician who had attended Hazlitt at the door, about to depart. "How is your patient, sir?" inquired Hone. "'Tis all over," replied the medical man. "Clinically speaking, he ought to have died two days ago. He seemed to live, during the last eight and forty hours, purely in obedience to his own will." A third person, who had just come up, here observed, "He was waiting, perhaps, until return of post, for Jeffrey's reply. What he could have wanted with that forty pounds, is a perfect mystery."

A few months before, Hone had met Hazlitt in the street, and kindly inquired as to his health and circumstances. Both were bad. "You are aware," said Hazlitt, "of some of my difficulties — those dreadful bills — those back accounts; but no human being knows ALL. I have carried a volcano in my bosom, up and down Paternoster Row, for a good two hours and a half. Even now I struggle — struggle mortally to quench — to quell it; but I can't. Its pent-up throes and agonies, I fear, will break out. Can you lend me A SHILLING? I have been WITHOUT FOOD THESE TWO DAYS!"

To state what Hone felt and did, on hearing this, would be needless.

293. CIBBER'S DAUGHTER.

It is well known that Colley Cibber had a daughter named Charlotte, who, like him, took to the stage. Her subsequent life was one continued series of misfortune, affliction, and distress, which she sometimes contrived a little to alleviate by the productions of her pen. About the year 1755, she had worked up a novel for the press, which the writer of this anecdote accompanied his friend the bookseller to hear read. She was at this time a widow, having been married to one Clarke, a musician, long since dead. Her habitation was a wretched thatched hovel, situated on the way to Islington, in the purlions of Clerkenwell Bridewell, not very distant from the New River Head, where at that time it was usual for the scavengers to leave the cleanings of the streets, and the priests of Cloacina to deposit the offerings from the temples of that all-worshipped power. The night preceding, a heavy rain had fallen, which rendered this extraordinary seat of the Muses almost inaccessible, so that, in our approach, we got our white stockings enveloped with mud up to the very calves, which furnished an appearance much in the present fashionable style of half boots. We knocked at the door, (not attempting to pull the latch string,) which was opened by a tall, meagre, ragged figure, with a blue apron, indicating, what else we might have doubted, the feminine gender; a perfect model for the copper captain's tattered land lady — that deplorable exhibition of the fair sex in the comedy of Rule a Wife. She, with a torpid voice and hungry smile, desired us to walk in. The first object that presented itself was a dresser, clean, it must be confessed, and furnished with three or four coarse delf plates, two brown platters, and underneath an earthen pipkin, and a black pitcher with a snip out of it. To the right I perceived and bowed to the mistress of the mansion, sitting on a maimed chair under the mantelpiece, by a fire merely sufficient to put us in mind of freezing. On one hob sat a monkey, which, by way of welcome, chattered at our going in; on the other, a tabby cat, of melancholy aspect; and at the author's feet, on the founce of her dingy petticoat, reclined a dog, almost a skeleton. He raised his shaggy head, and, eagerly staring with his bleared eyes, saluted us with a snarl. "Have done, Fiddle! these are friends." The tone of her voice was not harsh; it had something in it humbled and disconsolate — a mingled effort of authority and pleasure. Poor soul! few were her visitors of that description — no wonder the creature barked. A magpie perched on the top ring of the chair, not an uncomely ornament; and on her lap was placed a mutilated pair of bellows; the pipe was gone — an advantage in their present office. They served as a succedaneum for a writing desk, on which lay displayed her hopes and treasures — the manuscript of her novel. Her inkstand was a broken teacup, the pen worn to a stump; she had but one. A rough deal board, with three hobbling supporters, was brought for our convenience, on which, without further ceremony, we contrived to sit down, and enter upon business. The work was read, remarks made, alterations agreed on, and thirty guineas demanded for the copy. The squalid handmaiden, who had been an attentive listener, stretched forward her tawny length of neck with an eye of anxious expectation. The bookseller offered five. Our authoress did not appear hurt; disappointments had rendered her mind callous. However, some altercation ensued. This was the writer's first initiation into the mysteries of bibliopolism and the state of authorcraft. He, seeing both sides pertinacious, at length interposed, and at his instance the wary haberdasher of literature doubled his first proposal, with this saving proviso, that his friend present would pay a moiety, and run one half the risk; which was agreed upon. Thus matters were accommodated, seemingly to the satisfaction of all parties, the lady's original stipulation of fifty copies for herself being previously agreed to. Such is the story of the once admired daughter of Colley Cibber, poet laureate and patentee of Drury Lane, who was born in affluence, and educated with care and tenderness, her servants in livery, and a splendid equipage at her command, with swarms of time-serving sycophants officiously buzzing in her train. Yet, unmindful of her advantages, and improvident in her pursuits, she finished the career of her miserable existence on a dunghill. The account given of this unfortunate woman is literally correct in every particular, of which the writer was an eye witness.

294. HEADLEY'S DISASTER.

A sad disaster befell Mr. Headley, while he was engaged in the composition of his Washington and his Generals. The chambermaid, who was "fixing" his room, took it into her head one morning to clean his windows during his absence, and, seeing a pile of papers in his desk, "all scribbled over," she took them for wipers, and destroyed nearly the first volume of Washington and his Generals, so that the author had all his work to do over again.

§ 25. PERSECUTIONS.

295. SIR THOMAS MORE.

The singularity of Sir Thomas More was not only conspicuous in his writings, but in his conversation, his professional exertions, and even in his devotion. He was in a very peculiar manner the object of the caprice of a monarch, who was, perhaps, the strangest compound of luxury, libidinousness, hypocrisy, cruelty, credulity, and superstition, that ever was stamped with the image of man, or blazoned with the title of sovereign. In the year 1520, Sir Thomas settled with his family at Chelsea, having purchased an estate there. He had resided in Chancery Lane, in a house standing in 1822. At Chelsea, it is said, Henry VIII. would sometimes, uninvited, dine with the man, whom he afterwards, upon the most frivolous pretence, consigned to the block. The account which Erasmus gives of the manner of Sir Thomas More's living at Chelsea exhibits a picture of domestic happiness. "His house," he says, "was situated near the water side, neither so mean as to be entitled to contempt, nor so magnificent as to become the subject of envy. There he converseth with his wife, his son, his daughter-in-law, his three daughters and their three husbands, with eleven grandchildren. There is not any man living so affectionate to his children as he; and he loveth his old wife as well as if she was a young maid."

296. SIR WALTER RALEIGH.

Sir Walter Raleigh, who was frequently distinguished by the title of the noble and valorous knight, and whose works have placed him in an important rank in the history of English literature, was doomed to pass the best period of his life in captivity. The reign of James I. may be praised for its pacific character; but as long as the name of Raleigh shall be remembered will that reign be stained with one of the foulest crimes a monarch could commit.

Almost immediately after the accession of King James in 1603, Raleigh was imprisoned on a charge of treason, tried at Winchester in November of the same year, and condemned to die. He was, however, reprieved, and confined a close prisoner in the Tower, where he remained for upwards of fourteen years. During his confinement, he devoted great part of his time to his studies; and the productions of his pen at this time were so numerous, that he rather resembled a collegian than a captive, a student in a library than a prisoner in the Tower. His principal work, the History of the World, was written and published during his confinement. He was at length released from the Tower in March, 1615; had the king's commission for a voyage to Guiana, which he made in 1671; but being unsuccessful, the old sentence was revived against him on his return home, and he was sent to the scaffold, to the eternal disgrace of the pusillanimous monarch, whose conduct in this affair gained him the indignation of his contemporaries and of posterity.

297. LAUD AND LEIGHTON.

The first victim of Laud's severity was Dr. Leighton, who had been professor of moral philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, and was father of the archbishop of that name. He was brought before the Star Chamber for having written a book in which the ecclesiastical administration was censured; and for this offence he was sentenced to be twice publicly whipped, to be set twice in the pillory, to have his nose slit, and his ears cut each time, to be branded in both cheeks, to be imprisoned for life, and to pay 10,000*l.* to the king. All this was faithfully executed, the fine probably excepted, and he was liberated, after eleven years confinement, by the Long Parliament, in 1640, being then 72 years of age.

298. HARRINGTON AND SYDNEY.

Cromwell was alarmed when he saw the Oceana of Harrington, and dreaded the effects of that volume more than the plots of the royalists; while Charles II. trembled at an author only in his manuscript state; and in the height of terror, and to the honor of genius, it was decreed that "scribere est agere."

Algernon Sydney was condemned to death for certain manuscripts found in his library; and the reason alleged was, that scribere est agere—that to write is to act. The papers which served to condemn Sydney, it appears, were only answers to Filmer's obsolete Defence of Monarchical Tyranny.

299. FENELON'S BANISHMENT.

"The true reason of Fenelon's being banished from the court was the honesty he showed in not advising Louis XIV. to own his marriage with Madame de Maintenon. The king had asked Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, his opinion in that affair, who spoke much praise of the lady, and advised what he saw would best please the king; but added, that if his majesty had the opinion of the Archbishop of Cambray on his side, it would be of much more weight and use than any one's else. On this, the king consulted the archbishop, who (as his enemy had foreseen,) was not courtier enough to say any thing to encourage such a declaration; and, on the contrary, gave some hints of the prejudice it might be to his majesty's affairs, in their situation at the time. This soured the king very much against him, as he expected it would; and after, Madame de Maintenon and her creatures insinuated it into the king that Fenelon had had the insolence of designing to represent his majesty under the character of Idomeneus, in his Telemachus, and both him and the lady (in part) under those of Pygmalion and Astarte. This finished his disgrace."

300. DR. DRAKE.

The English political author, Dr. James Drake, was a man of genius, and an excellent writer. He resigned an honorable profession, that of medicine, to adopt a very contrary one, that of becoming an author by profession for a party. As a tory writer, he dared every extremity of the law, while he evaded it by every subtlety of artifice. He sent a masked lady with his manuscript to the printer, who was never discovered, and was once saved by a flaw in the indictment, from the simple change of an r for a t, or nor for not — one of those shameful evasions by which the law, to its perpetual disgrace, so often protects the criminal from punishment. Dr. Drake had the honor of hearing himself censured from the throne, of being imprisoned, of seeing his Memorials of the Church of England burned at London, and his Historia Anglo-Scotia at Edinburgh. Having enlisted himself in the pay of the booksellers, among other works, I suspect, he condescended to practise some literary impositions; for he has reprinted Father Parson's famous libel against the Earl of Leicester, in Elizabeth's time, under the title of Secret Memoirs of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, 1706, 8vo., with a preface, pretending it was printed from an old manuscript.

Drake was a lover of literature; he left behind him a version of Herodotus, and a System of Anatomy, once the most popular and curious of its kind. After all this turmoil of his literary life, neither his masked lady nor the flaws in his indictments availed him. Government brought a writ of error, and severely prosecuted him; and abandoned, as usual, by those for whom he had annihilated a genius which deserved a better fate, his perturbed spirit broke out into a fever, and he died raving against cruel persecutors, and patrons not much more humane.

301. KING WILLIAM AND THE DANISH AMBASSADOR.

Lord Molesworth, who had resided at Copenhagen as ambassador from England, published an Account of Denmark, a valuable work, and held in
In it he made some severe remarks upon the despotic form of the Danish government. The King of Denmark, offended at what he termed the insolence of the author, ordered his minister at the court of England to make a complaint to King William III. "What would you have me do?" said King William, in answer to the remonstrance of the Dane. "Sir," replied the minister, "if your majesty had complained to the king my master of a similar offence, ere now he would have sent to you the author's head." "This," replied William, "I have neither the power nor the inclination to do; but, if you choose it, Lord Molesworth shall insert what you have just now suggested to me in the second edition of his work."

302. INCREDIBLE PUNISHMENT.

"A great book is a great evil," says an ancient writer, an axiom which an unfortunate Russian author felt to his cost.

"Whilst I was at Moscow," says a traveller, "a quarto volume was published in favor of the liberties of the people, a singular subject, when we consider the place where the book was printed. In this work, the iniquitous venality of the public functionaries, and even the conduct of the sovereign, was scrutinized and censured with great freedom. Such a book, and in such a country, naturally attracted general notice, and the offender was taken into custody. After being tried in a summary way, his production was determined to be a libel, and he was condemned to eat his own words. The singularity of such a sentence induced me to see it put into execution. A scaffold was erected in one of the most public streets in the city; the imperial provost, the magistrates, the physicians and surgeons of the czar, attended; the book was separated from the binding, the margin cut off, and every leaf rolled up like a lottery ticket when taken out of the wheel. The author was then served with them leaf by leaf, by the provost, who put them into his mouth, to the no small diversion of the spectators; and he was obliged to swallow this unpalatable food, on pain of the knout, in Russia more feared than death. As soon as the medical gentlemen were of opinion that he had received into his stomach as much at a time as was consistent with his safety, the transgressor was sent back to prison, and the business was resumed the two following days. After three very hearty, but unpleasant meals, I am convinced, by ocular proof, that every leaf of the book was actually swallowed."

§ 26. OCCASION AND ORIGIN OF NOTED WORKS.

303. ASCHAM'S SCHOOLMASTER.

An accident occasioned Roger Ascham to write his Schoolmaster, one of the most curious and useful treatises of our elder writers.

At a dinner given by Sir William Cecil, during the plague in 1563, at his apartments at Windsor, where the queen had taken refuge, a number of ingenious men were invited. Secretary Cecil communicated the news of the morning, that several scholars at Eton had run away on account of their master's severity, which he condemned as a great error in the education of youth. Sir William Petre maintained the contrary; severe in his own temper, he pleaded warmly in defence of hard flogging. Dr. Wotton, in softer tones, sided with the secretary. Sir John Mason, adopting no side, bantered both. Mr. Haddon seconded the hard-hearted Sir William Petre, and adduced, as an evidence that the best schoolmaster then in England was the hardest flogger. Then was it that Roger Ascham indignantly exclaimed, that if such a master had an able scholar, it was owing to the boy's genius, and not the preceptor's rod. Secretary Cecil and others were pleased with Ascham's notions. Sir Richard Sackville was silent; but when Ascham, after dinner, went to the queen to read one of the orations of Demosthenes, he took him aside, and frankly told him that, though he had taken no part in the debate, he would not have been absent from that conversation for a great deal; that he knew to his cost the truth Ascham had supported; for it was the perpetual flogging of such a schoolmaster that had given him an unconquerable aversion to study, and, as he wished to remedy this defect in his own children, he earnestly exhorted Ascham to write his observations on so interesting a topic. Such was the circumstance which produced the admirable treatise of Roger Ascham.

304. POLIGNAC'S ANTI-LUCRETII.

Cardinal Polignac formed the design of refuting the arguments of the sceptics which Bayle had been renewing in his dictionary; but his public occupations hindered him. Two exiles at length fortunately gave him the leisure, and the Anti-Lucretius is the fruit of the court disgraces of its author.

305. GEOFFREY CRAYON'S SKETCHES

Geoffrey Crayon (Irving) and Wilkie, the painter, were fellow-travellers on the continent some years since. In their rambles about some of the old cities of Spain, they were more than once struck with scenes and incidents which reminded them of passages in the Arabian Nights. The painter urged Mr. Irving to write something that should illustrate those peculiarities—"something in the Haroun al Raschid style,"—which should have a deal of that Arabian spice which pervades every thing in Spain. The author set to work con amore, and produced two goodly volumes of arabesque sketches and tales, founded on popular traditions. His study was the Washington Irving.

Alhambra, and the governor of the palace gave Irving and Wilkie permission to occupy his vacant apartments there. Wilkie was soon called away by the duties of his station, but Washington Irving remained for several months, spell-bound in the old enchanted pile. "How many legends," says he, "and traditions, true and fabulous—how many songs and romances, Spanish and Arabian, of love, and war, and chivalry, are associated with this romantic pile!"

§ 27. AMUSING AND LAUGHABLE INCIDENTS.

306. MORE AND ERASMUS.

It has been said to have been delightful to witness the wit-combats between Ben Jonson and Shakspeare. A similar delight must much earlier have been felt by those who were present at the encounters between More and Erasmus, on his visit to England. Their meeting without introduction at the lord mayor's table illustrated the vein of humor in them both. They had been long known to each other by epistolary correspondence. One of Erasmus's objects, in one of his journeys to England, was to become personally acquainted with his friend. But it was contrived by their host that they should not be introduced, but find each other out. They engaged in an argument at dinner. Erasmus felt himself pressed by his opponent's playful sarcasm, and exclaimed, "You are More, for you can be no one else." And More retorted, "If you are not Erasmus, you must be the devil."

307. ARRANGING AUTHORS AT TABLE.

"I knew a person," says Menage, "who occasionally gave entertainments to authors. His fancy was to place them at table, each according to the size and thickness of the volumes they had published, commencing with the folio authors, and proceeding through the quarto and octavo, down to the duodecimo, each according to his rank."

308. A HOAX.

Chambers's Edinburgh Journal contains a sketch of the life of Antoine Galland, a celebrated French author, who died in 1715. We are indebted to this sketch for the following anecdote:—

"Though the author of many learned and important works, that which has made him popular is the Thousand and One Nights. On the appearance of the first volumes of this work, a singular hoax was played off on the author. One very cold night, in the middle of winter, Antoine Galland was suddenly awakened by several knocks at the street door. He got up, threw his dressing-gown hastily around him, ran to the window, opened it, and, in spite of the darkness, perceived several persons assembled at his door. 'Who is there?' said he.

"Several voices instantly answered, 'Is this Monsieur Galland's?'

"'Yes,' replied he.

"'Are you sure?' inquired they, again.

"'Quite sure,' said Galland.

"'Take notice,' said one of the persons below, 'that what we have got to say can only be said to himself.'

"Then you may speak freely, for I am Antoine Galland; but speak quickly, for the wind is blowing in my face in no very agreeable manner."

"Do you speak," said one of the interlocutors to his neighbor.

"Speak yourself," rejoined he.

"No, I must speak," said a third.

"Ah, gentlemen, you must let me have a word," exclaimed a fourth.

"For the love of Heaven, gentlemen," cried Galland, who was perishing with cold, "make haste: I am freezing."

"The same colloquy recommenced, and Galland, who had been listening with wondrous patience, again exclaimed, still shivering, 'For the love of Heaven, gentlemen, make haste, for the cold is

"At last all the young people who had disturbed the sleep of the orientalist joined in one chorus, 'Ah, Monsieur Galland, if you are not asleep, tell us one of those stories which you tell so well.'

"This was in allusion to the two first volumes of the Thousand and One Nights, in which every chapter begins thus: 'My dear sister, if you are not asleep, tell us one of those stories which you tell so well.'

"Antoine Galland had too much sense to be angry at this sally; he began to laugh, and replying, 'Gentlemen, au revoir!' he closed the window, and returned to his bed, where he was not long before he regained some of the caloric which he had lost at the window. He, however, profited by the lesson, and published all his other volumes without this exordium."

309. VOLTAIRE AND THE MOB.

Voltaire, when in England, after his release from the Bastille, whither he had been sent for libel, lodged in Maiden Lane, at the White Peruke, a wigmaker's shop. When walking out, he was often annoyed by the mob, who beheld, in his spare person, polite manners, and satirical countenance, the personification of their notion of a Frenchman. One day he was beset by so great a crowd that he was forced to shelter himself against a door-way, where, mounting the steps, he made a flaming speech in English in praise of the magnanimity of the English nation, and their love of freedom. With this the people were so delighted, that their jeers were turned into applause, and he was carried in triumph to Maiden Lane on the shoulders of the mob; from which temporary elevation the arch-scoffer doubtless looked upon his dupes with glee, suppressed, but immeasurable.

310. PIRON AND VOLTAIRE.

Piron one morning, going into the house of the Marquis de Mimenre, found Voltaire buried to the shoulders in a large chair, his legs spread, and his heels resting one on each arm of the chair.

He received Piron with a slight inclination of the head, in return for five or six profound bows. Piron took a chair, and seated himself as near the fire as possible. A dry conversation soon dropped. The one pulled out his watch; the other his snuff-box: the one laid hold of the tongue; the other took snuff. Voltaire sneezed; Piron blew his nose: the former yawned profoundly; Piron was about to follow in the same way, when Voltaire drew from his pocket a crust of bread, and began to crunch it between his teeth, with so extraordinary a noise, as to astonish his companion. Piron, without loss of a moment, pulled out a flask of wine, and emptied it at a draught. Voltaire lost his temper. "Sir," he said, addressing Piron, "I can take raillery as well as another, but your pleasantry, if it is such, is very much mistimed." "No raillery," answered Piron; "all the merest chance." Voltaire interrupted him, saying he had just escaped from an attack of illness, which had left him with a continual desire to eat. "Eat, sir, by all means eat," replied the author of Metromanie, "you do right; and I, sir, have just escaped from Burgundy with a continual desire to drink, and I do drink."

311. VOLTAIRE AND THE PAGE.

Voltaire, being once on a visit to Frederick the Great, was attended at dinner by a page, to whom he called for something which the page either could not, or probably would not, immediately execute; for his illiberality and ambiguous character made him disliked by every one in court. Offended at the tardiness of the page, Voltaire immediately flew into a violent passion, as usual, to which he gave vent by loading him with a volley of opprobrious names, particularly with that of Pomeranian clown.

The page, who dared not, in the presence of the king, express his resentment at the unmannerly insult of the Frenchman, in the mean time was determined to watch an opportunity of making him feel his just vengeance. The following day the king undertook a journey, on which he was accompanied by Voltaire and another gentleman of the bed-chamber. The page, having received orders to attend, rode with some others of the household, in order to prepare accommodations on the road. In the first carriage sat the king with one of his officers of state, and, in the second, Voltaire on the right hand, and the other gentleman of the bed-chamber on the left. Previously to their arrival at a village, where they intended to take a breakfast, and where the carriages had to stop before the house, the page had informed a number of peasants assembled there that in the first carriage was the king; but that in the second was the king's favorite monkey, dressed like a gentleman, seated aside of his attendant; that the monkey had the vicious habit of teasing persons whenever he was suffered to leave the coach, when he would often fly at their faces and belabor them most unmercifully. In order to avoid this, he desired that some of them might attend at the coach door, and, on the gentleman to the left getting out, immediately shut it again, and that, should he cut capers, and endeavor to get out, they need only give him a few raps on his meagre knuckles. This the peasants promised to execute with attention. The coaches arriving soon after, the king alighted, and was followed by the gentleman in the second, and the door immediately closed again. Voltaire endeavored to express the resentment he felt at this insult offered to so illustrious a personage, by shaking his head, and using every gesture in his power; but all was in vain. The peasants, who had, by this time, collected in considerable numbers, and who all believed him to be a monkey, began to laugh heartily at the trick, and threatened him with their sticks. He began to rail at them in French, which none of them understanding, they only deemed it a monkey trick, and continued to laugh still more at him. The noise and collection of so many people at last attracted the attention of the king, so that he went to the window, and, surprised at the concourse of people around the coach door, inquired what was the matter. Being informed that it was Voltaire, still sitting in the carriage surrounded by the country people, he immediately sent some of his attendants for an explanation why he remained in the carriage, and if he did not intend to take his breakfast.

With some difficulty and force they succeeded in extricating him from the hands of the peasants, who, finding that they no longer could prevent the escape of this vicious or enraged animal, and dreading lest he should make them feel his resentment the more furiously, immediately separated and fled in all directions with the utmost speed, and as far as possible, each being apprehensive that the detested creature might fasten on his neck or body, and ply him with his teeth and claws.

At last Voltaire joined the company up stairs, and complained to his majesty of the brutality of these savage boors. Exasperated on hearing the details of the treatment, the king immediately gave orders for an inquiry into the motives which had induced the peasants to commit such an outrage.

Some of the fugitives being speedily overtaken, the examination commenced, when the sad mistake of the innocent peasants was explained; they added, that a gentleman belonging to his majesty's suite had occasioned this excess; and by pointing him out at last, they proved their harmless intention. The king immediately demanded to know why he had undertaken such a trick, and was frankly informed by the latter that it was intended as a retaliation for the insult offered to his countrymen by the supercilious Frenchman, and to prove to the scoffer that the Germans were not altogether so stupid as Voltaire imagined. This honest confession at once disarmed the king's anger; but, to appease the fury of Voltaire, he ordered the page to be put under arrest for a few hours, and often indulged in a smile on recollecting this ludicrous adventure.

312. VOLTAIRE AND HIS EAGLE.

Voltaire took great delight in a young eagle which he kept chained in the court of his chateau at Ferney. One day the eagle fell to fighting with two cocks, and was severely wounded. Voltaire, disconsolate, sent an express to Geneva, with directions to bring a man who passed there as a pretty expert animal doctor. In his impatience, he did nothing but move between the cage of the eagle, and the window of his apartment, from which he had a view of the great road. At length his courier appeared, and, along with him, the Æsculapius so much wished for. Voltaire raised a cry of joy, flew to meet him, gave him a most distinguished reception, and lavished on him prayers and promises to interest him for his sick favorite. The man, astonished at a reception to which he was little accustomed, examined the wounds of the eagle. Voltaire, full of anxiety, sought to read in his eyes his hopes and fears. The doctor declared, with the air of a professor, that he would not venture to pronounce on the case until after the first dressing was removed, but promised to repeat his visit on the morrow, and departed, handsomely paid. On the morrow, Voltaire was on thorns, and at last the decision was that the physician could not answer for the life of the eagle—a new source of disquietude. Voltaire's first question every morning to one of his servants, named Madeline, whose business it was to wake him, was, "How is my eagle?" "Very poorly, sir; very poorly." One day, at length, Madeline answered, laughing, "Ah, sir, your eagle is no longer sick." "It is cured, then? What happiness!" "No; it is dead!" "Dead! my eagle dead! and this you tell me laughing!" "Why, sir, it was so lean, it is all the better dead." "How, lean!" exclaimed Voltaire in a rage; "an excellent reason, truly! I suppose you must kill me, also, because I am lean. You baggage! to laugh at the death of my poor eagle because it was lean! Because you are in good condition yourself, you think it is only people of your stamp that should have a right to live. Out of my sight! Begone!" Madame Dennis, hearing the noise, ran to her uncle, and asked what had discomposed him. Voltaire told her the particulars, continuing to repeat, "Lean! lean! So, then, I must be killed, too—" At length, he insisted that Madeline should be dismissed. His niece feigned compliance, and ordered the poor girl to keep herself out of sight in the chateau; and it was only after two months that Voltaire asked about her. "She is very unfortunate," said Madame Dennis, "she has not succeeded in getting a place at Geneva, which happens from its being known that she was turned off from the chateau." "It is all her own fault. Why laugh at the death of my eagle because it was lean? However, she must not be allowed to starve; let her come back; but let her beware of presenting herself before me: do you hear?" Madame Dennis promised she should not, and upon this Madeline came forth from her concealment, but carefully kept out of the way of her master. One day, however, Voltaire, rising from table, found her standing opposite to him; Madeline colored, and, with downcast eyes, wished to stammer out some excuses: "Not a word more of it," said he; "but mind you, at least, that it is not necessary to kill every thing which happens to be lean."

313. CROWE'S RETORT ON JOHNSON.

Dr. Johnson was not a little disconcerted by an unexpected retort made upon him before a large party at Oxford, by Dr. Crowe. The principles of our lexicographer ran with too much violence in one way not to foam a little when they met with a current running equally strong in another. The dispute happened to turn upon the origin of whiggism; for Johnson had triumphantly challenged Dr. Crowe to tell him who was the first whig. The latter finding himself a little puzzled, Dr. Johnson tauntingly rejoined, "I see, sir, that you are even ignorant of the head of your own party; but I will tell you, sir: the devil was the first whig; he was the first reformer; he wanted to set up a reform even in heaven!" Dr. Crowe calmly replied, "I am much obliged to you for your information, and I certainly did not foresee that you would go so far back for your authority; yet I rather fear that your argument makes against yourself: for if the devil was a whig, you have admitted that, while he was a whig, he was in heaven; but you have forgotten that, the moment he got into hell, he set up for a tory." The wit of Dr. Johnson, though coarse and rough, was usually so pointed and far-sighted as to admit of no cutting and annihilating rejoinder, as in the present case. But he had met his match.

314. BOSWELL EAVESDROPPING.

James Boswell.

"The moment Johnson's voice burst forth, the attention which it excited on Mr. Boswell amounted almost to pain. His eyes goggled with eagerness, he leaned his ear almost on the shoulder of the doctor, and his mouth dropped open to catch every syllable that might be uttered; nay, he seemed not only to dread losing a word, but to be anxious not to miss a breathing, as if hoping from it latently, or mystically, some information.

"On one occasion, the doctor detected Boswell, or Bozzy, as he called him, eavesdropping behind his chair, as he was conversing with Miss Burney at Mr. Thrale's table. 'What are you doing there, sir?' cried he, turning round angrily, and clapping his hand upon his knee. 'Go to the table, sir!'

"Boswell obeyed with an air of affright and submission, which raised a smile on every face. Scarcely had he taken his seat, however, at a distance, than, impatient to get again at the side of Johnson, he rose, and was running off in quest of something to show him, when the doctor roared after him authoritatively, 'What are you thinking of, sir? Why do you get up before the cloth is removed? Come back to your place, sir;' and the obsequious spaniel did as he was commanded. 'Running about in the middle of meals!' muttered the doctor, pursing his mouth at the same time to restrain his rising risibility.

"Boswell got another rebuff from Johnson, which would have demolished any other man. He had been teasing him with many direct questions, such as, 'What did you do, sir?' 'What did you say, sir?' until the great philologist became perfectly enraged. 'I will not be put to the question!' roared he. 'Don't you consider, sir, that these are not the manners of a gentleman? I will not be baited with what and why. What is this? What is that? Why is a cow's tail long? Why is a fox's tail bushy?' 'Why, sir,' replied Pilgarte, 'you are so good that I venture to trouble you.' 'Sir,' replied Johnson, 'my being so good is no reason why you should be so ill.' 'You have but two topics, sir,' exclaimed he, on another occasion, 'yourself and me, and I am sick of both.'"

315. BOSWELL'S SYSTEM.

A gentleman of the name of Lowe, having got Dr. Johnson to write a letter for him, was on the point of taking his leave, when Boswell, who had come in while the doctor was writing the letter, followed Mr. Lowe out. "Nothing," says Mr. Lowe, "could surprise me more. Till that moment, he had so entirely overlooked me, that I did not imagine he knew there was such a creature in existence, and he now accosted me with the most overstrained and insinuating compliments possible. 'How do you do, Mr. Lowe? I hope you are very well, Mr. Lowe. Pardon my freedom, Mr. Lowe; but I think I saw my dear friend, Dr. Johnson, writing a letter for you.' 'Yes, sir.' 'I hope you will not think me rude; but if it will not be too great a favor, you would infinitely oblige me, if you would just let me have a sight of it; every thing from that hand, you know, is inestimable.' 'Sir, it is my own private affairs, but——' 'I would not pry into a person's affairs, my dear Mr. Lowe, by any means; I am sure you would not accuse me of such a thing; only if it were no particular secret——' 'Sir, you are welcome to read the letter.' 'I thank you, my dear Mr. Lowe, you are very obliging, I take it exceedingly kind.' Having read,—'It is nothing, I believe, Mr. Lowe, that you would be ashamed of.' 'Certainly not.' 'Why, then, my dear sir, if you would do me another favor, you render the obligation eternal. If you would but step to Peele's Coffee-house with me, and just suffer me to take a copy of it, I would do any thing in my power to oblige you.' I was overcome, said Lowe, by this sudden familiarity and condescension, accompanied with bows and grimaces. I had no power to refuse; we went to the coffee-house, my letter was presently transcribed, and as soon as he had put the document in his pocket, Mr. Boswell walked away, as erect and as proud as he was half an hour before, and I ever afterwards was unnoticed; nay, I am not certain, added he, sarcastically, whether the Scotsman did not leave me, poor as he knew I was, to pay for my own dish of coffee."

316. JOHNSON SLIGHTED

Sir Joshua Reynolds used to relate a characteristic anecdote of Johnson. About the time of their first acquaintance, when they were one evening together at the Miss Cotterells, the then Duchess of Argyll and another lady of high rank came in. Johnson thinking that the Miss Cotterells were too much engrossed by them, and that he and his friend were neglected as low company, of whom they were somewhat ashamed, grew angry, and resolved to shock their supposed pride, by making their great visitors imagine they were low indeed. He addressed himself in a loud tone to Mr. Reynolds, saying, "How much do you think you and I could get a week, if we were to work as hard as we could?" as if they had been common mechanics.

317. DR. JOHNSON TOASTING UGLY WOMEN.

Dr. Johnson sitting one evening at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, in company with a number of ladies and gentlemen of his acquaintance, the former, by way of heightening the good humor of the company, agreed to toast ugly women, and to have them matched with ugly men. In this round, one of the ladies gave Mrs. Williams, (the well-known inmate of Dr. Johnson, who was very plain in her person, and nearly blind,) when another instantly paired her with Dr. Goldsmith. This whimsical union set the company laughing, and in particular so pleased the lady who gave the first toast, that though she had some pique with the lady who gave Dr. Goldsmith, she ran round the table, kissed her, and said she forgave her every thing for the apropos of the toast. Johnson, who did not half like to have two of his most intimate friends turned into ridicule, growled out, "Ay, this puts me in mind of an observation of Swift's, who truly remarks, that the quarrels of women are always made up like the quarrels of ancient kings: there is always an animal sacrificed on the occasion."

318. OTHER IRONS IN THE FIRE.

Mrs. B—— desired Dr. Johnson to give his opinion of a new work she had just written; adding, that, if it would not do, she begged him to tell her, for she had other irons in the fire, and in case of its not being likely to succeed, she could bring out something else. "Then," said the doctor, after having turned over a few of the leaves, "I advise you, madam, to put it where your other irons are."

319. MELCOMBE AND SHEBBEARE.

When Lord Melcombe, then Bubb Doddington, was in the train of the Princess Dowager of Wales, he observed one day a pamphlet lying in one of the ante-chambers, which, upon perusal, he found reflected very sharply on many of the characters and intrigues of the court. The princess saw him reading it, and asked him what he thought of it? He replied, that "it was a very artful, libellous performance, and might occasion some prejudices against her royal highness's servants if not immediately answered; and if your royal highness," said he, "will permit me to take it home, I believe I could answer it myself." The princess thanked him for his kindness, and he took the book with him.

However, not having time, or perhaps inclination, to fulfil his promise, he sent for Dr. Shebbeare, with whom he had some intimacy, and whom he knew to be an author by profession, and told him if he had leisure to sit down and answer that pamphlet, he would be obliged to him, and he should be well paid into the bargain. Shebbeare, running his eye rather carelessly over the book, said it should be done. "Ay, but," said Doddington, "I wish to have it done well, as I have undertaken it immediately under the sanction of the princess; and to tell you the truth, though I have a very good opinion of your general knowledge, I am afraid you do not readily see the gist of this fellow's reasoning." Shebbeare, a little nettled at this, threw down the book in a kind of passion, and exclaimed, "Why this is harsh censure, not to allow an author to understand his own work." "What do you mean?" said Doddington, quite astonished. "Why, I mean to say, I wrote this pamphlet, and therefore I think I know how best to answer it."

320. ALEXANDER CRUDEN.

Alexander Cruden, the laborious compiler of an excellent Concordance to the Holy Scriptures, was subject to a strange mental malady. He subsisted by correcting the press, and had a very accurate judgment on literary subjects, as well as a great sense of religion; and yet he was guilty at times of such extravagances, that his friends caused him to be confined in a madhouse.

After he was liberated, he brought an action in the King's Bench against his sister, Dr. Munro, and others, for false imprisonment. The cause was tried at Westminster Hall, July 17th, 1738, and ended with the evidence of the celebrated Mr. Bradbury, of Pinner's Hall, who, to prove Cruden's insanity, related the following anecdote:—

Mr. Bradbury had one evening prepared an excellent supper for several friends; but the moment it was served on the table, Mr. Cruden made his appearance in the room, heated with walking. It happened that Bradbury's favorite dish, a turkey, was smoking at one end of the table, and before the company could be seated, Cruden advanced, put back his wig, and, with both hands plunged in the gravy, began to wash his head and face over the bird, to the no small mortification of the whole company. When Mr. Bradbury had finished his story, Cruden abruptly addressed the chief justice, and said, "My lord, don't believe a word that man says; he is very well in the pulpit at Pinner's Hall, but he is not a proper evidence in this court."

321. RECIPE FOR AUTHORIAL VANITY.

A poor vicar, in a remote diocese, had, on some popular occasion, preached a sermon so acceptable to his parishioners, that they entreated him to print it, and he undertook a journey to London for the purpose. On his arrival in town, he was recommended to the late Mr. Rivington, to whom he triumphantly related the object of his journey. The printer agreed to his proposals, and required to know how many copies he would choose to have struck off. "Why, sir," returned the clergyman, "I have calculated that there are in the kingdom ten thousand parishes, and that each parish will at least take one, and others more; so that I think we may venture to print about thirty-five or thirty-six thousand copies."

The bookseller remonstrated, the author insisted, and the matter was settled, and the reverend author departed in high spirits to his home. With much difficulty and great self-denial, a period of about two months was suffered to pass, when his golden visions so tormented his imagination, that he could endure it no longer, and accordingly wrote to Mr. Rivington, desiring him to send the debtor and creditor account, most liberally permitting the remittances to be forwarded at Mr. R.'s convenience. Judge of the astonishment, tribulation, and anguish, excited by the receipt of the following account:—

The Rev. ——— to C. Rivington, Dr.	£.	s.	d.
To printing and paper, 35,000 copies of sermon	785	5	6
Cr.
By the sale of seventeen copies of said
sermon	1	5	6
Balance due to C. Rivington	£784	0	0

The bookseller, however, in a day or two, sent a letter to the following purport:—

"Rev. sir,—I beg pardon for innocently amusing myself at your expense, but you need not give yourself uneasiness. I knew better than you could do the extent of the sale of single sermons, and accordingly printed but one hundred copies, to the expense of which you are heartily welcome."

322. DAY'S ATTEMPTS AT HOUSE-BUILDING.

In Edgeworth's Memoirs, it is related that Mr. Day bought a house and a small estate, called Stapleford Abbot, near Abridge, in Essex, (England.) The house was indifferent, and the land worse; the one he proposed to enlarge, the other to improve according to the best and latest systems of agriculture. The house was of brick, with but one good room, and it was but ill adapted, in other respects, to the residence of a family. He built, at a considerable expense, convenient offices; also a small addition to the house.

When Day determined to dip his unsullied hands in mortar, he bought at a stall Ware's Architecture; and this he read, with persevering assiduity, for three or four weeks before he began his operations. He had not, however, followed this new occupation a week before he became tired of it, as it completely deranged his habits of discussion with Mrs. Day, in their daily walks in the fields, or prevented their close application to books when in the house. Masons calling for supplies, of various sorts, which had not been suggested in the great body of architecture that he had procured with so much care, annoyed the young builder exceedingly. Sills, lintels, door and window cases were wanting before they had been thought of; and the carpenter, to whose presence he had looked forward but at a distant period, was now summoned, and hastily set to work to keep the masons a-going.

Mr. Day was deep in a treatise, written by some French agriculturist, to prove that any soil may be rendered fertile by sufficient ploughing, when the masons desired to know where he would have the window of the new room on the first floor. "I was present at the question," says Edgeworth, "and offered to assist my friend." No; he sat immovable in his chair, and gravely demanded of the mason whether the wall might not be built first, and a place for the window cut out afterwards. The mason stared at Mr. Day with an expression of the most unfeigned surprise. "Why, sir, to be sure, it is very possible; but I believe, sir, it is more common to put in the window cases while the house is building, and not afterwards."

Mr. Day, however, with great coolness, ordered the wall to be built without any opening for windows, which was done accordingly; and the addition which was made to the house was actually finished, leaving the room, which was intended for a dressing-room for Mrs. Day, without any window whatever. When it was sufficiently dry, the room was papered, and for some time candles were lighted in it whenever it was used. So it remained for two or three years; afterwards Mrs. Day used it as a lumber-room, and at last the house was sold without any window having been opened in this apartment.

This strange neglect arose from two causes; from Mr. Day's bodily indolence and his mental activity. He did not like to get up from his chair to give orders upon a subject on which he was but little interested, and he felt strongly intent upon the speculation which then occupied his mind.

323. THE DOCTOR AND HIS HORSE.

Studious persons are sometimes surprisingly ignorant how to act on ordinary occasions. A Scottish paper says that Dr. Chalmers came home one evening on horseback, and, as neither the man who had the charge of his horse nor the key of the stable could be found, he was for some time not a little puzzled where to find a temporary residence for the animal. At last he fixed on the garden as the fittest place he could think of for the purpose; and, having led the horse thither, he placed it on the garden walk. When his sister, who had also been from home, returned, and was told that the key of the stable could not be found, she inquired what had been done with the horse.

"I took it to the garden," said the doctor.

"To the garden!" she exclaimed; "then all our flower and vegetable beds will be destroyed."

"Don't be afraid of that," said the doctor, "for I took particular care to place the horse on the garden walk."

"And did you really imagine," rejoined the sister, "that he would remain there?"

"I have no doubt of it," said the doctor; "for so sagacious an animal as the horse could not fail to be aware of the propriety of refraining from injuring the products of the garden."

"I am afraid," said Miss Chalmers, "that you will think less favorably of the discretion of the horse when you have seen the garden."

To decide the controversy by an appeal to facts, they went to the garden, and found, from the ruthless devastation which the trampling and rolling of the animal had spread over every part of it, that the natural philosophy of the horse was a subject with which the lady was far more accurately acquainted than her learned brother.

"I never could have imagined," said the doctor, "that horses were such senseless animals."

§ 28. MISCELLANEOUS.

324. FIRST NATIONAL AUTHORS.

The following are some of the earliest authors of different nations:—

The Pentateuch, or the five books of Moses, in Hebrew, is the oldest book extant, written about 1500 before Christ, or over 3300 years ago. The oldest Greek books and author are the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer, written about 900 B. C. The earliest Latin works extant are the comedies of M. Accius Plebeius, written 200 B. C. The earliest British author is Gildas, who wrote a Conquest of Britain, A. D. 500. The first French writer was Venan Fortunatus, who wrote a book of Latin poetry, A. D. 500. The earliest Arabian, Persian, or Turkish work of any note is the Koran of Mohammed, written A. D. 600. The earliest German work is the book of poems and theology of Walafred Strabo, A. D. 841. The first Russian work was the compilation of a code of laws by Yaroslaf, in the year A. D. 1000. The first Spanish writer was Arias, on law, before 580 A. D. The earliest Portuguese author is Mouez, who wrote songs, &c., A. D. 1100. The earliest Italian author is Accursius, a writer on jurisprudence, A. D. 1182-1260. The first Swedish author is Eric Olai, who wrote, in 1400, a History of the Goths and Swedes. The first Polish writer is Vinc Kadlubek, who wrote, in 1226, a History of Poland. We Americans had a pioneer in letters, in the person of "ye renowned poet of New England, Benjamin Thompson, learned schoolmaster and physician," of Dorchester, Plymouth colony. He flourished about one hundred years ago, and is considered the first native writer of much reputation.

325. GOUJET AND THE BENEDICTINES.

The Abbé Goujet, who had designed a classified history of his national literature, in the eighteen volumes we possess, could only conclude that of the translators and commence that of the poets; two other volumes in manuscript have perished. That great enterprise of the Benedictines, the Histoire Littéraire de la France, now consists of twelve large quartos, and the industry of its successive writers have only been able to carry it to the twelfth century.

326. CLEMENT, TIRABOSCHI, AND WARTON.

David Clement designed the most extensive bibliography which had ever appeared; but the diligent life of the writer could only proceed as far as H. The alphabetical order, which so many writers of this class have adopted, has proved a mortifying memento of human life.

Tiraboschi was so fortunate as to complete his great national history of Italian literature.

But, unhappily, Thomas Warton, after feeling his way through the darker ages of English poetry, in planning the map of the beautiful land, of which he had only a Pisgah-sight, expired amidst his volumes. The most precious portion of Warton's history is but the fragment of a fragment.

327. FATHER CASTEL AND NATHANIEL LEE.

The conversation turning one day, in the presence of Fontenelle, on the marks of originality in the works of Father Castel, well known to the scientific world for his Vrai Système de Physique générale de Newton, some person observed, "But he is mad." "I know it," returned Fontenelle, "and I am very sorry for it; for it is a great pity. But I like him better for being original and a little mad, than I should if he were in his senses without being original."

When Nathaniel Lee, commonly called the Mad Poet, was confined during four years of his short life in Bedlam, a sane idiot of a scribbler mocked his calamity, and observed that it was easy to write like a madman. Lee answered, "No, sir, it is not so easy to write like a madman, but very easy to write like a fool."

328. HOW TO SELL A DULL BOOK.

Defoe's bookseller called on him one day, with a long face, after having published a large edition of a very dull and heavy book, called Drelincourt on Death, "with several directions how to prepare ourselves to die well," which the public, not appearing to relish unauthorized directions of that nature, had stubbornly refused to buy. What was to be done with the ponderous stock under which his shelves were groaning? Defoe quieted his fears. Nothing but a ghost from the grave, it was true, could recommend such a book with effect; but a ghost from the grave the worthy bookseller should have. As speedily done as said. Defoe sent him, in a few days, the True History of the Apparition of one Mrs. Veal, the next Day after her Death, to one Mrs. Bargrave, at Canterbury, the 8th of September, 1705. If such a thing was ever to be believed, here it was made credible. The business-like, homely, earnest, commonplace air of truth was irresistible. And what said the ghost to Mrs. Bargrave? The ghost, in the course of a long gossip, filled with the says I and thinks I, the says he and thinks she of the ten-table of a country town, said — with all the confident dogmatism of her recent mortuary experience — that Drelincourt's book on death was the best book ever written on that subject. Dr. Sherlock was not bad; two Dutch books had merit; several others were worth mention; but Drelincourt, she protested, had by far the clearest notions of death and the future state of any one who had handled the matter. The narrative was appended to the book, and a new edition advertised. It flew like wildfire. The copies, to use an illustration of Sir Walter Scott, (with whom the narrative was a great favorite,) which had hung on the bookseller's hands as heavy as a pile of lead bullets, now traversed the town in every direction, like the same bullets discharged from a field-piece. Nay, the book has been popular ever since. More than fifty editions have not exhausted its popularity. Mrs. Veal's ghost is still believed by thousands. And the hundreds of thousands who have bought the silly piece of Drelincourt (for hawking booksellers have made their fortunes by traversing the country with it in sixpenny numbers) have borne unconscious testimony to the genius of Defoe.

After all, however, Defoe's conduct in the case was but an imposition on the popular credulity, and though shrewd and successful, is not to be imitated or approved.

329. WHO WROTE JUNIUS'S LETTERS?

This question has not yet been satisfactorily answered. In 1812, Dr. Mason Good, in an essay he wrote on the question, passed in review all the persons who had been suspected of writing these celebrated letters. They are, Charles Lloyd and John Roberts, originally treasury clerks; Samuel Dyer, a learned man, and a friend of Burke and Johnson; William Gerard Hamilton, familiarly known as "Single-Speech Hamilton;" Mr. Burke; Dr. Butler, Bishop of Hereford; the Rev. Philip Rosenhagen; Major General Lee, who came over to the Americans, and took an active part in our contest with the mother country; John Wilkes; Hugh Macaulay Boyd; John Dunning; Lord Ashburton; Henry Flood; and Lord George Sackville.

Since this date, in 1813, John Roche published an Inquiry, in which he persuaded himself that Burke was the author. In the same year there appeared three other publications respecting Junius. These were, the Attempt of the Rev. J. B. Blakeway to trace them to John Horne Tooke; next, were the Facts of Thomas Girdlestone, M. D., to prove that General Lee was the author; and, thirdly, a work put forth by Mrs. Olivia Wilmot Serres, in the following conident terms: Life of the Author of Junius's Letters—the Rev. J. Wilmot, D. D., Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford; and, like most bold attempts, this work attracted some notice and discussion.

In 1815, the Letters were attributed to Richard Glover, the poet of Leonidas; and this improbable idea was followed by another, assigning the authorship of the Letters to the Duke of Portland, in 1816. In the same year appeared Arguments and Facts to show that John Louis de Lolme, author of the famous Essay on the Constitution of England, was the writer of these anonymous epistles. In 1816, too, appeared Mr. John Taylor's Junius Identified, advocating the claims of Sir Philip Francis so successfully that the question was generally considered to be settled. Mr. Taylor's opinion is supported by Edward Dubois, Esq., formerly the confidential friend and private secretary of Sir Philip, who, in common with Lady Francis, still entertains the conviction that his deceased patron was identical with Junius.

In 1817, George Chalmers, F. S. A., advocated the pretensions of Hugh Macaulay Boyd to the authorship of Junius.

In 1825, Mr. George Coventry maintained, with great ability, that Lord George Sackville was Junius; and two writers in America adopted this theory.

Thus was the whole question reopened; and, in 1828, Mr. E. H. Barker, of Thetford, refuted the claims of Lord George Sackville and Sir Philip Francis, and advocated those of Charles Lloyd, private secretary to the Hon. George Grenville.*

In 1841, Mr. N. W. Simons, of the British Museum, refuted the supposition that Sir Philip Francis was directly or indirectly concerned in the writing; and, in the same year, appeared M. Jaques's review of the controversy, in which he arrived at the conclusion that Lord George Sackville composed the Letters, and that Sir Philip Francis was his amanuensis, thus combining the theory of Mr. Taylor with that of Mr. Coventry.

We have condensed these data from a volume published by Mr. Britton, F. S. A., in June, 1848, entitled the Authorship of the Letters of Junius Elucidated, in which is advocated, with great care, the opinion that the Letters were, to a certain extent, the joint productions of Lieutenant Colonel Isaac Barré, M. P., Lord Shelburne, (afterwards Marquis of Lansdowne,) and Dunning, Lord Ashburton. Of these three persons, the late Sir Francis Baring commissioned Sir Joshua Reynolds, in 1784-5, to paint portraits in one picture, which is regarded as evidence of joint authorship.

Only a week before his death, 1804, the Marquis of Lansdowne was personally appealed to on the subject of Junius by Sir Richard Phillips. In conversation, the marquis said, "No, no; I am not equal to Junius; I could not be the author; but the grounds of secrecy are now so far removed by death (Dunning and Barré were at that time dead) and change of circumstances, that it is unnecessary the author of Junius should much longer be unknown. The world is curious about him, and I could make a very interesting publication on the subject. I knew Junius, and I know all about the writing and production of these Letters." The marquis added, "If I live over the summer, which, however, I don't expect, I promise you a very interesting pamphlet about Junius. I will put my name to it; I will set the question at rest forever." The death of the marquis, however, occurred in a week. In a letter to the Monthly Magazine, July, 1813, the then present Marquis of Lansdowne says, "It is not impossible my father may have been acquainted with the fact; but, perhaps, he was under some obligation to secrecy, as he never made any communication to me on the subject."

The question of the identity of Junius is still far from exhausted. There are now (June, 1848) two volumes on the subject in the press; and it is said that Lady Francis will produce some fresh arguments to strengthen the case of her husband, the late Sir Philip Francis. In America, one or two works are in preparation on the same subject; and a gentleman in Sussex (England) has long been occupied in an essay, to show that the "polite" Earl of Chesterfield was Junius.

330. O'CONNELL ON THE AUTHORSHIP OF JUNIUS.

In the Personal Recollections, by W. J. O'N. Daunt, Esq., occurs the following passage:—

"It is my decided opinion," said O'Connell, "that Edmund Burke was the author of the Letters of Junius. There are many considerations which compel me to form that opinion. Burke was the only man who made that figure in the world which the author of Junius must have made, if engaged in public life; and the entire of Junius's Letters evinced that close acquaintance with the springs of political machinery which no man could possess unless actively engaged in politics. Again, Burke was fond of chemical similes; now chemical similes are frequent in Junius. Again, Burke was an Irishman; now Junius, speaking of the government of Ireland, twice calls it 'the Castle,' a familiar phrase amongst Irish politicians, but one which an Englishman, in those days, would never have used. Again, Burke had this peculiarity in writing, that he often wrote many words without taking the pen from the paper. The very same peculiarity existed in the manuscripts of Junius, although they were written in a feigned hand. Again, it may be said that the style is not Burke's. In reply, I would say that Burke was master of many styles. His work on natural society, in imitation of Lord Bolingbroke, is as different, in point of style, from his work on the French revolution, as both are from the Letters of Junius. Again, Junius speaks of the king's insanity as a divine visitation; Burke said the very same thing in the House of Commons. Again, had any one of the other men to whom the Letters are, with any show of probability, ascribed, been really the author, such author would have had no reason for disowning the book or remaining incognito. Any one of them but Burke would have claimed the authorship and fame—and proud fame. But Burke had a very cogent reason for remaining incognito. In claiming Junius, he would have claimed his own condemnation and dishonor, for Burke died a pensioner. Burke was, moreover, the only pensioner who had the commanding talent displayed in the writings of Junius. Now, when I lay all these considerations together, and especially when I reflect that a cogent reason exists for Burke's silence as to his own authorship, I confess I think I have got a presumptive proof, of the very strongest nature, that Burke was the writer."

* Supported by the following note, written by Dr. Parr, in his copy of the Letters of Junius: "The writer of Junius was Mr. Lloyd, secretary to George Grenville, and brother to Philip Lloyd, Dean of Norwich. This will one day or other be generally acknowledged.—S. P."

331. LATEST OF DR. JOHNSON'S CONTEMPORARIES.

In the autumn of 1831, died the Rev. Dr. Shaw, at Chesley, Somersetshire, (England,) at the age of eighty-three. He is said to have been the last surviving friend of Dr. Johnson.

On the 16th of January, in the above year, died Mr. Richard Clark, chamberlain of the city of London, in the ninety-second year of his age. At the age of fifteen, he was introduced by Sir John Hawkins to Johnson, whose friendship he enjoyed to the last year of the doctor's life. He attended Johnson's evening parties at the Mitre Tavern, in Fleet Street, where, among other literary characters, he met Dr. Percy, Dr. Goldsmith, and Dr. Hawke-worth. A substantial supper was served at eight o'clock. The party seldom separated till a late hour; and Mr. Clark recollected that, early one morning, he, with another of the party, accompanied the doctor to his house, where Mrs. Williams, then blind, made tea for them. When Mr. Clark was sheriff, he took Johnson to a "Judges' Dinner," at the Old Bailey, the judges being Blackstone and Eyre. Mr. Clark often visited the doctor, and met him at dinner parties; and the last time he enjoyed his company was at the Essex Head Club, of which, by the doctor's invitation, Clark became a member.

332. JOHNSON NOT A GREAT READER.

Johnson preferred conversation to books; but when driven to the refuge of reading by being left alone, he then attached himself to that amusement. By his innumerable quotations, one would suppose that he must have read more books than any man in England; but he declared that supposition was a mistake in his favor. He owned he had hardly read a book through. Churchill used to say, having heard, perhaps, of his confession, as a boast, that "if Johnson had only read a few books, he could not be the author of his own works." His opinion, however, was that he who reads most has the chance of knowing most; but he declared that the perpetual task of reading was as bad as the slavery in the mine, or the labor at the oar.

333. EXCESSIVE MODESTY.

D'Israeli tells us of a man of letters, of England, who had passed his life in constant study; and it was observed that he had written several folio volumes, which his modest fears would not permit him to expose to the eye even of his critical friends. He promised to leave his labors to posterity; and he seemed sometimes, with a glow on his countenance, to exult that they would not be unworthy of their acceptance. At his death, his sensibility took the alarm; he had the folios brought to his bed; no one could open them, for they were closely locked. At the sight of his favorite and mysterious labors, he paused; he seemed disturbed in his mind, while he felt at every moment his strength decaying. Suddenly he raised his feeble hands by an effort of firm resolve, burnt his papers, and smiled as the greedy Vulcan licked up every page. The task exhausted his remaining strength, and he soon afterwards expired.

334. SIDNEY SMITH.

A gentleman residing in Bristol, in 1838, who signs himself R—, was invited by Southey to accompany him and his son on a visit to Sidney Smith at Combe Fleury. He says,—

"We arrived at the village about noon, and, having alighted at the little inn, we all four proceeded towards the vicarage where Mr. Smith resided, a country lad officiating as our guide through the somewhat intricate lanes. We had proceeded about three quarters of a mile, when the clodhopper, mounting a gate, pointed with his huge hand to a portly gentleman, in a black dress and top boots, who was leisurely riding along on a rough-looking cob,* and opening his eyes and capacious mouth to the fullest extent of which each was capable, exclaimed, 'There be Passon Smith yander.' And, surely enough, the 'passon' it was, and towards him we made our way.

"He did not recognize Southey, but, looking hard at him and us, was about to pass on, when the laureate went towards him and accosted him by name. Almost instant recognition took place, and the personal friends, although violent political enemies, cordially greeted each other. Smith alighted from his horse, and, directing our guide to take it to the stable, turned with us towards the house, asking a hundred questions, and ever and anon expressing his delight at the unexpected visit.

"The vicarage was any thing but pleasantly situated, and, in itself, more resembled a farm-house than a village pastor's 'modest mansion.' Every thing about it was in sad disorder, and plainly enough evidenced that no woman's hand presided over the arrangement of the establishment. We got to the front door through a littered-up court yard, and, after passing through a stone-paved hall, were conducted into the library, a large room, full of old-fashioned furniture, where books, parliamentary reports, pamphlets, and letters, lay all about, in most admired confusion.

" 'This is my workshop,' he observed to Southey; 'as black as any smithy's in Christendom.'

"And the neat and precise laureate seemed to think so, for he looked cautiously about for a clean chair, folded up his coat-tails, and was preparing to sit down, when Smith, with a sly gravity, wiped with his handkerchief (none of the cleanest) the dust from an old folio edition of the works of one of the fathers of the church, and requested his friend to sit on it.

"Southey shrunk from the profanation, and, respectfully removing the work, preferred the dusty chair. I do not think he much relished the joke, although he said nothing. I could not help thinking that he was mentally comparing, or rather contrasting, the appearance of Smith's library with that of his own exquisitely neat one at Keswick. Alas! ere long he would wander into that learned retreat, there gaze for hours, with an idiotic smile, on a favorite black-letter volume, and then submit himself, like a child, to the guiding hand of an attendant, and be led out; for, in the days of his insanity, it was a strange fact that, although fond of finding his way into his beloved library, he never could discover the way out of it.

"The conversation was pretty general, and chiefly

* A strong, hardy kind of pony.

related to the old friends of either party. Mr. Smith spoke of Coleridge in the highest terms, but severely deprecated his indolence. Referring to Charles Lamb's intemperate habits, he remarked, 'He draws so much beer that no wonder he buffoons people — he must have a butt to put it in.'

"At this time, the question of the authorship of that strange, but clever and learned book, the Doctor, was a doubtful one, and much mooted in literary circles. Many suspected, and indeed named, Southey as the writer; but he never either admitted or denied the fact of his being so. The conversation turned on the subject, and Smith, with a roguish twinkle in his eye, told Southey that he knew who was the author. Southey calmly inquired the name, and the reverend gentleman remarked, 'I remember, some years since, enjoying a conversation with one Robert Southey, in which he used the exact words which I find here,' and he read from a page of the Doctor a passage, and then said, 'Now, Mr. Laureate, it needs no conjuror to convince any one of common sense that the writer of the passage I have read, and the utterer of those very words to me seven years since, are one and the same person.' Southey bit his lip, but said nothing. After his death, Mrs. Southey divulged the secret, which her husband kept till his death. I question whether she would have made known the fact of the authorship, had not some shabby fellows, by judicious nods and well-timed faint denials, gained the credit of being connected with the work.

"We sat down to a plain country dinner, after which 'The glasses sparkled on the board.'

"Like Friar Tuck, the canon of St. Paul's enjoyed creature comforts, and many were the flashes of wit which set us in a roar. Southey was very abstemious, and refused wine, alleging his recent seizure as an excuse. Smith rattled away like a great boy, and, with the sole exception of Theodore Hook, I never heard any one so brilliant in conversation. No subject came amiss to him, and he seemed at home in every one. Of humbugs, both political and personal, he had the most utter detestation, and freely expressed his opinions. I shall not soon forget the ridicule which he that day heaped on the head of Robert Montgomery, who had then just published his poem, Satan.

"As to personal appearance, Sidney Smith was about the average height, or a trifle above it, inclined to corpulency, and of a fresh red and white complexion. The expression of his features was pleasing, and his snowy hair gave him an air of venerability. Good humor was the prevailing characteristic; but when he talked with severity, his aspect became changed, and few could have beheld unmoved his withering glance."

335. SKETCH OF THOMAS HOOD.

Mr. Hood was born under Gresham's Grasshopper, in the city of London, in the year 1790, the son of Hood, of the firm of Vernor & Hood, in the Poultry, the publishers of Bloomfield and Kirke White, and the booksellers to whom we are indebted for the Beauties of England and Wales. One of his biographers has told us that he completed his education at a finishing school at Camberwell, upon which Tom has some twenty good jokes in his Literary Reminiscences. From Camberwell he went to Dundee, and soon after he was apprenticed to his uncle, Mr. Robert Sands, to learn the art and mystery of engraving. Here he soon found out the drift of his own genius; he left the burin for the pen, composed a few light pieces of poetry, got into notice, and, after Scott's death in 1821, became a sort of sub-editor of the London Magazine. It was at this time that he acquired the friendship of Lamb, Hazlitt, Cary, Allan Cunningham, Clare, and others, so delightfully pictured by Mr. Hood himself, in his two short Literary Reminiscences. A volume of Odes and Addresses to great People gave him a rank and a reputation in literature for something done in a better kind of Colman vein. It was some time, however, before the real author was known; and Coleridge, after two perusals, wrote and taxed Lamb with the authorship of the work. There was high praise, and, as the young lady said of Dr. Johnson, from one who could not lie, and could not be mistaken.

A Plea for the Midsummer Fairies was followed by a volume of Whims and Oddities, inscribed to Sir Walter Scott; then came the Comic Annual, with its six or seven years of clever and lively existence; then Tydney Hall, a story in three volumes, with one super-excellent character in it, called Unlucky Joe; then Up the Rhine, the result of a residence on the banks of that hurrying river; then Hood's Own, a volume of cullings from his comic lucubrations, with what he calls a new infusion of blood for general circulation. Here he gave us his two short Literary Reminiscences already alluded to. On Hook's death, Hood became editor of the New Monthly Magazine, and upon some disagreement with Mr. Colburn, editor of a magazine of his own, bearing his own name.

Hood was a little below the middle size, with a face, as he calls it, better fitted for a number of the Evangelical Magazine than a volume of the Comic Annual. He was mistaken more than once in Germany, he tells us, for a regimental chaplain. His mouth, he informs us, was a little wry, as if it had always laughed on the wrong side. But Hood's was no willow-pattern face. He was silent in mixed company; a kind of Puritan in look, till an opportunity for a joke appeared, which he rose at like a trout—not, however, to be caught, but to catch others; his countenance brightened up with the rising wit; you saw a play around his mouth; his eyes sparkled, and all the genius of the man stood full in the face before you.

336. PORSON ON GIBBON.

A great admirer of Gibbon was commending his style to Porson in very high terms. The professor listened to him with a sneer of disapprobation, but for some time said nothing. On being pressed for his opinion, "Gibbon," said he, "is too uniform; he writes in the same flowery and pompous style upon every subject. He is like Christie, the auctioneer, who says as much in praise of a ribbon as of a Raphael."

337. MADAME TEREIN'S ADVICE.

"Secure yourself," said she to Marmontel, "a livelihood independent of literary successes; and put into this lottery only the overplus of your time; for woe to him who depends only on his pen! — nothing is more casual. The man who makes shoes is sure of his wages; but the man who writes a book is never sure of any thing."

§ 29. AUTOGRAPHS.

338. TALLEYRAND.

There is a set of men continually boring people with autographs; but few persons have the talent of resisting them with politeness. Talleyrand, being once asked a similar favor by an English nobleman, promised to send him one in a few days, and kept his word in the following manner: He sent him an invitation to dinner, couched in these terms:—"Dear sir, will you oblige me with your company at dinner, on Wednesday next, at eight o'clock? I have invited a number of exceedingly clever persons, and do not like to be the only fool among them!"

339. AN IRISH BULL.

The great agitator being pestered by a stranger with his autograph, returned the following answer:—"Sir: Yours, requesting my autograph, is received. I have been so bothered with similar importunities, that I'll be blest if I send it.

"Your ob'd't servant, DANIEL O'CONNELL."

340. THE EMPEROR NICHOLAS AND MR. O'CONNELL.

A lady of rank being sent to O'Connell for his autograph, to go into the collection of handwritings of "celebrated persons" to the Emperor of Russia, O'Connell begged pardon for seeming want of courtesy in refusing a lady, but added, as his excuse,—

"The fact is, that the hideous cruelties of the present Emperor of Russia, perpetrated in Poland, even upon women and children, have marked his character with a deeper shade of infamy than that which stains the Roman Nero; while his Satanic resurrection of Catholic Christianity has reduced him beneath the level of the ancient Diocletian. Mr. O'Connell, therefore, cannot consent, by any act of his, however slight, to appear to pay a compliment to so atrocious a monster."

After this gentle expression of opinion, it is to be presumed that Mr. O'Connell did not contemplate sitting St. Petersburg.

341. DR. RAFFLES, OF LIVERPOOL.

Since the time of Horace Walpole, of Strawberry Hill, probably a greater virtuoso is not to be found in England than the celebrated divine, Dr.

Raffles, of Liverpool. We have frequently heard of his extensive collection of autographs, as shown with no little pride to those American brethren who have had the good fortune to make his acquaintance. And also of his taste for rare works on all subjects. A writer in the Newark Advertiser states that the home of the good clergyman is full of vanities. He writes his sermons on the table on which Byron wrote the Childe Harold—and a curious table it is—that can be folded up into the shape, and about the size, of an old-fashioned huge Dutch Bible. He has also Melancthon's Bible with the margins covered with notes, in a neat hand. He has the original of some of Scott's novels, of Montgomery's Pelican Island, of some of Burns's songs, with a thousand other treasures. The most characteristic letter in his collection is the original of a challenge from Lord Byron to Lord Brougham. It was written at Missolonghi, in Greece, and indorsed "to be forwarded immediately on my return to England." The letter is spiteful and venomous; it was evidently written under intense excitement, as the handwriting is scarcely decipherable, and it is often interlined. He charges Brougham with being the author of many of the floating slanders against him, and says that he had long sought revenge. Dr. Raffles lives on Edge Hill in Upper Liverpool, and receives a salary of $4000.

342. REV. DR. SPRAGUE.

The recreations of a man forcibly illustrate his character. The following will suggest much for curious thought and inquiry. We copy it from the Boston Transcript.

The Rev. Dr. Sprague, of Albany, the pastor of a Presbyterian church in that city, is not less known as a collector of antiquities and autographs than as an eloquent preacher and author. His collection of 15,000 rare pamphlets was given some time since to the theological library at Princeton, and his autographs would fill a very respectable private library. He has several thousands of them, among which are Calvin's, Bunyan's, a large number of European kings, and all of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. Some time since he requested the autograph of Franklin from an eminent professor of natural philosophy, of which he had possessed himself before. "O, you have one already," said the professor. "No matter," replied the determined collector, "I want it for exchange—one Benny Franklin in Europe is worth two kings!" one of the daintiest compliments ever paid to a Boston printer's boy.

§ 30. BIOGRAPHY AND BIOGRAPHERS.

343. MAZZUCHELLI.

Count Mazzuchelli, early in life, formed a noble, but too mighty a project, in which, however, he considerably advanced. This was an historical and critical account of memoirs and the writings of Italian authors. He even commenced the publication, in alphabetical order, but the six invaluable folios we possess only contain the authors, the initial letters of whose names are A and B. This great literary historian had finished for the press other volumes, which the torpor of his descendants has suffered to lie in a dormant state. Rich in acquisition, and judicious in his decisions, the days of the patriotic Mazzuchelli were freely given to the most curious and elegant researches in his national literature.

ture. His correspondence is said to consist of forty volumes, with eight of literary memoirs, besides the lives of his literary contemporaries. But Europe has been defrauded of the hidden treasures.

344. ECKERMANN.

The following sketch of Eckermann, the German biographer, presents one of the many instances where talent and merit have raised their possessor from humble life:—

"Our worthy reporter's father was a merchant on a small scale, who carried his shop upon his back for many years, from village to village, over the sandy beach between Luneburg and Hamburg. He dealt in ribbons, cotton twist, silk thread, coarse linen cloth, and goose quills. His mother kept a cow, weeded an acre of ground around her humble cabin, attended to her domestic duties, and in her leisure hours made a little money by spinning cotton, and netting dress-caps for the fair daughters of the Luneburg burgesses. John Peter, as the last born son of a second marriage, was left as the only companion of his industrious parents, during their declining years; but this seclusion was, to his quiet, contemplative character, a source of as great enjoyment as to a young Napoleon or Byron it might have been of pain and uneasiness. In the spring season, the future friend and confidant of Goethe was employed during his boyish years in collecting the reeds, leaves, and dry grass that the Elbe had left from its floods, to serve as litter for his mother's cow. As the summer advanced, the dignity of his situation advanced with it, and John Peter became what in Homeric days would have been styled a divine cow-herd. Like the ant, too, he was busy during the summer months in gathering together dry branches and leaves from the neighboring wood, for the supply of the winter's fire. In harvest he became sheaf gatherer and gleaner to the reapers, and, as a sort of accessory trade, collected acorns and sold them to the neighboring farmers for feeding their geese. When he became a little older, he was admitted into partnership with his father, and learned to bear his burden betimes. Such was the simple boyhood of the man to whom the world is indebted for a work which must go down to posterity along with the name and works of Goethe, and will to many bear a value not inferior to some of those immortal works themselves."

345. BIOGRAPHIA BRITANNICA.

The fate of the Biographia Britannica, in its first edition, must be noticed. The spirit and acuteness of Campbell, the curious industry of Oldys, and the united labors of very able writers, could not secure public favor. This treasure of our literary history was on the point of being suspended, when a poem by Gilbert West drew the public attention to that elaborate work, which, however, still languished, and was hastily concluded.

346. JOHNSON'S FIDELITY.

When a friend told Johnson that he was much blamed for having unveiled the weakness of Pope, "Sir," said he, "if one man undertake to write the life of another, he undertakes to exhibit his true and real character; but this can be done only by a faithful and accurate delineation of the particulars which discriminate that character."

347. HASTINGS'S OPINION OF BOSWELL'S JOHNSON.

Sir John Malcolm once asked Warren Hastings, who was a contemporary and companion of Dr. Johnson and Boswell, what was his real estimation of Boswell's Life of Johnson. "Sir," replied Hastings, "it is the dirtiest book in my library." Then proceeding, he added, "I knew Boswell intimately; and I well remember, when his book first made its appearance, Boswell was so full of it that he could neither think nor talk of any thing else; so much so, that meeting Lord Thurlow hurrying through Parliament Street, to get to the House of Lords, where an important debate was expected, for which he was already too late, Boswell had the temerity to stop and accost him with 'Have you read my book?' 'Yes,' replied Lord Thurlow, with one of his strongest curses, 'every word of it; I could not help it.'"

§ 31. BLINDNESS AND LITERARY PURSUITS.

348. COUNT DE PAGAN.

Count de Pagan, having entered the army at the early age of twelve, lost one of his eyes before he was seventeen, at the siege of Montauban. He still, however, pursued his profession with unabated ardor, and distinguished himself by many acts of brilliant courage. At last, when about to be sent into Portugal, with the rank of field marshal, he was seized with an illness which deprived him of his remaining eye. He was yet only in his thirty-eighth year, and he determined that the misfortunes he had already sustained in the service of his country should not prevent him from recommencing his public career in a new character. He had always been attached to mathematics, and he now devoted himself assiduously to the prosecution of his favorite study, with a view principally to the improvement of the science of fortification, for which his great experience in the field particularly fitted him. During the twenty years after this, which he passed in a state of total blindness, he gave a variety of publications to the world, among which may be mentioned, besides his well-known and largest work on Fortifications, his Geographical Theorems, and his Astronomical Tables. He is also the author of a rare book called an Historical and Geographical Account of the River of the Amazons, which is remarkable as containing a chart asserted to have been made by himself, after he was blind. It is said not to be very correct, although a wonderful production for such an artist.

349. SCAPINELLI.

The Italian poet Scapinelli, who was born at Modena in 1585, was blind from his birth. He held a professor's chair successively at Bologna, Modena, and Pisa; and having then been recalled to occupy the place of chief professor of eloquence, on which he had long set his heart, in the first of these universities, died there in the forty-ninth year of his age. Scapinelli, besides several prose compositions, wrote verses both in Italian and Latin; and all his works are distinguished, not only by their learning, but by a purity and elegance of diction rare at the time when he flourished. He was accounted, indeed, one of the most finished scholars of his day.

350. SCHOENBERGER AND ROLLI.

Halderich Schoenberger, born at Weida, in 1601, became blind in his third year. He became a master of arts and a teacher of languages at Holstein. He understood French, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Syrian, and Arabic. His knowledge of mathematics and natural and moral philosophy was extensive. He played on the organ, and other instruments. He held disputations about colors and the rainbow, at Königsberg. He played at nine-pins, and shot right at a mark, whose place was pointed out to him by knocking.

Rolli, born at Rome in 1685, blind in his fifth year, acquired a great knowledge in medicine and mathematics, was a poet, and wrote a tragedy, Porcenna, which is in print.

351. MISS ANNA WILLIAMS.

Miss Anna Williams came to London in 1730, when only twenty-four years of age, with her father, a Welsh surgeon, who had given up his profession in consequence of imagining that he had discovered a method of finding the longitude at sea, which would make his fortune. After many efforts, however, to obtain the patronage of government for his scheme, and having exhausted his resources, he was obliged to take refuge in the Charter House. His daughter, who had been liberally educated, and had at first mixed in all the gayeties of the metropolis, was now obliged to support both him and herself by working at her needle. But, after struggling in this way for some years, she lost her sight by a cataract. Her situation, it might be imagined, was now both helpless and hopeless in the extreme; but a strong mind enabled her to rise above her calamity. She not only continued the exercise of her needle, we are told, with as much activity and skill as ever, but, never suffering her spirits to droop, distinguished herself, just as she had been used to do, by the neatness of her dress, and preserved all her old attachments to literature. In 1746, after she had been six years blind, she published a translation from the French of La Bletierie's Life of the Emperor Julian. Her father, having some time after this met with Dr. Johnson, told him his story, and, in mentioning his daughter, gave so interesting an account of her, that the doctor expressed himself desirous of making her acquaintance, and eventually invited her to reside in his house as a companion to his wife. Mrs. Johnson died soon after; but Miss Williams continued to reside with the doctor till her death, in 1783, at the age of 77. In 1752, an attempt was made to restore her sight by the operation of couching, but without success. Miss Williams also appeared again as an authoress in 1766, when she published a volume entitled Miscellanies in Prose and Verse, written partly by herself and partly by several of her friends.

352. WIMPRECHT, THE BOOKSELLER.

Perhaps one of the greatest curiosities in the city of Augsburg, in 1836, was a bookseller of the name of Wimprecht, who had the misfortune to be born blind, but whose enterprising spirit enabled him to struggle successfully against the melancholy privations he was doomed to sustain, and to procure, by his industry and intelligence, a respectable and comfortable support for a large family dependent upon him. His library consisted of more than eight thousand volumes, which were of course frequently subject to change and renewal. But as soon as he acquired a new stock, the particulars of each book were read to him by his wife, and his discrimination permitted him to fix its value. His touch, to recognize it at any period, however distant, and his memory, never failed him in regard to its arrangement in his shop. His readiness to oblige, his honesty, and information of books in general, procured him a large custom; and under such extraordinary natural disadvantages he became a useful, and happily rendered himself a wealthy, member of the society to which he belonged.

§ 32. BLUNDERS, LITERARY.

353. CAMPBELL'S HERMITTUS REDIVIVUS.

A most singular blunder was produced by the ingenious Hermippus Redivivus of Dr. Campbell, a curious banter on the hermetic philosophy and the universal medicine; but the grave irony is so closely kept up throughout this admirable treatise, that it deceived for a length of time the most learned of that day. His notion of the art of prolonging life, by inhaling the breath of young women, was eagerly credited. A physician who himself had composed a treatise on health, was so influenced by it, that he actually took lodgings at a female boarding school, that he might never be without a constant supply of the breath of young ladies. Mr. Thick-nesse seriously adopted the project. Dr. Kippis acknowledges that after he read the work in his youth, the reasonings and the facts left him several days in a kind of fairy land. "I have a copy," says D'Israeli, "with manuscript notes by a learned physician, who seems to have had no doubts of its veracity." After all, the intention of the work was long doubtful, till Dr. Campbell informed a friend it was a mere jeu d'esprit; that Bayle was considered as standing without a rival in the art of treating at large a difficult subject, without discovering to which side his own sentiments leaned; and Dr. Campbell had likewise read more uncommon books than most men; he wished to rival Bayle, and at the same time to give to the world much unknown matter. He has admirably succeeded, and with this key the whole mystery is unlocked.

"Speak, ye that ride on white asses, ye that sit in judgment and walk by the way."

354. MORE'S UTOPIA.

When the Utopia of Sir Thomas More was first published, it occasioned a pleasant mistake. This political romance represents a perfect but visionary republic in an island supposed to have been newly discovered in America. "As this was the age of discovery," says Granger, "the learned Budæus and others took it for a genuine history; and considered it as highly expedient that missionaries should be sent thither, in order to convert so wise a nation to Christianity."

358. MODERN BOOKMAKING.

In Goldsmith's History of England, during the term of Charles II., no mention is made of either the great plague or the fire of London.

These omissions remind us of a similar oversight in a geography issued by one of the publishing societies — the name of Switzerland is not once mentioned! yet of this work many thousand copies were sold before the detection was made.

359. GODWIN'S BLUNDER.

When Godwin was employed in writing the Life of Chatham, he applied to many of his acquaintances for suitable anecdotes and suggestions. Mr. Fawcett supplied him with a striking passage from a speech which he had heard Chatham deliver, on general warrants: "Every man's house is called his castle. Why? Because it is surrounded by a moat, or defended by a wall? No. It may be a straw-built hut; the wind may whistle around it — the rain may enter it — but the king cannot." The point was plain enough; but when he came to read the printed volume, he found it thus arranged: "Every man's house is called his castle. Why? Because it is surrounded by a moat or defended by a wall? No — it may be a straw-built hut; the rain may enter it — all the winds of heaven may whistle round it, but the king cannot."

355. WARBURTON'S BLUNDER.

Pope, in a note on Measure for Measure, informs us that its story was taken from Cynthio's Novels, Dec. 8, Nov. 5, that is, Decade 8, Novel 5. The critical Warburton, in his edition of Shakspeare, puts the words in full length, thus, December 8, November 5.

In a catalogue, compiled some years ago by a French writer, of works on natural history, he has inserted Edgeworth's Essay on Irish Bulls.

356. JOHNSON'S BULL.

To a gentleman who expressed himself in disrespectful terms of Blackmore, one of whose poetic bulls he happened to recollect, Dr. Johnson answered, "I hope, sir, a blunder, after you shall have heard what I shall relate, will not be reckoned as decisive against a poet's reputation."

"When I was a young man, I translated Addison's Latin poem on the Battle of the Pygmies and the Cranes, and must plead guilty to the following couplet:—

'Down from the guardian boughs the nests they flung,
And killed the yet unanimated young.'

"And yet I trust I am no blockhead. I afterwards changed the word killed into crushed."

357. SINGULAR MISQUOTATION.

There is a curious error in Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, which has not hitherto been noticed. It occurs in definition 13 of the verb "to sit," and pervades every edition, even Mr. Todd's. "Asses are ye that sit in judgment." (Judges v. 10.) The verse is,

360. MOREAU'S MISTAKE.

When General Moreau, who forsook the colors of Napoleon, and was afterwards killed fighting against his former commander, in Germany, was in the city of Boston, he was much courted and sought after as a lion of the first quality. On one occasion he was invited to Cambridge to attend the commencement exercises. In the course of the day a musical society of undergraduates sang a then very popular ode, the chorus of which was, "To-morrow, to-morrow, to-morrow." Moreau, who was imperfectly acquainted with our language, fancied that they were complimenting him, and at every recurrence of the burden, which he interpreted, "To Moreau, to Moreau, to Moreau," he rose and bowed gracefully to the singers' gallery, pressing his laced chapeau to his heart. We can easily imagine the amusement of the spectators who were in the secret, and the mortification of the Frenchman, when he discovered his mistake.

§ 33. BOMBAST.

361. BOMBASTIC CONSOLATIONS.

Some letters were shown to Cardinal Pole that had been written to console a great man on the death of some of his friends. These letters were composed in the most pompous manner, and were adorned with all the flowers of a gaudy and affected style.

"I never read any letters," said the cardinal,

"more calculated to answer the purpose of assuaging grief, for I defy any man to read them without laughing heartily."

362. JOHNSON'S REBUKE OF ROUBILLIAC.

Roubillac was introduced to Johnson when the latter lived in Gough Square, Fleet Street. His object was, to prevail on Johnson to write an epitaph for a monument, on which this famous sculptor was then engaged, for Westminster Abbey. Johnson received the stranger with much civility, especially as he was introduced to him by Sir Joshua Reynolds. He took him up into a garret, which the prodigy of learning used to consider as his library, in which, besides his books all covered with dust, there was an old crazy deal table, and an old elbow chair, with only three legs. In this chair Johnson seated himself, after having first placed it securely against the wall on that side where the leg was deficient. He then took his pen, and demanded what his visitor wanted him to write. On this, Roubiliac began a bombastic and ridiculous harangue on what he thought should be the kind of epitaph most proper for the purpose; all which the doctor very patiently wrote down in his usually fine and strictly correct language. The conceited Frenchman continuing to dictate, which Johnson, conscious of the superiority of his powers, never could bear, he quickly silenced him in an angry and peremptory tone of voice, saying, "Come, come, sir, let us have no more of this bombastic, ridiculous rhodomontade, but let me know, in simple language, the name, character, and quality of the person whose epitaph you wish me to write."

363. THE POET-QUOTING LAWYER.

Ardent young men, fresh from the schools, in their early attempts at the bar are very apt to adopt a flowery, bombastic style of language and sentiment. There is, indeed, in multitudes of instances at the bar, a strong temptation to magnify and embellish things essentially trivial, beyond all reasonable bounds; and the sanguine young lawyer, especially anxious to make the most powerful effect on the minds of the jury, and succeed in his first efforts, becomes florid and bombastic before he is aware.

But seldom is such a pleader more sharply dealt with by senior brothers than in the case following:—

There was in the town of B., in West Tennessee, a young lawyer, who had studied the poets more than the legal writers of the age, and who availed himself of every opportunity of displaying his poetical acquirements, by quoting from Byron, Milton, Young, and other verse-makers. He was once employed on a criminal case, and, as usual, launched forth in a flowery speech, quoting all the poets, both known and unknown, until he had worked the jury up into such a state of excitement, that they were ready to render their verdict in his favor instantly. The state's attorney, who was a very plain, straightforward man, listened quietly to the whole speech, and seemed much pleased with the happy effort of his young opponent. Slowly rising from his seat after the speech was ended, he said,—

"May it please the court and gentlemen of the jury—I have, for more than twenty years, practised in this court, and knew not, until my young brother's appearance at the bar, that every lawyer had to contribute his share of rhyme, and I beg your kind indulgence of my ignorance of this new style of pleading. I know but one piece of rhyme, and would never have recollected that, had not a friend of mine been wicked enough to perpetrate a parody on it. It was written for a fisherman, and I give it for the benefit of the court, who will please excuse its inappropriateness, as I have nothing better to contribute:—

'His pole was made of the sturdy oak,
And his line a cable that never broke;
He baited his hook with tigers' tails,
And sat on a rock and bobbed for whales.'

"My friend, whose couch was infested with a species of insect which is noted for its biting and skipping propensities, altered it to the following:—

'His pole was made of the peacock's feather,
And his line composed of the finest tether;
He baited his hook with mites of cheese,
And sat on his bed to bob for fleas.'

This burlesque was received with roars of laughter, and the discomfited young lawyer retired, having the mortification of hearing a verdict rendered against his client.

364. THE ORIGINAL BOMBASTES.

The word bombast is said by Webster to have been derived from the name of a stuff of loose texture used to swell garments. Hence high-sounding words are termed bombastic. But the real origin of the term we believe to have been from the family name of that strange and paradoxical genius, Paracelsus. Bombastus, or Bombastes, was the paternal appellation, for which, according to the custom of the age, he substituted the scholastic name of Paracelsus. This man, who was an ignorant and empirical physician, acquired a wonderful reputation for the cures he effected by the bold use of mercury and opium, and was raised to the professorship of medicine at Basle.

His turgid and inflated style of writing and lecturing led to the bestowal of his name, as descriptive of that manner of speaking and composition. The word was probably coined by some witty hearer of his bombastic discourses; and verily the sound of it is adapted to the sense. At length, we suppose, some manufacturer, seeking a title for a new "stuff of loose texture used to swell garments," fixed upon the word "bombast" as most descriptive: thus adding to its literary and primary sense a secondary and secular one.

365. THE POET'S SONNET.

There is much bombast in poetry as well as in prose. The following is a good specimen:—

A "young poet," in his autobiography, tells us that, for a long time after he commenced writing verse, he nursed his genius in secret, not daring to let his productions meet the public eye.

At length he composed a florid and high-sounding sonnet to the moon, and was so delighted with it that he determined to send it to a popular journal. For several weary weeks he searched the columns of the paper for the sonnet; but it did not appear. He was reduced almost to despair.

At last, as he glanced his eyes over "Notice to Correspondents," he was electrified with the following:—

"We have received from some one an effort at poetry, entitled SONNET TO THE MOON. The first two lines run thus:—

'Thou bright and silver medal, which the night
Wears on her vesture, buttoned with the stars!'

From the figure of this couplet and the sequel, it is evident that our author is a tailor, whose goose will never waft him to the summit of Parnassus."

BOOKS.

§ 34. THEIR ANCIENT VALUE.

366. PLATO, ALFRED, AND THE COUNTESS OF ANJOU.

It is recorded of Plato, that notwithstanding he had a very small paternal inheritance, he bought three books at a price equal to twelve hundred dollars our money.

Before the invention of printing, manuscripts in general bore such excessive prices, that few beside the opulent could acquire a library.

Benedict Bishop, founder of an English monastery, made no fewer than five journeys to Rome to purchase books; for one of these, a volume of Cosmography, King Alfred gave him an estate of as much land as eight ploughs could labor.

Muratori relates that an abbot earnestly besought the pope, in a letter in 825, to lend him a copy of Cicero on Oratory and Quintilian's Institutes; "for," says he, "a complete copy is not to be found in France."

The Countess of Anjou paid for a copy of Homilies two hundred sheep, five quarters of wheat, and the same quantity of rye and millet.

367. GEORGE OF AMBASAI TO THE CANONS OF BRUGES.

The following instance will show what incredible pains were taken in 1507 to collect books at immense expense, and to avoid the thunders of the church that were directed against any persons who should purloin or disperse the volumes belonging to the various monastic institutions. The fact is afforded by an epistle addressed by the cardinal legate, George of Ambasai, to the canons of Bruges, from whom he borrowed Hilary on the Psalms.

"George of Ambasai, presbyter of St. Sixtus, cardinal of Rouen, legate of the apostolic sec, to his dear friends the venerable fathers, the canons of the chapter of the sacred Chapel of Bruges, wisheth peace.

"Having been informed that in the library of your sacred chapel there was an ancient copy of Hilary of Poitiers on the Psalms; and taking great delight in literary pursuits, especially those which regard our holy religion, so far as our weak abilities will permit; we requested from your paternal kindness the loan of that book for a few days, to which you courteously acceded, notwithstanding the pontifical bull which forbade any books being taken from the library under pain of excommunication.

"Whereupon, having read the book with considerable pleasure, we have resolved to have it copied; for which purpose it will be requisite to have it in our possession for some months, though we intend, after it has been transcribed, to return it uninjured to your paternal care. We therefore absolve you from all censures or punishment you might incur by lending the book; and by the authority with which we are invested, do hereby pronounce and declare you absolved, notwithstanding any thing to the contrary contained in the aforesaid bull, or in any other.

368. ANCIENT AND MODERN BOOKS.

Jerome states that he had ruined himself by buying a copy of the Works of Origen. The Roman de la Rose was sold for above £30; and they usually fetched double or treble their weight in gold. "They sold at prices varying from £10 to £40 each, in 1400.

In our own times, the value of some volumes is very great. A copy of Macklin's Bible, ornamented by Mr. Tompkins, has been declared worth five hundred guineas. A yet more superb copy is at present in a London office for £3000.

369. LOUIS XI. BORROWING BOOKS.

In the year 1471, when Louis XI. borrowed the Works of Rhasis, the Arabian physician, from the faculty of medicine in Paris, he not only deposited in pledge a considerable quantity of plate, but was obliged to procure a nobleman to join with him as surety in a deed, binding himself under a great forfeiture to restore it.

When any person made a present of a book to a church or a monastery, in which were the only libraries during several ages, it was deemed a donation of such value, that he offered it on the altar pro remedia anime sue, in order to obtain forgiveness of his sins.

370. A COPY OF LIVY IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

Anthony Panormita, a learned Sicilian, in the fifteenth century, sold an estate that he might be able to purchase a copy of Livy. Of this circumstance we have a curious account, in a letter written by Panormita himself to Alphonsus, King of Naples, to whom he was secretary. It is as follows: "Sir, you have informed me from Florence that the books of Livy, written in a fair hand, are to be sold, and that they ask for them one hundred and twenty crowns. I beseech your majesty to cause to be sent to me this king of books, and I will not fail to send the money for it. And I entreat your prudence to let me know whether Pogins or I does better; he who, to purchase a farm near Florence, sells Livy, or I who, to purchase the book written with his own hand, sell my land? Your goodness and modesty induce me to put this familiar question to you. Farewell, and triumph!" It is to be hoped that the king sent him Livy, without subjecting him to the necessity of parting with his land for the book.

§ 35. OLD AND RARE.

371. ANCIENT COPY OF THE FOUR EVANGELISTS.

The original book upon which all the kings of England, from Henry I. to Edward VI., took the coronation oath, is now (1821) in the library of a gentleman in Norfolk. It is a manuscript of the Four Evangelists, written on vellum; the form and beauty of the letters nearly approaching to Roman capitals. It appears to have been written and fitted up for the coronation of Henry I. The original binding, which is still in a perfect state, consists of two oak-boards, nearly an inch thick, fastened together with stout thongs of leather, and the corners defended by large bosses of brass. On the right hand side, as the book is opened, of the outer cover, is a crucifix of brass, double gilt, which was kissed by the kings upon their inauguration, and the whole is fastened together by a strong clasp of brass fixed to a broad piece of leather, nailed on with two large brass pins.

372. CURIOUS DISCOVERY OF COVERDALE'S BIBLE.

A copy of the first complete edition of the English Bible, printed by Myles Coverdale, bearing the date 1435, was accidentally discovered, a short time since, in the false bottom of an old oak chest, at Holkham Hall, Norfolk, the seat of the Earl of Leicester. There are numerous imperfect copies of this edition of the Holy Scriptures in existence, two being deposited in the library of the British Museum, one in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, one in the Cambridge University Library, and in fact most of the great libraries and public institutions in labors hitherto known, being in every respect perfect, whereas all the other volumes enumerated are deficient of many leaves, both at the beginning and the end. The proprietor of Holkham has had the book appropriately bound and enclosed in an oaken box, and it now graces the shelves of his magnificent library. A London bookseller is said to have offered $500 for this bibliographical treasure.

373. GLANVILLE'S WORK.

Bartholomæus de Glanville, a writer who flourished about the middle of the fourteenth century, wrote De Proprietatibus Rerum, which was first printed in folio by Caxton, 1480. It was translated into English by Trevisa, and printed by Wynkin de Worde, in 1507. Mr. Dibdin, in his Typographical Antiquities, styles this "a volume of extraordinary typographical beauty and rarity." It is the first book printed on paper made in England.

374. A REMARKABLE BOOK.

The Hon. Thomas Greville, of London, was the possessor of a large and unique collection of books, the most curious and valuable of which he bequeathed to the British Museum. The value of those thus bestowed is computed at the large sum of £100,000, and the whole number of volumes exceeded 20,000. A very remarkable book indeed in this rare bequest was the Biblia Sacra Latina, upon vellum, the first edition of the Holy Scriptures, and the first book printed with movable types by the inventors of printing. It was printed at Mentz by Gutenberg and Faust, between the years 1450-5, and is executed in double columns, in imitation of the choir books of the period. The cost was so great that Schoeffer, the son-in-law of Faust, states in Trithemius's Chronicles that 4000 florins were expended before twelve sheets were finished. The bible is known as the Mazarin Bible, on account of a copy having been discovered in the library of Cardinal Mazarin. It is so scarce that but four copies upon vellum and fourteen upon paper exist, nearly all of which are in public libraries.

375. FOLIO COPY OF THE VULGATE.

An ancient printed folio copy of the Latin translation of the Bible, called the Vulgate, has been brought, says the New York Evening Post, to this office. It was printed at Cologne, in the year 1527, by Peter Quentel, and bears the arms of the free city of Cologne — the three crowns, which are supposed to refer to the old legend of the three kings of Cologne. It is said, in a memorandum in the inside of the cover, to be a duplicate of the Royal Library at Munich; and by another memorandum it appears to have belonged, in the year 1620 — the year of the settlement of the Pilgrims at Plymouth — to John Baptist Lehner, a priest of Rotterdam. The present owner is George C. Morgan, at No. 225 Pearl Street.

Notwithstanding that this old folio was printed in less than eighty years after the discovery of printing, the typography is remarkably neat, exact, and distinct. It is illustrated with cuts, either on wood or lead, representing the tabernacle, the altar, the temple, &c., of the Jews, and the persons of the twelve apostles — St. Mark with his lion, St. Luke with his ox, St. John with his eagle, &c. The different books of the Scriptures are divided into chapters, but not into verses; and instead of the latter division, certain letters of the alphabet are placed in the margin opposite to the different paragraphs, for the convenience of reference.

376. EARLY EDITIONS OF SHAKSPEARE.

A copy of the second edition of Shakspeare's Venus and Adonis, 1594, was sold in London, in 182—, at Messrs. Sotheby's, for £106. This edition was unknown to Malone and his contemporaries; the only other copy said to exist was left to the Bodleian Library by the late Mr. Caldecot. It is not a remainder of the first edition, but a distinct re-impression. Malone gave £25 for his copy of the first edition of 1593. It would fetch seven times that sum now. A copy of the Sonnets, of 1609, was sold at the same sale (title and dedication wanting, but supplied by Harris) for £33, a higher price than has been given before for a perfect copy. Garrick's copy of the first folio was knocked down for £86; bought at Garrick's sale for £34 2s. 6d., and by Garrick himself, when books were cheap, for £1 16s. The original selling price was £1. A kind of cup or rummer, made from Shakspeare's mulberry-tree, was sold on the same day for £30. This was "Tom Hill's" cup.

377. BUNYAN'S COPY OF THE BOOK OF MARTYRS.

There is no book, except the Bible, which Bunyan is known to have perused so intently as the Acts and Monuments of John Fox, the martyrologist, one of the best of men; a work more hastily than judiciously compiled, but invaluable for that greater and far more important portion which has obtained for it its popular name of "the Book of Martyrs." Bunyan's own copy of this work is in existence, and valued, of course, as such a relic of such a man ought to be. It was purchased, in the year 1780, by Mr. Wantner, of the Minorics; from him it descended to his daughter, Mrs. Parnell, of Botolph Lane; and it was afterwards purchased by subscription for the Bedfordshire General Library.

This edition of the Acts and Monuments is of the date 1641, three volumes folio, the last of those in the black letter, and probably the latest when it came into Bunyan's hands. In each volume he has written his name beneath the title page, in a large and stout print-hand. Under some of the wood cuts he has inserted a few rhymes, which are undoubtedly his own composition; and which, though much in the manner of the verses that were printed under the illustrations of his own Pilgrim's Progress, are very much worse than even the worst of those. Indeed, it would not be possible to find specimens of more miserable doggerel.

Here is one of the Tinker's tetrastichs, penned in the margin, beside the account of Gardiner's death.

"The blood, the blood that he did shed
Is falling one his one head;
And dreadful it is for to see
The beginners of his misere."

One of the signatures bears the date of 1662; but the verses must undoubtedly have been some years earlier, before the publication of his first tract. These curious inscriptions must have been Bunyan's first attempts in verse. He had, no doubt, found difficulty enough in tinkering them to make him proud of his work when it was done, otherwise he would not have written them in a book which was the most valuable of all his goods and chattels. In later days, he seems to have taken this book for his art of poetry. His verses are something below the pitch of Sternhold and Hopkins. But if he learnt there to make bad verses, he entered fully into the spirit of its better parts, and received that spirit into as resolute a heart as ever beat in a martyr's bosom.*

378. SCARCE BOOK

One of the scarcest books in the world is entitled Prieres et Meditations, par Antoine Godeau, Paris, 1643. It was printed in a peculiar form for the use of Anne of Austria, Queen of France, and the royal family, and only six copies were struck off.

379. CLARKE'S CÆSAR'S COMMENTARIES.

When the splendid folio edition of Cæsar's Commentaries, by Clarke, published on purpose to be presented to the great Duke of Marlborough, was sold, at the sale of Mr. Topham Beauclerk's library, for forty pounds, it was accompanied with an anecdote respecting that gentleman's mode of acquiring that copy, which deserves to be made public. Upon the death of an officer, who had this book in his possession, his mother, being informed that it was of some value, wished to dispose of it, and, being told that Mr. Topham Beauclerk was a proper person to offer it to, she waited upon him for that purpose. He asked what she required for it, and being answered four guineas, took it without hesitation, though unacquainted with the real value of the book. Being desirous, however, of information with respect to the nature of the purchase he had made, he went to an eminent bookseller, and inquired what he would give for such a book. The bookseller replied, seventeen guineas. Mr. Beauclerk, actuated by principles of strict justice and benevolence, went immediately to the person who sold him the book, and telling her that she had been mistaken in its value, not only gave her the additional thirteen guineas, but also generously bestowed a further gratuity upon her.

* Southey's Life of John Bunyan.

§ 36. CURIOUS FACTS.

380. JEWISH TALMUD.

The reading of the Jewish Talmud was forbidden by various edicts of the Emperor Justinian, of many of the French and Spanish kings, and numbers of popes. All the copies were ordered to be burnt. The intrepid perseverance of the Jews themselves preserved that work from annihilation. In 1566, twelve thousand copies were thrown into the flames at Cremona. John Reachlin interfered to stop this universal destruction of Talmuds; for which he became hated by the monks, and condemned by the Elector of Mentz. But appealing to Rome, the prosecution was stopped, and the traditions of the Jews were considered as not necessary to be destroyed.

381. ST. ISIDORE'S MISSAL.

The following anecdote respecting a Spanish missal, called St. Isidore's, is not incurious. Hard fighting saved it from destruction.

In the Moorish wars, all these missals had been destroyed, excepting those in the city of Toledo. There, in six churches, the Christians were allowed the free exercise of their religion. When the Moors were expelled, several centuries afterwards, from Toledo, Alphonsus VI. ordered the Roman missal to be used in those churches; but the people of Toledo insisted on having their own preferred, as being drawn up by the most ancient bishops, and revised by St. Isidore. It had been used by a great number of saints, and, having been preserved pure during Moorish times, it seemed to them that Alphonsus was more tyrannical than the Turks. The contest between the Roman and the Toletan missals came to that height, that at length it was determined to decide their fate by single combat. The champion of the Toletan missal felled, by one blow, the knight of the Roman missal. Alphonsus still considered this battle as merely the effect of the heavy arm of the doughty Toletan, and ordered a fast to be proclaimed, and a great fire to be prepared, into which, after his majesty and the people had joined in prayer for heavenly assistance in this ordeal, both the rivals—not the men, but the missals—were thrown into the flames. Again St. Isidore's missal triumphed, and this iron book was then allowed to be orthodox by Alphonsus, and the good people of Toledo were allowed to say their prayers as they had been long used to do. However, the copies of this missal at length became very scarce; for now, when no one opposed the reading of St. Isidore's missal, none cared to use it. Cardinal Ximenes found it so difficult to obtain a copy, that he printed a large impression, and built a chapel, consecrated to St. Isidore, that this service might be daily chanted as it had been by the ancient Christians.

382. LOSS OF VARIOUS WORKS.

The History of Phœnicia, by Sanchoniathon, supposed to be a contemporary with Solomon, is only known to us by a few valuable fragments preserved by Eusebius. The same ill fortune attends Manetho's History of Egypt, and Berosus's History of Chaldaea.

Of the History of Polybius, which once contained forty books, we have now only five; of the historical library of Diodorus Siculus, fifteen books only remain out of forty; and half the Roman antiquities of Dionysius Halicarnassensis has perished. Of the eighty books of the history of Dion Cassius, twenty-five only remain. The present opening book of Ammianus Marcellinus is entitled the fourteenth. Livy's history consisted of one hundred and forty books, and we only possess thirty-five of that pleasing historian. What a treasure has been lost in the thirty books of Tacitus! Little more than four remain. Murphy elegantly observes, that "the reign of Titus, the delight of human kind, is totally lost, and Domitian has escaped the vengeance of the historian's pen." Yet Tacitus, in fragments, is still the colossal torso of history.

It is curious to observe that Velleius Paterculus, of whom a fragment only has reached us, we owe to a single copy, no other having ever been discovered, and which occasions the text of this historian to remain incurably corrupt.

Taste and criticism have certainly incurred an irreparable loss in that Treatise on the Causes of the Corruption of Eloquence, by Quintilian, which he has himself noticed, with so much satisfaction, in his Institutes. Petrarch declares that, in his youth, he had seen the works of Varro, and the second decade of Livy; but all his endeavors to recover them were fruitless.

We have lost two precious works in ancient biography. Varro wrote the lives of seven hundred illustrious Romans; and Atticus, the friend of Cicero, composed another on the actions of the great men among the Romans. These works were enriched with portraits. When we consider that these writers lived familiarly with the finest geniuses of their times, and were opulent, hospitable, and lovers of the fine arts, their biography and their portraits are felt as an irreparable loss.

Among Pliny's works was a history in twenty books, which has entirely perished. We discover, also, the works of writers, which, by the accounts of them, appear to have equalled in genius those which have descended to us. The curious reader is referred to such a poet, whom Pliny, in book i. letter xvi., has feelingly described. He tells us that "his works are never out of my hands; and whether I sit down to write any thing myself, or to revise what I have already written, or am in a disposition to amuse myself, I constantly take up this agreeable author; and as often as I do so, he is still new." He had before compared this poet to Catullus; and, in a critic of so fine a taste as Pliny, to have cherished so constant an intercourse with the writings of this author, indicates high powers. Instances of this kind frequently occur.

The losses which the poetical world has sustained are sufficiently known by those who are conversant with the few invaluable fragments of Menander, who would have interested us much more than Homer; for he was evidently the domestic poet, and the lyre he touched was formed of the strings of the human heart. He was the painter of manners, and the historian of the passions. The opinion of Quintilian is confirmed by the golden fragments preserved for the English reader in the elegant versions of Cumberland. Even of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, who each wrote about one hundred dramas, seven only have been preserved of the former, and nineteen of Euripides. Of the one hundred and thirty comedies of Plautus we only inherit twenty imperfect ones.

383. MANUSCRIPT COPY OF LIVY.

"When there was a great fire in the scraglio at Constantinople, about fifty years ago," said M. Soyer, "a great portion of the furniture, and, among the rest, several books, were flung into the street. The secretary of the French embassy, then at the Porte, happened to be walking that way, and, as he was getting as well as he could through the crowd, he saw a man with a large folio volume which he had opened, but could not tell what to make of it. The secretary saw it was a manuscript of Livy, and, on turning over the leaves a little further, found that it had the second decade, as well as the first, and probably might have all that is lost to us. He offered the man a handsome reward, if he would keep the book under his long robe, and follow him with it to his lodgings. The man agreed to it, and followed him; but the crowd and confusion increasing, they were separated, and so the secretary lost the recovery of so great a treasure as this would have been to the learned world."

384. EIKON BASILIKE.

It is well known that a book under this title long passed as the production of King Charles I. The manner in which the imposition was detected was truly curious. In 1686, Mr. Millington, a celebrated auctioneer of that day, had to sell the library of the deceased Lord Anglesey. Putting up an Eikon Basilike, notwithstanding it was in the reign of the supposed royal author's son, there were but few bidders, and those very low in their biddings. Having thus leisure, while his hammer was suspended, to turn over the leaves, he read, with evident surprise, the following memorandum in Lord Anglesey's own handwriting:—

"King Charles the Second and the Duke of York did both (in the last session of Parliament, 1675, when I showed them, in the Lords' House, the written copy of this book, wherein are some corrections, written with the late King Charles the First's own hand) assure me that this was none of the said king's compiling, but made by Dr. Gauden, Bishop of Exeter; which I here insert for the undeceiving of others in this point, by attesting so much under my own hand. ANGLESEY."

This curious circumstance, coming to light at the end of forty years, led to much conversation; and several persons, who knew that Dr. Walker, an Essex clergyman, had descended from the Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Gauden, they made inquiries of him, as to whether he could throw any light on the subject. Dr. Walker said that Dr. Gauden acquainted him with the whole design, showed him the heads of divers chapters of the book, and some quite finished; and that on Dr. W.'s expressing his dissatisfaction that the world should be so imposed upon, the bishop told him to look at the title, the King's Portraiture; "for," said the bishop, "no man is supposed to draw his own picture." Toland may well exclaim, as he does, "a very nice evasion."

385. FIRST BOOK AUCTION.

The first book auction in England, of which we have any record, is of a date as far back as 1676, when the library of Dr. Seaman was brought to the hammer. Prefixed to the catalogue there is an address, which thus commences: "Reader, it hath not been usual here in England to make sale of books by way of auction, or who will give the most for them; but it having been practised in other countries, to the advantage of both buyers and sellers, it was therefore conceived (for the encouragement of learning) to publish the sale of these books in this manner of way."

386. A CURIOUS FACT.

It is stated (1848) that of the volumes of D'Aubigne's History of the Reformation that have appeared, from 150,000 to 200,000 copies are in circulation in the English language, into which they have been translated; while in their native language, the French, their circulation scarcely exceeds 4000.

387. VOLUMES OF TITLE PAGES.

It is a curious circumstance that in the British Museum are now to be found nine thick volumes, entirely composed of title pages, the collector of which spoiled thousands of volumes to obtain them.

388. NOTHING LIKE LEATHER.

At a public sale of books, the auctioneer put up Drew's Essay on Souls, which was knocked down to a shoemaker, who very innocently, but to the great amusement of the crowded room, asked the auctioneer if "he had any more works on shoemaking to sell."

389. FATE OF BOOKS.

In a work published in 1822, it is said there are 1000 books published per annum in Great Britain, on 600 of which there is a commercial loss, on 200 no gain, on 100 a trifling gain, and only on 100 any considerable profit; 750 are forgotten within the year, another 100 in two years, other 100 in three years, not more than 50 survive seven years, and scarcely 10 are thought of after twenty years. Of the 50,000 books published in the seventeenth century, not 50 are now in estimation. And of the 80,000 published in the eighteenth century, not more than 300 are considered worth reprinting, and not more than 500 are sought after in 1822. Since the first writings, 1400 years before Christ, i. e., in thirty-two centuries, only about 500 works of writers of all nations have sustained themselves against the devouring influence of time.

390. SKETCH OF THE ART.

Books were bound in oak boards until the fourteenth century, when they began to use velvet, and soon afterwards silk. Vellum and leather were introduced early in the fifteenth century. First in the ranks of bookbinders stands Roger Payne, "at whose magic name," says Dibdin, "the bibliomaniac rises in reverence." He was employed by the rich and curious, and charged, what was in those days (the latter part of the eighteenth century) considered very high prices for his work; for binding an Æschylus for Earl Spencer, he received fifteen guineas; a large sum, indeed, but not greater than the price sometimes paid at this day in London for covering a volume. A book of his binding is much prized by the collector. Then came Halthoeber, Charles Lewis, Herring, and several others, all admirable workmen, but none of them, for durability and elegance of finish, to compare with Hoyday, the great binder of London.

In this country, until within a few years past, but little attention has been paid to the binding of books, with respect either to strength or appearance.

391. THUANUS AND GROLLIER.

The passion for the acquisition and enjoyment of books has been the occasion of their lovers embellishing their outsides with costly ornaments; a rage which ostentation may have abused; but when these volumes belong to the real man of letters, the most fanciful bindings are often the emblems of his taste and feelings.

The great Thuanus was eager to purchase the finest copies for his library, and his volumes are still eagerly purchased, bearing his autograph on the last page.

A celebrated amateur was Grollier, whose library was opulent in these luxuries; the Muses themselves could not more ingeniously have ornamented their favorite works. "I have," says D'Israeli, "seen several in the libraries of our own curious collectors. He embellished their outside with taste and ingenuity. They are gilded and stamped with peculiar neatness, the compartments on the binding are drawn, and painted, with different inventions of subjects, analogous to the works themselves; and they are further adorned by that amiable inscription, Jo Grollieri et amicorum! purporting that these literary treasures were collected for himself and for his friends.

§ 37. NAMES AND TITLES.

392. ANCIENT TITLES SUGGESTED BY FRIENDSHIP.

The most illustrious of the ancients prefixed the name of some friend to the head of their works. We, too, often place that of some patron. They honorably inserted it in their works. When a man of genius, however, shows that he is not less mindful of his social affection than his fame, he is the more loved by his reader. Plato communicated a ray of his glory to his brothers; for in his Republic he ascribes some parts to Adimantus and Glaucon; and Antiphon the youngest is made to deliver his sentiments in the Parmenides. To perpetuate the fondness of friendship, several authors have entitled their works by the name of some cherished associate. Cicero, to his Treatise on Orators, gives the title of Brutus; to that of Friendship, Lelius; and to that of Old Age, Cato. They have been imitated by the moderns. The poetical Tasso, to his dialogue on Friendship, gave the name of Manson, who was afterwards his affectionate biographer. Sepulveda entitles his treatise on Glory by the name of his friend Gonsalves. Lociel, to his Dialogues on the Lawyers of Paris, prefixes the name of the learned Pasquier.

393. JEWISH TITLES.

The Jewish, and many Oriental authors, were fond of allegorical titles, which always indicate the most puerile age of taste. The titles were usually adapted to their obscure works. It might exercise an able enigmatist to explain their allusions; for we must understand by the Heart of Aaron, that it is a commentary on several of the prophets. The Bones of Joseph is an introduction to the Talmud. The Garden of Nuts, and the Golden Apples, are theological questions, and the Pomegranate with its Flower is a treatise of ceremonies, not any more practised. Jortin gives a title, which he says, of all the fantastical titles he can recollect, is one of the prettiest. A rabbin published a catalogue of rabbinical writers, and called it Labia Dormientium, from Cantic. vii. 9, "Like the best wine of my beloved that goeth down sweetly, causing the lips of those that are asleep to speak." It has a double meaning, of which he was not aware, for most of his rabbinical brethren talk very much like men in their sleep.

394. VARIOUS ECCENTRIC TITLES.

The writers of the seventeenth century had a most barbarous taste for titles. Some works were called Matches lighted by the Divine Fire, and one the Gun of Penitence. A collection of passages from the fathers is called the Shop of the Spiritual Apothecary. We have the Bank of Faith, and the Sixpennyworth of Divine Spirit.

One of these works bears the following elaborate title: Some fine Baskets baked in the Oven of Charity, carefully conserved for the Chickens of the Church, the Sparrows of the Spirit, and the sweet Swallows of Salvation.

Sometimes their quaintness has some humor. One Sir Humphrey Lind, a zealous Puritan, published a work which a Jesuit answered by another, entitled a Pair of Spectacles for Sir Humphrey Lind. The doughty knight retorted by a Case for Sir Humphrey Lind's Spectacles.

395. LUTHER'S COMMENTARY.

Luther was so delighted by his favorite Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, that he distinguished it by a title of doting fondness: he named it after his wife, and called it his Catharine.

396. TITLE OF A POEM ON TOBACCO.

The authors of the time of Elizabeth and James I. often put quaint and ridiculous titles to their books. Amongst others we may mention Joshua Sylvester, a puritanical poet, who wrote a poem against tobacco, which bears this title: Tobacco battered, and the Pipes shattered about their Ears that idly idolize so loathsome a Vanity, by a Volley of holy Shot thundered from Mount Helicon.

397. MISTAKEN TITLE.

De Chanterene composed several moral essays, which, being at a loss how to entitle, he called the Education of a Prince. He would persuade the reader, in his preface, that though they were not composed with a view to this subject, they should not, however, be censured for the title, as they partly related to the education of a prince. The world was too sagacious to be duped, and the author, in his second edition, acknowledges the absurdity, drops "the magnificent title," and calls his work Moral Essays.

398. FLEMISH TITLES.

Mr. and Mrs. Bilderdik, in Flanders, published poems under the singular title of White and Red. His own poems were called white, from the color of his hair; and those of his lady red, in allusion to the color of the rose. The idea must be Flemish!

399. HUDIBRAS.

"When Butler wrote his Hudibras, one Col. Rolle, a Devonshire man, lodged with him, and was exactly like his description of the knight; whence it is highly probable that it was this gentleman, and not Sir Samuel Luke, whose person he had in his eye. The reason that he gave for calling his poem Hudibras was, because the name of the old tutelar saint of Devonshire was Hugh de Bras." I find this in the Grub Street Journal, January, 1731, a periodical paper conducted by two eminent literary physicians, under the appropriate names of Bavius and Mævius, and which for some time enlivened the towns with the excellent design of ridiculing silly authors and stupid critics.

It is unquestionably proved, by the confession of several friends of Butler, that the prototype of Sir Hudibras was a Devonshire man; and if Sir Hugh de Bras be the old patron saint of Devonshire, which, however, cannot be found in Prince's or in Fuller's Worthies, this discovers the suggestion which led Butler to the name of his hero, burlesquing the new saint by pairing him with the chivalrous saint of the county; hence, like the knights of old, did

"*Sir Knight abandon dwelling,
And out he rode a Colonelling!*"

This origin of the name is more appropriate to the character of the work than deriving it from the Sir Hudibras of Spenser, with whom there exists no similitude.

It is as honorable as it is extraordinary that such was the celebrity of Hudibras, that the workman's name was often confounded with the work itself; the poet was once better known under the name of Hudibras than of Butler. Old Southern calls him Hudibras Butler; and if any one would read the most copious life we have of this great poet in the great General Dictionary, he must look for a name he is not accustomed to find among the English authors — that of Hudibras! One fact is remarkable, that, like Cervantes, and unlike Rabelais and Sterne, Butler, in his great work, has not sent down to posterity a single passage of indecent ribaldry, though it was written amidst a court which would have got such by heart, and in an age in which such trash was certain of popularity.

400. YOUNG'S NIGHT THOUGHTS.

"The title of my poem, Night Thoughts," says Dr. Young, "is not affected, for I never compose but at night, except sometimes when I am on horse-back."

401. SEVERE RETORT.

Soon after Lord Sidney's elevation to the peerage, he happened to observe in company that authors were often very ridiculous in the titles they gave. "That," said a gentleman present, "is an error from which even kings appear not to be exempt."

402. LOOSE THOUGHTS.

When Mrs. Macaulay published a pamphlet called Loose Thoughts, several ladies who happened to be in company with Foote reprobated the title as very improper for a woman. "Not at all, ladies; the sooner a woman gets rid of such thoughts the better."

403. ODD TITLES OF BOOKS IN NEW ENGLAND.

Some of the early fathers of New England were famous, as were some of their predecessors in England, for the significant titles which they gave to the books they published. Cotton's Milk for Babes was the title of a catechism which was long used in this country. The first page runs as follows: —

"Spiritual Milk for BOSTON BABES in either England. Drawn out of the Breasts of both Testaments for their Soul's Nourishment. But may be of like use to any Children. By John Cotton, B. D., late Teacher to the Church of Boston, in New England. Cambridge. Printed by S. G. for Hezekiah Usher, at Boston in New England, 1656."

The titles of Rev. John Leland's political pamphlets, &c., were often quaint and taking with the public to the highest degree.

Lorenzo Dow's titles were of the same character — "The best Way to kill the Devil," &c.

404. SERMONS TO ASSES.

At a meeting of the New York Historical Society, in 1849, the Rev. Dr. Adams presented to the library a manuscript volume entitled Sermons to Asses, supposed to have been written by Dr. Benjamin Franklin, in 1768.

About the same time a clergyman at Newcastle-on-Tyne, (Eng.) of the name of Murray, preached and printed a volume of political sermons, full of wit and power, with the same title.

405. ANCILLON.

Ancillon was a great collector of curious books, and dexterously defended himself when accused of the bibliomania. He gave a good reason for buying the most elegant editions, which he did not consider merely as a literary luxury. He said the less the eyes are fatigued in reading a work, the more liberty the mind feels to judge of it; and as we perceive more clearly the excellences and defects of a printed book than when in manuscript, so we see them more plainly in good paper and clear type than when the impression and paper are both bad. He always purchased first editions, and never waited for second ones; though it is the opinion of some that a first edition is generally the least valuable, and only to be considered as an imperfect essay, which the author proposes to finish after he has tried the sentiments of the literary world. Bayle approves of Ancillon's plan. Those who wait calmly for a book, says he, till it is reprinted, show plainly that they are resigned to their ignorance, and prefer the saving of a pistole to the acquisition of useful knowledge.

406. THE ROXBURGH CLUB.

Among other follies of the age of paper, which took place in England at the end of the reign of George III., a set of book fanciers, who had more money than wit, formed themselves into a club, and appropriately designated themselves the Bibliomaniacs. Dr. Dibdin was their organ; and among the club were several noblemen, who, in other respects, were esteemed men of sense. Their rage was, not to estimate books according to their intrinsic worth, but for their rarity. Hence, any volume of the vilest trash, which was scarce, merely because it never had any sale, fetched fifty or a hundred pounds; but if it were but one of two or three known copies, no limits could be set to the price. Books altered in the title page, or in a leaf, or any trivial circumstance which varied a few copies, were bought by these soi-disant maniacs, at one, two, or three hundred pounds, though the copies were not really worth more than threepence per pound. A trumpety edition of Boccaccio, said to be one of two known copies, was thus bought by a noble marquis for £1475, though, in two or three years afterwards, he resold it for £500. First editions of all authors, and editions by the first clumsy printers, were never sold for less than £50, £100, or £200.

To keep each other in countenance, these persons formed themselves into a club, and, after a duke, one of their fraternity, called themselves the Roxburgh Club. To gratify them, fac-simile copies of clumsy editions of trumpety books were reprinted; and, in some cases, it became worth the while of more ingenious persons to play off forgeries upon them. This mania after a while abated; and, in future ages, it will be ranked with the tulip and the picture mania, during which estates were given for single flowers and pictures.

407. SALE OF ROXBURGH'S LIBRARY.

Unlike most other species of property, books, in some instances, advance in value in proportion to their age. Many cases might be cited to prove this; the most remarkable on record is that of the great sale of Lord Roxburgh's library, in 1812, which occupied forty-five days at auction, and which cost its founder, fifty years before, less than £5000, but which actually realized on the occasion referred to the enormous sum of £23,341. One book, the folio (first) edition of Boccaccio, printed by Valdarfer, of which it is believed this was the only copy extant, brought £2260. Its original price was something like ten shillings. Bibliomania was at this time, certainly, at its extreme height.

408. BRITTON, THE MUSICAL SMALL-COAL MAN, AND OTHERS.

About the beginning of the 18th century a passion for collecting old books reigned among the English nobility. The names of those who sought after them were the Duke of Devonshire, Edward, Earl of Oxford, and the Earls of Pembroke, Sunderland, and Winchelsea. These persons in the winter season, on Saturdays, the Parliament not sitting on that day, were used to resort to the city, and, dividing themselves, took several routes, some to Little Britain, some to Moorfields, and others to different parts of the town, inhabited by booksellers. There they would inquire into the several shops, as they passed along, for old books and manuscripts; and some time before noon would assemble at the shop of Christopher Bateman, a bookseller, at the corner of Ave Maria Lane, in Paternoster Row; and here they were frequently met by Bagford and other persons engaged in the same pursuits, and a conversation always commenced on the subject of their inquiries. Bagford informed them where any thing curious was to be seen or purchased, and they in return obliged him with a sight of what they from time to time collected. While they were engaged in this conversation, and as near as could be to the hour of twelve by St. Paul's clock, Britton, known as "the musical small-coal man," who by that time had finished his round, arrived, clad in his blue frock, and pitching his sack of small coal on the bulk of Mr. Bateman's shop window, would go in and join them; and after a conversation which generally lasted about an hour, the noblemen above mentioned adjourned to the Mourning Bush, at Aldersgate, where they dined and spent the remainder of the day.

The singularity of Britton's character, the course of his studies, and the collections he made, induced suspicions that Britton was not the man he seemed to be. But he was a plain, simple, honest man; perfectly inoffensive, and highly esteemed by all that knew him, and, notwithstanding the meanness of his occupation, was called Mr. Britton. He was so much distinguished, that, when passing through the streets in his blue linen frock, and with his sack of small coal on his back, he was frequently accosted with the following expressions: "There goes the famous small-coal man, who is a lover of learning, a performer in music, and a companion for gentlemen."

His death was occasioned by a trick played upon him by Samuel Honeyman, a blacksmith, who was famous as a ventriloquist. This man was introduced to Britton by a Mr. Robe, a justice, for the purpose of terrifying him, and he succeeded in it. Honeyman announced, as from afar off, the death of poor Britton, within a few hours, with an intimation that the only way to avert his doom was for him to fall on his knees and say the Lord's prayer. Britton did as he was bid, went home and took to his bed, and in a few days died, leaving Mr. Robe to enjoy the fruits of his mirth.

409. BLACK-LETTER BOOKS.

It was in the period of Scott's early manhood that the mania for black-letter books began to manifest itself in the land, and, like the once notable tulip madness in Holland, proved an important source of emolument to those who had even a small capital to embark in the purchase of rare specimens. It was quite possible for such traders occasionally to purchase for a trifling sum an entire library from some improvident or illiterate representative of an old family, by whom the books were looked upon as mere lumber. From these the fortunate purchaser well knew how to select the gems inestimable in the eyes of a collector, any one of which, being properly set and adorned in its fragrant binding of Russia leather, would sometimes bring nearly as much money as had been given for the whole lot. It was, indeed, on this basis principally that Mr. Constable, who had the honor of publishing the Lay of the last Minstrel and Marmion, contrived to accumulate that wealth, or acquire that credit, which, if more prudently managed, might have insured him stability and reputation for life. Mr. Scott was one of the very few among Constable's patrons who could turn this mania to good account; for, whilst he seemed to the uninitiated to have an indiscriminate appetite for old books of every description, the truth was, that he seldom made a purchase of one without some rational and special object in view.

410. A RARE BOOK.

A collector of scarce books was one day showing me his small, but curious hoard. "Have you ever seen a copy of this book?" he asked, with every volume that he put into my hands; and when my reply was that I had not, he always rejoined, with a look and tone of triumph and delight, "I should have been exceedingly sorry if you had!"

§ 39. BOOKSELLERS AND PUBLISHERS.

411. CICERO'S PUBLISHER.

He employed the whole body of his slaves in writing. In his workshop, which excelled every thing that there had hitherto been in establishments of the kind, there were collected, as in our modern printing offices, all sorts of workmen, part of whom were engaged in preparing the paper and other materials, and repairing the instruments; part in multiplying the copies, and in correcting; part in skillfully rolling up the finished books and completing them with covers, titles, and the other customary ornaments. Atticus, in like manner, established a bookshop, such as at this time of day could be found nowhere in the world connected with any bookseller's or stationer's establishment. Cicero published most of his works with him, as for instance, the Questiones Academicæ, the Orator, his Letters, his Speeches against Antony and for Ligarius. The last, according to Cicero's own expression, "sold so capitably," that he declared his intention that for the future every thing he should write, Atticus should have to publish. We have here again clearly another example of the very great size of the editions. For Cicero, in this speech, had introduced by mistake a person long ago deceased as still living, and commissioned Atticus, after the book had already found a good sale, to have the mistake subsequently corrected by the erasure of the name in all the copies, that is, obviously, in those which were still unsold. But now how great must have been the remaining stock of copies, notwithstanding the large edition which had already been disposed of, when no fewer than three of the most skillful copyists were appointed to correct this one mistake. These, however, within three days, could certainly rectify at least a thousand copies. That Atticus, moreover, was not only concerned in the multiplication, but also in the sale of works; that his pursuit was not simply a hobby, but an actual business; this is clear from the extraordinary sale of the Ligarian speech. We even find Cicero himself in the number of his customers. He purchased from him a copy of the Serapion.

412. FALSE ESTIMATES OF PUBLISHERS.

Cave offered half the booksellers in London the property of the Gentleman's Magazine; and, as they all refused to engage in it, he was obliged to publish it himself, and it became one of the most popular periodicals in the world.

Dr. Buchan offered his Domestic Medicine to every principal bookseller of Edinburgh and London for £100, without obtaining a purchaser; and, after it had passed through twenty-five editions, it was sold in thirty-two shares at £50 each.

Beresford offered his copyright of the Miseries of Human Life to a bookseller for £20. It was rejected. It was subsequently published, however, and over £5000 were realized by its publication.

413. RIVAL PUBLISHERS.

Both Tonson and Lintot were rivals for publishing a work of Dr. Young's. The poet answered both their letters the same morning, but unfortunately misdirected them. In these epistles, he complained of the rascally cupidity of each. In the one he intended for Tonson, he said that Lintot was so great a scoundrel, that printing with him was out of the question; and writing to Lintot, he declared that Tonson was an old rascal, with many other epithets equally opprobrious.

414. THE ELDER TONSON.

The elder Tonson's portrait represents him in his gown and cap, holding in his right hand a volume lettered "Paradise Lost"—such a favorite object was Milton and copyright. Jacob Tonson was the founder of a race who long honored literature. His rise in life is curious. He was at first unable to pay twenty pounds for a play by Dryden, and joined with another bookseller to advance that sum; the play sold, and Tonson was afterwards enabled to purchase the succeeding ones. He and his nephew died worth two hundred thousand pounds.

Much old Tonson owed to his industry; but he was a mere trader. He and Dryden had frequent bickerings; he insisted on receiving ten thousand verses for two hundred and sixty-eight pounds, and poor Dryden threw in the finest ode in the language towards that number. He would pay in the base coin which was then current, which was a loss to the poet.

Tonson once complained to Dryden, that he had only received fourteen hundred and forty-six lines of his translations of Ovid for his Miscellany for fifty guineas, when he had calculated at the rate of fifteen hundred and eighteen lines for forty guineas; he gives the poet a piece of critical reasoning, that he considered he had a better bargain with "Juvenal," which is reckoned "not so easy to translate as Ovid." In these times such a mere trader in literature has disappeared.

415. DODSLEY.

Dodsley, a celebrated bookseller and publisher, was born in 1703, at Mansfield, in the county of Nottingham, only about twenty miles distant from Derby, the native place of Hutton. His parents were very poor, and his education, consequently, of the scantiest description. He was in the first instance bound apprentice to a stocking weaver; but after some time he abandoned this employment; and, having gone into service, became eventually footman to the Hon. Mrs. Lowther. In this situation, having addressed a copy of verses to Pope, he obtained the notice of that celebrated writer, and under his encouragement was induced to publish by subscription a volume of poems, to which he gave the title of the Muse in Livery. It attracted a good deal of the public attention, and was followed soon after by a satirical comedy, called the Toy-shop, which Pope was kind enough to read in manuscript, and to employ his influence in getting represented. Its success was so great, that the profits enabled the author to emerge from his humble situation, and to set up as a bookseller in Pall Mall. His difficulties were now over, and the way to independence was before him. By his prudence and steadiness he made his business, in course of time, an extremely valuable one, and became, at last, one of the most eminent London publishers of his day. But he neither forgot in his prosperity the humble station from which he had risen, nor neglected the cultivation of those powers to which he owed his elevation. One day, when his friend Pope happened, in conversing with him, to mention a certain individual celebrated for the good table he kept,—"I knew him well," said Dodsley; "I was his servant."

With all his attention to business, he found time for literature and authorship, and continued till near the close of his life to give to the world a succession of works, almost all of which enjoyed considerable popularity, and some of which may be said to have secured for him a durable name among the writers of his country.

His collection of maxims, in particular, entitled the Economy of Human Life, is well known, and was so highly esteemed on its first appearance as to be suspected to have proceeded from the pen of the celebrated Lord Chesterfield. This was long a popular work, not only in England, but in other countries; so much so, that there are enumerated about a dozen different translations of it into the French language alone.

416. WILLIAM HUTTON.

William Hutton, well known in the literary world as a bookseller, struggled in early life with innumerable difficulties. His own account of his first adventure as a bookseller is a good specimen of that spirit of indomitable perseverance which is ever the forerunner of success. He determined to set up in that character in the town of Southwell, about fourteen miles from Nottingham. Here he accordingly opened a shop, with, as he expresses it, about twenty shillings' worth of trash for all his stock.

"I was," says he, "my own joiner, put up my shelves and furniture, and in one day became the most eminent bookseller in the place." Being employed, however, during the other days of the week, in working at Nottingham as a bookbinder, he could only give his attendance at Southwell on Saturdays, that being, besides, quite enough for the literary wants of the place. "Throughout a very rainy summer, I set out," says he, "at five every Saturday morning, carried a burden of from three pounds' weight to thirty, opened shop at ten, starved in it all day upon bread, cheese, and a half pint of ale, took from one to six shillings, shut up at four, and, by trudging through the solitary night and the deep roads five hours more, I arrived at Nottingham at nine, where I always found a mess of milk porridge by the fire, prepared by my valuable sister." This humble attempt, however, was the beginning of his prosperity. Next year he was offered about two hundred pounds' weight of old books, on his note of hand, for twenty-seven shillings, by a dissenting minister, to whom he was known; and upon this he immediately determined to break up his establishment at Southwell, and to transfer himself to Birmingham. He did so, and succeeded so well, that by never suffering his expenses to exceed five shillings a week, he found that by the end of the first year he had saved about twenty pounds. This, of course, enabled him to extend his business, which he soon made a very valuable one. Birmingham was to Hutton what Philadelphia was to Franklin. The first time he had ever seen it was when he entered it after running away from his uncle's, a wearied and a homeless wanderer, with scarcely a penny in his pocket, and not a hope in the world to trust to. Yet in this place he was destined to acquire, some years after, an ample fortune, and to take his place among the most honored of its citizens.

417. DR. R. GRIFFITHS.

This very interesting character was for nearly fifty years the conductor of the Monthly Review. He was originally a watchmaker at Stone, in Staffordshire, and a steady attendant at the Presbyterian meeting at that place. Abandoning his trade, he came to London, and turned bookseller, first on Ludgate Hill, and afterwards in St Paul's Churchyard, and in Paternoster Row.

One of his first adventures as a publisher was in a notorious book of Cleland's. This work he had the assurance to recommend to the public as a rival of Tom Jones, in a printed criticism upon it, in one of the early numbers of the Monthly Review. He was, however, apprehended under a general warrant as the publisher; but, having contrived to remove the copies out of his house, by the back door, into Paternoster Row, while the officer was gone to get the warrant backed by the lord mayor, he escaped the punishment which otherwise might have befallen him.

He afterwards removed into the Strand, where he failed; and his Review, being sold for the benefit of his creditors, was purchased by Collins, then an enterprising bookseller of Salisbury. Under Collins the work improved in variety and reputation, if not in sale; and Griffiths, who had retained the management, regained the whole of the property itself about the year 1780.

He now began a new series, and the profits of the work were so much increased, that he commenced a handsome establishment at Turnham Green; latterly kept two carriages, and lived in good style. He was also made a doctor of law, by a New England university. He died at a time when his Review had attained the zenith of its glory, in his 86th year.

418. OSBORNE KNOCKED DOWN BY JOHNSON.

Tom Osborne, the bookseller, was one of "that mercantile, rugged race, to which the delicacy of the poet is sometimes exposed;" as the following anecdote will more fully evince: Johnson being engaged by him to translate a work of some consequence, he thought it a respect which he owed his own talents, as well as the credit of his employer, to be as circumspect in the performance of it as possible; in consequence of which, the work went on, according to Osborne's ideas, rather slowly; in consequence, he frequently spoke to Johnson of this circumstance, and, being a man of a coarse mind, sometimes, by his expressions, made him feel the situation of dependence. Johnson, however, seemed to take no notice of him, but went on according to the plan which he had prescribed for himself. Osborne, irritated by what he thought an unnecessary delay, went one day into the room where Johnson was sitting, and abused him in the most illiberal manner: amongst other things, he told Johnson he had been much mistaken in his man; that he was recommended to him as a good scholar, and a ready hand; but he doubted both; for "Tom Such-a-one would have turned out the work much sooner; and that being the case, the probability was, that by this here time the first edition would have moved off." Johnson heard him for some time unmoved; but, at last, losing all patience, he seized a huge folio, which he was at that time consulting, and, aiming it at the bookseller's head, succeeded so forcibly as to send him sprawling on the floor. Osborne alarmed the family with his cries; but Johnson, clapping his foot on his breast, would not let him stir till he had exposed him in that situation; and then left him, with this triumphant expression: "Lie there, thou son of dulness, ignorance, and obscurity!" *

419. JOHNSON AND MILLAR.

Andrew Millar was a principal proprietor of Johnson's Dictionary, and the manager or treasurer of the fund out of which the payments were from time to time issued to the author. When the work was completed, Andrew was so overjoyed, that he sent the following acknowledgment of the receipt of the last sheet of the manuscript:—

"Andrew Millar sends his compliments to Mr. Samuel Johnson, with the money for the last sheet of copy of the Dictionary, and thanks God he has done with him."

Which drew from Johnson this keen retort:—

"Samuel Johnson returns his compliments to Mr. Andrew Millar, and is very glad to find, as he does by his note, that Andrew Millar has the grace to thank God for any thing."

420. GENEROSITY OF MR. MILLAR, THE PUBLISHER.

The celebrated work so well known as Burn's Justice was written by Burn, a poor clergyman in the north of England. He came to London to sell his manuscript, and inquired of the landlord of the inn where he lodged if he was acquainted with any bookseller. The innkeeper introduced him to one, who, after keeping the manuscript for eight days, offered him twenty pounds for it. After a variety of disappointments of the same kind, the author waited on Mr. Millar, who was then rising fast into fame and fortune. He had sufficient strength of mind to see that honesty is the best policy, and by treating every writer with justice, and often with generosity, he acquired a most opulent fortune. He had in his employment gentlemen in every different branch of learning, who were to inform him of the merit of the different books submitted to their inspection. The manuscript in question was sent to a Scotch student in the Temple, and Burn, in the interim, received a general invitation to Mr. Millar's table.

In eight or ten days the manuscript was returned to Mr. Millar, with a note that it would be an excellent bargain at two hundred pounds. Next day, after dinner, when the glass had begun to circulate, he asked Burn what was the lowest sum that he would take. The poor man replied that the highest offer which he had received was twenty pounds—a sum too small to defray the expenses of his journey. "Will you accept two hundred guineas?" said Mr. Millar. "Two hundred guineas!" cried the parson, clapping his hands; "I am extremely fortunate." The book went through many impressions, and Mr. Millar, of his own good will, paid the clergyman a hundred pounds additional for each of them.

As the author loved Port, the bookseller further gave him a letter of credit for the purchase of a pipe per annum, during the rest of his life, in any wine cellar in London where he thought proper.

"After all this," added Mr. Millar, in telling the story, "I have lived to clear eleven thousand pounds by the bargain."

421. MILLAR'S PROFIT BY TOM JONES.

Millar gave two hundred pounds for the copyright of Tom Jones. Before he died he had cleared eighteen thousand pounds by it, out of which he had the generosity to make Fielding presents, at different times, of various sums, till they amounted to two thousand pounds; and he closed his life by bequeathing a handsome legacy to each of Mr. Fielding's sons.

422. MANUSCRIPT OF ROBINSON CRUSOE

Robinson Crusoe's manuscript ran through the whole trade; nor would any one print it, though the writer, Defoe, was in good repute as an author. One bookseller, at last, not remarkable for his discernment, but for his speculative turn, engaged in this publication. This bookseller got above a thousand guineas by it; and the booksellers are accumulating money every hour by editions of this work in all shapes. The second volume of this work, however, met with a small sale. The bookseller would have given two hundred pounds that it never had been printed, the first would have been so much more salable without it.

423. PERCEVAL AND PHILLIPS.

In January, 1793, Phillips, then a retail bookseller at Leicester, was indicted for vending a copy of Paine's Rights of Man, previously to Paine's conviction, when it was freely sold by all booksellers, and Perceval was retained as counsel against him, being his first cause in behalf of government.

A jury, convened by an officer who was the partner of the attorney for the prosecution, and the bench of a close corporation, afforded Perceval an easy triumph; yet on the occasion he exhausted all that vituperative eloquence, and pale-faced, cadaverous spleen, for which at the bar he was distinguished. Phillips was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment, and Perceval pursued his career of promotion. The former, denying the justice of the proceedings, suffered his imprisonment, and afterwards removed to London. A prosperous trade enabled him to keep a country house at Balize, Hampstead, and it so happened that it was the next premises to Perceval's, then attorney general, and afterwards chancellor of the exchequer. They frequently saw each other, but never spoke. In 1807, fourteen years after, Phillips became sheriff of London, and Perceval first lord of the treasury. They necessarily met at court, and still looked shy at each other. At length, on a suitable occasion, George III. conferred on Phillips the honor of knighthood, and immediately on his retiring from the king, he was saluted in the ear, in a pompous tone, by the words, "I congratulate Sir Richard Phillips." The latter turned his face, and it met that of Perceval. Struck by the incident, he exclaimed, "I am at once astonished and gratified by this coincidence. It is, sir, our first rencontre since we met at Leicester." "Well," said Perceval, "I am pleased to see in Mr. Phillips Sir Richard Phillips, sheriff of London; altered, I hope, as much in principles as in situation." "No," rejoined the other, "my principles are the same, and will, I trust, always continue unchanged." Perceval looked disappointed, and though the parties bowed and smiled when they met, Phillips always found himself crossed by the influence of Perceval, till, about three or four years after, Perceval was shot by Bellingham; and it so happened that Phillips, coming into the lobby of the House of Commons a few minutes after, was one of those who assisted in removing the lifeless body of his old opponent.

* "The identical book," says Nichols, "with which Johnson knocked down Osborne, (Biblia Graeca Septuaginta, folio, 1594, Frankfurt: the note written by the Rev. ——— Mills,) I saw, February, 1812, at Cambridge, in the possession of J. Thorpe, bookseller, whose catalogue, since published, contains particulars authenticating this assertion."

424. ROBINSON AND WALKER'S BARGAIN WITH WOLCOT.

Dr. Wolcot, better known by the name of Peter Pindar, from the prodigious sale of his early pieces, became a desirable object of bookselling speculation; and about the year 1795, Robinson and Walker entered into a treaty to grant him an annuity for his published works, and, on certain conditions, for his unpublished ones. While this was pending, Peter had an attack of asthma, which he did not conceal or palliate; but, at meetings of the parties, his asthma always interrupted the business. A fatal result was of course anticipated; and instead of a sum of money, an annuity of two hundred and fifty pounds per annum was preferred. Soon after the bond was signed, Peter called on Walker, the manager for the parties, who, surveying him with a scrutinizing eye, asked him how he did. "Much better, thank you," said Peter; "I have taken measure of my asthma; the fellow is troublesome, but I know his strength, and am his master." "O," said Walker, gravely, and turned into an adjoining room, where Mrs. Walker, a prudent woman, had been listening to the conversation. Peter, aware of the feeling, paid a keen attention to the husband and wife, and heard the latter exclaim, "There, now, didn't I tell you he wouldn't die? Fool that you've been! I knew he wouldn't die." Peter enjoyed the joke, and outlived both the parties, receiving the annuity for twenty-four years, during which time various efforts were used to frustrate his claims.

425. A LONDON PUBLISHER.

One of those booksellers in Paternoster Row, who published books in numbers, at a time when all sorts of rubbish was so circulated, went to Gibbon's lodgings in St. James's Street, sent up his name, and was admitted. "Sir," said he, "I am now publishing a History of England, done by several good hands. I understand you have a knack at them there things, and should be glad to give you every reasonable encouragement." As soon as Gibbon recovered the use of his legs and tongue, which were petrified with surprise, he ran to the bell, and desired his servant to show this encourager of learning down stairs.

426. EXPERIENCE OF A PUBLISHING HOUSE.

On an investigation into the affairs of an extensive publishing concern, it was found that of one hundred and thirty works published by it in a given time, fifty had not paid their expenses. Of the eighty that did pay, thirteen only arrived at a second edition; but in most instances these second editions had not been profitable. In general it may be estimated, that of the books published, a fourth do not pay their expenses; and that only one in eight or ten can be reprinted with advantage. As respects pamphlets, we know we are within the mark when we affirm that not one in fifty pays the expenses of its publication.

427. LONDON PUBLISHERS.

The book trade of London, says a writer in 1822, divides itself into four branches—the general retail bookseller, the dealer in old or second-hand books, the wholesale bookseller, who executes country and foreign orders, and the publishing or manufacturing bookseller. The second class are now scattered over the town, but they formerly resided in Little Britain, which was famous for them. The wholesale trade have always resided in and near Paternoster Row, but the chief house of this class was for many years on London Bridge; and, in the reign of George II., Hodges, the principal, failing, he became town clerk of London, and was knighted on the first city address in 1760. His extensive correspondence devolved on Crowder, one of his clerks, who removed to Paternoster Row; and he failing, it was divided between Evans, Robinson, and Longman, when the two former failing, that branch of the trade is now chiefly enjoyed by Longman & Co., Baldwin & Co., and Whitaker & Co. Many publishers resided in Little Britain; but Osborne lived under the gateway of Gray's Inn; Tomson opposite the Strand Bridge; Miller just opposite St. Clement's Church, and afterwards opposite Catharine Street; Dodsley on the site of the Shakespeare Gallery, in Pall Mall; Rivingtons, the High Church, and Johnson, the Low Church, publishers, both in St. Paul's Churchyard, and Dilly in the Poultry. The Robinsons, at once the chief of wholesale and publishing booksellers, lived in Paternoster Row. London produces about one thousand new books and pamphlets in every year, and one hundred and twenty monthly and quarterly publications, upon all which are returned about a million per annum.

428. FRANKLIN AS A BOOKSELLER.

The following story, told of Franklin's mode of treating the animal called in those days "loungeur," is worth putting into practice occasionally, even in this age and generation:—

One fine morning, when Franklin was busy preparing his newspaper for the press, a lounge stepped into the store, and spent an hour or more looking over the books, &c., and finally, taking one in his hand, asked the shop boy the price.

"One dollar," was the answer.

"One dollar," said the lounge; "can't you take less than that?"

"No, indeed; one dollar is the price."

Another hour had nearly passed, when the lounge asked, —

"Is Mr. Franklin at home?"

"Yes, he is in the printing office."

"I want to see him," said the lounge.

The shop boy immediately informed Mr. Franklin that a gentleman was in the store waiting to see him. Franklin was soon behind the counter, when the lounge, with book in hand, addressed him thus: —

"Mr. Franklin, what is the lowest you can take for this book?"

"One dollar and a quarter," was the ready answer.

"One dollar and a quarter! Why, your young man asked only a dollar."

"True," said Franklin, "and I could have better afforded to have taken a dollar than than to have been taken out of the office."

The lounge seemed surprised, and wishing to end the parley of his own making, said, —

"Come, Mr. Franklin, tell me what is the lowest you can take for it."

"One dollar and a half."

"A dollar and a half! Why, you offered it yourself for a dollar and a quarter."

"Yes," said Franklin, "and I had better have taken that price than than a dollar and a half now."

The lounge paid down the price, and went about his business, — if he had any, — and Franklin returned into the printing office.

429. THE HARPERS.

In 1826, James and John Harper worked as journeymen in a printing office in New York. They were distinguished, like Franklin, for industry, temperance, and economy. The well-known editor of the Albany Evening Journal worked as a journeyman printer at that time in the same establishment. "James," says he, "was our partner at the press. We were at work as soon as the day dawned; and though, on a pleasant summer afternoon, we used to sigh occasionally for a walk upon the Battery before sundown, he never would allow the 'balls to be capped' until he had broken the back of the thirteenth 'token.'"

What is the sequel? The journeyman printer of 1826 has become the head of one of the first — if not the first — publishing houses in the world; a man of ample fortune, and enjoying the confidence of his fellow-citizens in an eminent degree. It was in 1844 that, in the city in which he was first known as a journeyman printer, his name was made the rallying cry of a new political party, whose irresistible enthusiasm and overwhelming numbers speedily elevated him to the chief magistracy of the great metropolis of the western world.

430. BARTHE AND HIS DYING FRIEND.

BARTHE, the French dramatic author, was remarkable for selfishness. He was so completely wrapped up in the consciousness of his own importance as to be often strangely insensible to the wants and woes of others.

Calling upon a friend, whose opinion he wished to have on a new comedy, he found him in his last moments, but, notwithstanding, proposed to him to have it read. "Consider," said the dying man, "I have not more than an hour to live." "Ay," replied Barthe, "but this will occupy only half that time."

aply named professor Dragg, who, in spite of her, would occasionally succeed in bestowing all his tediousness upon her. One evening she had a party at her house, (among whom was Dumont, well known as the friend and correspondent of Sir Samuel Romilly,) when in walked the very learned and much dreaded professor. Seizing the opportunity of the very first lull in conversation, he took from his pocket a huge manuscript, and, without the slightest provocation, proceeded to inflict the reading of it upon the company. Signs of impatience and weariness were soon manifest upon every countenance. Dumont was soon set fast asleep by the combined dullness of the professor's matter, and his monotonous, drawing manner of reading. As for poor Madame de Staël, she, being in her own house, was compelled to submit, with the best grace she could, to the agonies of this unmerciful course of bore-ism. Matters had gone on in this way for half an hour, — and what is a half hour! — when Dumont suddenly awoke, and, rubbing his eyes, apologetically exclaimed, "I hope I have not been asleep long!" "My dear Dumont," cried Madame de Staël, "according to my computation of the time, you have been asleep during two entire centuries!" Dragg took the hint and his leave at the same time.

431. A LONG SLEEP.

Madame de Staël could not endure a bore. There was at Geneva a person of the first class, not in-

432. THE GREATEST BORE IN LONDON.

When Sir William Curtis returned from his voyage to Italy and Spain, he called to pay his respects to Mr. Canning, at Gloucester Lodge. Among other questions, Sir William said, "But, pray, Mr. Canning, what do you say to the tunnel under the Thames?" "Say," replied the secretary, "why, I say it will be the greatest bore London ever had, and that is saying a great deal."

433. THE BORE AND THE AUTHOR.

The following anecdote, originally related by Helvetius, affords a hint to the respectable community of bores. One of these, having nothing else to do with himself, went one day to call on his neighbor, "a man of letters." The latter received him with all possible politeness, and entertained him as well as he could till he rose to carry his tediousness elsewhere, when the man of letters resumed his work, and utterly forgot his visitor. Some days afterwards he found himself accused of a want of politeness in not returning the visit, upon which he repaired to his neighbor's, and thus addressed him: "I hear that you complain of me; yet you know full well that you called, not because you wished for my company, but because you were tired of your own. I, who was not at all tired of my own company, received you as well as I could; the obligation is consequently on your side, and yet you charge me with rudeness. Be yourself the judge of my conduct, and decide whether you ought not to have done with complaints which prove nothing more than my independence of them, the inhumanity of boring your neighbor, and the injustice of abusing him after boring him."

434. SCOTT AND THE AMERICAN AUTHORESS.

"One morning," said Scott, "I opened a huge lump of a despatch, without looking to know how it was addressed, never doubting that it had travelled under some omnipotent frank, like the first lord of admiralty's, when, lo and behold, the contents proved to be a manuscript play, by a young lady of New York, who kindly requested me to read and correct it, equip it with prologue and epilogue, procure for it a favorable reception from the manager of Drury Lane, and make Murray or Constable bleed handsomely for the copyright; and, inspecting the cover, I found that I had been charged five pounds odd for the postage. This was bad enough; but there was no help, so I groaned and submitted. A fortnight or so after, another packet, of not less formidable bulk, arrived, and I was absent enough to break its seal too, without examination. Conceive my horror, when out jumped the same identical tragedy of the Cherokee Lovers, with a second epistle from the authoress, stating that, as the winds had been boisterous, she feared the vessel intrusted with her former communication might have foundered, and therefore judged it prudent to forward a duplicate."

435. CHARLES LAMB IN A FIX.

"We travelled with one of those troublesome fellow-passengers in a stage coach that is called a well informed man. For twenty miles we discoursed about the properties of steam, probabilities of carriage by ditto, till all my science, and more than all, was exhausted, and I was thinking of escaping my torment by getting up on the outside, when, getting into Bishop's Stortford, my gentleman, spying some farming land, put an unlucky question to me—'what sort of a crop of turnips I thought we should have this year.' Emma's eyes turned to me, to know what in the world I could have to say; and she burst out into a violent fit of laughter, maugre her pale, serious cheeks, when, with the greatest gravity, I replied, that 'it depended, I believed, upon boiled legs of mutton.'"

436. JOHNSON AND THE AUTHOR'S MANUSCRIPT.

Bores—immeasurable bores—are literary men when they insist on reading their manuscripts to their friends. On these occasions their pertinacity—their awful determination to bring about a first reading—perhaps the first and the last ever to be obtained by the work—is almost incredible. Johnson must have suffered deeply from this species of bore, when, on observing what a showman would call "a literary man of the period" slowly and insidiously producing a manuscript, the lexicographer jumped up, and with a shout which sent Boswell quaking into a corner, roared, "At your peril, sir, at your peril!"

437. WEST'S DISCOVERY.

When West was about fifteen years old, he was attacked by a fever. Every fresh aspect of his early life had something in it remarkable and romantic. When good medicine and good nursing began to remove his complaint, another adversary invaded his repose. This was a shadowy illusion, which, like an image in a dream, was ever unstable, and changing shape as well as hue. It became first visible in the form of a white cow, which entered on one side of the house, walked over his bed, and vanished. A sow and litter of pigs succeeded. His sister thought him delirious, and sent for a physician; but his pulse had a recovering beat in it, his skin was moist and cool, his thirst was gone, and every thing betokened convalescence. While the doctor stood puzzled about a disease which had such healthy symptoms, he was alarmed by West assuring him that he saw the figures of several friends passing at that moment across the roof. Conceiving these to be the professional visions of a raving artist, he prescribed a draught which would have brought sleep to all the eyes of Argus, and departed. As he went, up rose West, and discovered that all those visitations came through a knot-hole in the shutters, which threw into the darkened room whatever forms were passing along the street at the time. He called in his sister, showed her the apparitions gliding along the ceiling, then laid his hand on the aperture, and all vanished. On recovering, he made various experiments, which he communicated to Williams, who found it to be what Butler calls "a new-found old invention." He produced a London camera obscura, and West contented himself with the praise due to collateral ingenuity.

438. DODWELL AND THE DISDAR OF ATHENS.

Mr. Dodwell, when travelling through Greece, experienced numerous vexations from the Disdar of Athens, who was very rapacious in his demands for granting leave to copy inscriptions. A ridiculous circumstance at length released him from the importunities of this mercenary Turk. "I was one day," says Mr. D., "engaged in drawing the Parthenon with the aid of my camera obscura, when the disdar, whose surprise was excited by the novelty of the sight, asked, with a sort of fretful inquisitiveness, what new conjuration I was performing with the extraordinary machine. I endeavored to explain, by putting in a clean sheet of paper, and making him look into the camera obscura; but he no sooner saw the temple instantaneously reflected on the paper, in all its lines and colors, than he imagined that I had produced its effect by some magical process. His astonishment appeared mingled with alarm, and, stroking his long, black beard, he repeated the words, 'Allah! Masch, Allah!' (a term of admiration, meaning that which is created by God,) several times. He again looked into the camera obscura with a kind of cautious diffidence, and, at that moment, his soldiers, happening to pass before the reflecting glass, were beheld by the astonished disdar walking upon the paper. He soon became outrageous, and, after calling me 'pig,' 'devil,' and 'Bonaparte,' he told me that, if I chose, I might take away the temple, and all the stones in the citadel, but that he would never permit me to conjure his soldiers into my box. When I found that it was in vain to reason with his ignorance, I changed my tone, and told him that, if he did not leave me unmolested, I would put him into my box, and that he should find it a very difficult thing to get out again. His alarm was now visible; he immediately retired, and ever after stared at me with a mixture of apprehension and amazement. When he saw me come into the Acropolis, he carefully avoided my approach, and never afterwards gave me further molestation."

439. CARICATURE OF BORGHESE.

One of the cleverest caricatures issued in Paris during Napoleon's reign was levelled at the Prince Borghese, the husband of the emperor's sister Pauline. The prince was a good-natured, thick-headed sort of a personage, possessed an immense fortune, and greatly devoted to the pleasures of the table. The caricaturist placed him in the centre of a group of jackasses, making him exclaim, "Where can one be happier than in the bosom of his own family?"

440. JOHNSON AND THE MUSES.

It was after the publication of the Lives of the Poets, that Dr. Farr, being engaged to dine with Sir Joshua Reynolds, mentioned, on coming in, that, in his way, he had seen a caricature, which he thought clever, of the nine muses flogging Dr. Johnson round Parnassus. The admirers of Gray and others, who thought their favorites harshly treated in the Lives, were laughing at Dr. Farr's account of the print, when Dr. Johnson himself was announced. Dr. Farr being the only stranger, Sir Joshua introduced him, and, to Dr. Farr's infinite embarrassment, repeated what he had just been telling them. Johnson was not at all surly on the occasion, but said, turning to Dr. Farr, "Sir, I am very glad to hear this. I hope the day will never arrive when I shall neither be the object of calumny or ridicule, for then I shall be neglected and forgotten."

441. BURTON AND HOGARTH.

In the year 1745, one Launcelot Burton was appointed naval officer at Dover. Hogarth had seen this gentleman by accident, and, on a piece of paper, previously impressed by a plain copperplate, he drew his portrait, with a pen, in imitation of a coarse etching. Mr. Burton was represented as riding on a lean Canterbury hack, with a bottle sticking out of his pocket, and underneath was an inscription, intimating that he was going down to take possession of his place. The sketch was enclosed to him in a letter; and some of his friends, who were in the secret, protested that the drawing was a print which they had seen exposed for sale in the print shops in London. This put him in a violent passion, and he wrote an abusive letter to Hogarth, whose name was subscribed to the work. But after poor Burton's tormentors had kept him in suspense throughout three uneasy weeks, they proved to him that it was no engraving, but merely a sketch with pen and ink. He then became so perfectly reconciled to his resemblance that he showed it with exultation to Admiral Vernon and the rest of his friends.

442. BURKE CARICATURED.

The following epigrammatic caricature upon Burke was attributed to the pen of Lord Ellenborough. It was enclosed in a cover, and presented to Burke as he was about to open one of the principal charges against Warren Hastings in the high court of Parliament.

"Oft have we wondered that on Irish ground
No poisonous reptile ever yet was found;
Revealed the secret stands of Nature's work —
She saved her venom to create a Burke."

With an air of blended indignation and contempt, he tore it in pieces, and scattered it about the hall. The stanza, however, was impressed upon his memory, and subsequently, in an air of jocularly, repeated by him to some friends.

443. JOHNSON AND LEGENDARY STORIES

Some of the old legendary stories, put in verse by modern writers, provoked Johnson to caricature them thus one day at Streatham: —

"The tender infant, meek and mild,
Fell down upon the stone;

The nurse took up the squealing child,
But still the child squealed on."

A famous ballad, also, beginning "Rio verde, rio verde," when the translation of it was commended, he said he could do it better himself, as thus:—

"Glassy water, glassy water,
Down whose current, clear and strong,
Chieft, confused in mutual slaughter,
Moor and Christian, roll along."

"But, sir," it was observed, "this is not ridiculous at all." "Why, no," replied he, "why should I always write ridiculously? Perhaps because I made these verses to imitate such a one, naming him:—

"Hermit hoar, in solemn cell,
Wearing out life's evening gray,
Strike thy bosom, sage, and tell
What is bliss, and which the way."

"Thus I spoke, and speaking sighed,
Scarce repressed the starting tear,
When the hoary sage replied,
'Come, my lad, and drink some beer!'"

CHIROGRAPHY.

§ 43. NOTED WRITING MASTERS.

444. BALES AND JOHNSON.

MONG the knights of the "plume volant," whose chivalric exploits astonished the beholders, must be distinguished Peter Bales in his joust with David Johnson. In this tilting match, the guerdon of calligraphy was won by the greatest of calligraphers; its arms were assumed by the victor, while "the golden pen," carried away in triumph, was painted, with a hand, over the door of the calligrapher. The history of this renowned encounter is given in the precious manuscript of the champion himself, who, like Cæsar, not only knew how to win victories, but also to record them. Holingshed chronicles one of Peter Bales's curiosities of microscopic writing at a time when the taste prevailed for admiring writing which no eye could read. In the compass of a silver penny, this calligrapher put more things than would fill several duodecimo pages. He presented Queen Elizabeth with a manuscript set in a ring of gold, covered with a crystal. He had also contrived a magnifying glass of such power, that, to her delight and wonder, her majesty read the whole volume, which she held on her thumb nail, and "commended the same to the lords of the council and the ambassadors;" and frequently, as Peter often heard, did her majesty vouchsafe to wear this calligraphic ring.

For a whole year had David Johnson affixed a challenge, "To any one who should take exceptions to this my writing and teaching." He was a young friend of Bales, daring and longing for an encounter; yet Bales was magnanimously silent, till he discovered that he was "doing much less in writing and teaching" since this public challenge was proclaimed. He then set up his counter challenge, and, in one hour afterwards, Johnson arrogantly accepted it "in a most despitelful and arrogant manner." Bales's challenge was delivered "in good terms"—"To all Englishmen and strangers." It was to write for a gold pen of twenty pounds' value, in all kinds of hands, "best, straightest, and fastest, and most kinds of ways; a full, a mean, a small, with line and without line; in a slow, set hand, a mean, facile hand, and a fast, running hand;" and further, "to write truest and speediest, most secretary and clerklike, from a man's mouth, reading or pronouncing, either English or Latin."

On Michaelmas day, 1595, the trial opened before five judges. The appellant and the respondent appeared at the appointed place, and an ancient gentleman was intrusted with "the golden pen." In the first trial, for the manner of teaching scholars, after Johnson had taught his pupil a fortnight, he would not bring him forward. This was awarded in favor of Bales.

The second, for secretary and clerklike writing, dictating to them both in English and in Latin, Bales performed best, being first done, written straightest without line, with true orthography, the challenger himself confessing that he wanted the Latin tongue, and was no clerk.

The third and last trial for fair writing in sundry kinds of hands, the challenger prevailed for the beauty and most "authentic proportion," and for the superior variety of the Roman hand. In the court hand, the respondent exceeded the appellant, and likewise in the set text, and in bastard secretary was also somewhat more perfect.

At length Bales, perhaps perceiving an equilibrium in the judicial decisions, to overwhelm his antagonist, presented what he distinguishes as his "masterpiece," composed of secretary and Roman hand, four ways varied, and offering the defendant to let pass all his previous advantages if he could better this specimen of calligraphy. The challenger was silent! At this moment, some of the judges, perceiving that the decision must go in favor of Bales, in consideration of the youth of the challenger, lest he might be disgraced to the world, requested the other judges not to pass judgment in public. Bales assures us that he in vain remonstrated; for, by these means, the winning of the golden pen might not be so famously spread as otherwise it would have been. To Bales the prize was awarded.

This is the first contention met with for the golden pen, though other memorable ones have since occurred. In 1597, when Bales republished his Writing Schoolmaster, he was in such high reputation for it, that no less than eighteen copies of commendatory verses, composed by learned and ingenious men of that time, were printed before it. He also, by other exercises of his pen, recommended himself to many other persons of knowledge and distinction, particularly by making fair transcripts of the learned and ingenious compositions of some honorable authors, which they designed as presentation books to the queen, or others, their friends or patrons, of high dignity, some of which manuscripts have been, for the beauty of them, as well as for their instructive contents, preserved as curiosities to these times. Among the Harleian manuscripts, (now in the British Museum,) No. 2368, there is a thin vellum book, in small 4to., called Archeion. At the end of that treatise is a neat flourish, done by command of hand, wherein are the letters P. B., which shows, says a note in that book, that this copy was written by the hand of Peter Bales, the then famous writing master of London.

Perhaps, however, Bales was as much exceeded by Mr. Tomkins, writing master of St. Paul's School, as Bales himself exceeded his contemporaries. Among other attainments, Mr. Tomkins was asked to strike a perfect circle, and his specimens in the chamberlain's office of the city of London are not likely to be exceeded for its taste and elegance.

Tomkins, the vainest of writing masters, dreamed through life that penmanship was one of the fine arts, and that a writing master should be seated with his peers in the Academy. He bequeathed to the British Museum his opus magnum, a copy of Mack-lin's Bible, profusely embellished with the most beautiful and varied decorations of his pen; and as he conceived that both the workman and the work would alike be darling objects with posterity, he left something immortal with the legacy, his fine bust by Chantrey, unaccompanied by which they were not to receive the unparalleled gift. When Tomkins applied to have his bust, our great sculptor abated the usual price, and, courteously kind to the feelings of the man, said that he considered Tomkins as an artist! It was the proudest day of the life of our writing master.

But an eminent artist and wit now living, once looking on this fine bust of Tomkins, declared that "this man had died for want of a dinner!" — a fate, however, not so lamentable as it appeared. Our penman had long felt that he stood degraded in the scale of genius by not being received at the Academy, at least among the class of engravers. The next approach to academic honor he conceived would be that of appearing as a guest at their annual dinner. These invitations are as limited as they are select, and all the Academy persisted in considering Tomkins as a writing master! Many a year passed, every intrigue was practised, every remonstrance was urged, every stratagem of courtesy was tried; but, never ceasing to deplore the failure of his hopes, it preyed on his spirits, and the luckless calligrapher went down to his grave — without dining at the Academy.

§ 44. MICROSCOPIC WRITING.

446. ILIAD IN A NUTSHELL.

The Iliad of Homer in a nutshell, which Pliny says that Cicero once saw, it is pretended might have been a fact, however to some it may appear impossible. The learned Huet asserts that he, like the rest of the world, for a long time considered as a fiction the story of that industrious writer who is said to have enclosed the Iliad in a nutshell. But having examined the matter more closely, he thought it possible.

One day, in company at the dauphin's, this learned man trifled half an hour in proving it. A piece of vellum, about ten inches in length and eight in width, pliant and firm, can be folded up and enclosed in the shell of a large walnut. It can hold in its breadth one line, which can contain 30 verses, and in its length 250 lines. With a crow-quill the writing can be perfect. A page of this piece of vellum will then contain 7500 verses, and the reverse as much — the whole 15,000 verses of the Iliad. And this he proved in their presence, by using a piece of paper, and with a common pen. The thing is possible to be effected; and if on any occasion paper should be most excessively rare, it may be useful to know that a volume of matter may be contained in a single leaf.

447. DRAWING OF THE HEAD OF CHARLES I., ETC.

There is a drawing of the head of Charles I., in the library of St. John's College, at Oxford, wholly composed of minute written characters, which at a small distance resemble the lines of an engraving. The lines of the head, and the ruff, are said to contain the Book of Psalms, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer. In the British Museum, we find a drawing representing the portrait of Queen Anne, not much above the size of the hand. On this drawing appear a number of lines and scratches, which the librarian assures the marvelling spectator includes the entire contents of a thin folio, which on this occasion is carried in the hand.

448. A MONK'S CALLIGRAPHY.

In the sixteenth century, an Italian monk, named Peter Almunus, wrote the Acts of the Apostles and the Gospel of St. John within the circumference of a farthing.

449. CLOSE WRITING FOR QUEEN ELIZABETH.

A man presented to Queen Elizabeth a bit of paper, of the size of a finger nail, containing the Ten Commandments, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer, together with her name, and the date of the year. The whole could be read with spectacles, which he himself had made.

450. WORKS MENTIONED BY ÆLIAN AND MENAGE.

Ælian notices an artist who wrote a distich in letters of gold, which he enclosed in the rind of a grain of corn. Menage mentions that he saw whole sentences which were not perceptible to the eye without the microscope, and pictures and portraits, which appeared at first to be lines and scratches thrown down at random; one of them formed the face of the dauphiness, with the most pleasing delicacy and correct resemblance. He read an Italian poem in praise of this princess, containing some thousands of verses, written by an officer in the space of a foot and a half.

§ 45. CHIROGRAPHY INDICATIVE OF CHARACTER.

451. THE FIVE POETS.

The handwriting frequently bears an analogy to the character of the writer, as all voluntary actions are characteristic of the individual. But many causes operate to counteract or obstruct a uniform result. "I am intimately acquainted," says D'Israeli, "with the handwritings of five of our great poets. The first in early life acquired, among Scottish advocates, a handwriting which cannot be distinguished from that of his ordinary brothers; the second, educated in public schools, where writing is shamefully neglected, composes his sublime or sportive verses in a schoolboy's ragged scrawl, as if he had never finished his tasks with the writing master; the third writes his highly-wrought poetry in the common hand of a merchant's clerk, from early commercial avocations; the fourth has all that finished neatness which polished his verses; while the fifth is a specimen of a full mind, not in the habit of correction or alteration, so that he appears to be printing down his thoughts, without a solitary erasure. The handwriting of the first and third poets, not indicative of their character, we have accounted for; the others are admirable specimens of characteristic autographs."

452. HANDWRITING OF ENGLISH KINGS.

"Oldys," says D'Israeli, in one of his curious notes, "was struck by the distinctness of character in the handwritings of several of our kings. He observed nothing further than the mere fact, and did not extend his idea to the art of judging of the natural character by the writing. Oldys has described these handwritings with the utmost correctness, as I have often verified. I shall add a few comments.

"Henry VIII. wrote a strong hand, but as if he had seldom a good pen.' The vehemence of his character conveyed itself into his writing. Bold, hasty, and commanding, I have no doubt the asserter of the pope's supremacy, and its triumphant destroyer, split many a good quill.

"Edward VI. wrote a fair, legible hand.' We have this promising young prince's diary, written by his own hand. In all respects he was an assiduous pupil, and he had scarcely learned to write and to reign when we lost him.

"Queen Elizabeth writ an upright hand, like the bastard Italian.' She was indeed a most elegant calligrapher, whom Roger Ascham had taught all the elegances of the pen. The French editor of the little autographical work I have noticed has given the autograph of her name, which she usually wrote in a very large, tall character, and painfully elaborate. He accompanies it with one of the Scottish Mary, who at times wrote elegantly, though usually in uneven lines; when in haste and distress of mind, in several letters during her imprisonment which I have read, much the contrary. The French editor makes this observation: 'Who could believe that these writings are of the same epoch? The first denotes asperity and ostentation; the second indicates simplicity, softness, and nobleness. The one is that of Elizabeth, Queen of England; the other that of her cousin, Mary Stuart. The difference of these two handwritings answers most evidently to that of their characters.'

"James I. writ a poor, ungainly character, all awry, and not in a straight line.' James certainly wrote a slovenly scrawl, strongly indicative of that personal negligence which he carried into all the little things of life; and Buchanan, who had made him an excellent scholar, may receive the disgrace of his pupil's ugly scribble, which sprawls about his careless and inelegant letters.

"Charles I. wrote a fair, open Italian hand, and more correctly, perhaps, than any prince we ever had.' Charles was the first of our monarchs who intended to have domiciliated taste in the kingdom; and it might have been conjectured from this unfortunate prince, who so finely discriminated the manners of the different painters, which are in fact their handwritings, that he would have not been insensible to the elegances of the pen.

"Charles II. wrote a little, fair, running hand, as if wrote in haste, or uneasy till he had done.' Such was the writing to have been expected from this illustrious vagabond, who had much to write, often in odd situations, and could never get rid of his natural restlessness and vivacity.

"James II. writ a large, fair hand.' It is characterized by his phlegmatic temper, as an exact detailer of occurrences, and the matter-of-business genius of the writer.

"Queen Anne wrote a fair, round hand.' That is the writing she had been taught by her master, probably without any alteration of manner naturally suggested by herself—the copying hand of a common character."

§ 46. ILLEGIBLE PENMANSHIP.

453. A LUDICROUS MISTAKE.

A Cincinnati grocer's house, finding out that cranberries commanded six dollars per bushel, and, under the impression that the article could be bought to advantage at St. Mary's, wrote out to a customer, acquainting him with the fact, and requesting him to send "one hundred bushels per Simmons," (the wagoner usually sent.) The correspondent, a plain, uneducated man, had considerable difficulty in deciphering the fashionable scrawl common with merchants' clerks of late years, and the most important word, "cranberries," he failed to make out, but he plainly and clearly read, one hundred bushels persimmons. As the article was growing all around him, all the boys in the neighborhood were set to gathering it, and the wagoner made his appearance in due time in Cincinnati, with eighty bushels, all that the wagon bed would hold, and a line from the country merchant that the remainder would follow the next trip. An explanation soon ensued, but the customer insisted that the Cincinnati house should have written by Simmons, and not per Simmons.

454. THE ELEPHANT.

A gentleman, writing to his country friend in Lincolnshire, (England,) who had done him some recent favor, informed him by letter how much he was obliged, and that he should soon send him an equivalent. Not being accustomed to fashionable scrawls, he read it that his friend would send him an elephant; and, building a barn at the time, actually fitted up a stall for the reception of his expected present. The arrival, however, of a barrel of oysters, by the stage, a few days afterwards, helped him to the right reading, by putting him in possession of a more equitable equivalent than an elephant. From this story, perhaps, the saws about "seeing the elephant" were derived.

455. INDIAN DEVILS.

A clergyman in Massachusetts, more than a century ago, addressed a letter to the General Court on some subject of interest which was then under discussion. The clerk read the letter, in which there seemed to be this very remarkable sentence: "I address you not as magistrates, but as Indian devils." The clerk hesitated, and looked carefully, and said, "Yes, he addresses you as Indian devils." The wrath of the honorable body was aroused; they passed a vote of censure, and wrote to the reverend gentleman for an explanation, from which it appeared that he did not address them as magistrates, but as individuals.

456. SPIDER FOR AN AMANUENSIS.

A literary gentleman once addressed a letter to a friend. The scrawl was so truly beautiful, that the return of post brought him the following reply: "I have received a piece of paper, apparently from you, though I am inclined to think that, by way of saving trouble, you had employed a spider as your amanuensis—dipped his legs into an ink bottle, and then suffered him to crawl over the sheet. You never were a very good writer; but now you seem to have one hand which you cannot read yourself, and another which no other person can decipher."

457. NO GO.

Some time ago, an old lady wrote to her London bookseller for "a copy of a pamphlet entitled No. 90," being the most celebrated tract of a series in which the system of Puseyism was developed. The old lady was remarkable for careless writing, and the consequence in this instance was most ludicrous. The bookseller, after taking a world of trouble, sent back to say that he had sought every where, but was unable to find a pamphlet with "No Go" for its title.

458. STUTTERING LETTER.

A certain old woman took from the post-office in the town of G. a letter. Not knowing how to read, and being anxious to know the contents, supposing it to be from one of her absent sons, she called on a person near to read the letter to her. He accordingly began, and read,—

"CHARLESTON, June 23, 1821.

"DEAR MOTHER:" Then, making a stop to find out what followed, as the writing was rather bad, the old lady exclaimed, "O, 'tis from poor Jerry; he always stutters."

§ 47. WRITING MATERIALS.—WONDERFUL PENS.

459. REEDS AND QUILLS.

In ancient times, when people wrote on tables covered with wax, they were obliged to use a style, or bodkin; but when they began to write with colored liquids, they employed a reed, and afterwards quills or feathers. The most beautiful reeds grew formerly in Egypt, as well as Armenia and Italy. Sir John Chardin speaks of the reeds which grow in the marshes of Persia, which are sold and much sought after in the Levant, particularly for writing. They are transported, he says, throughout the whole East.

Miller, in his Gardener's Dictionary, says, the best writing reeds are procured from the southern provinces of Persia. They are still used by the Turks, Moors, and other Eastern people. These reeds are split, and formed to a point like our quills; but it is not possible to make so clear or fine strokes with them, or to write so long or so conveniently. The oldest certain account, however, known at present respecting writing quills, is a passage in an author (Isidore) who died in the year 636, and who, among the instruments employed for writing, mentions reeds and feathers. Alcuinus, who lived in England in the eighth century, speaks of the pen; so that it must have been used in that country almost as early as the art of writing was known. The horrid barbarity which attends the pulling of quills from geese while alive has led many persons to adopt steel and other pens, which are made in great perfection.

460. WARNER'S PEN.

Dr. Warner, some years ago, happened to be in the shop of an eminent stationer in the Strand, London, when a member of the House of Commons purchased a hundred quills for six shillings. When he was gone, the doctor exclaimed, "O, the luxury of the age! Six shillings for a hundred quills! Why, it never cost me sixpence for quills in my life." "That is very surprising, doctor," observed the stationer, "for your works are very voluminous." "I declare," replied the doctor, "I wrote my Ecclesiastical History, two volumes in folio, and my Dissertation on the Book of Common Prayer, a large folio, both the first and corrected copies, with one single pen. It was an old one when I began, and it is not worn out now that I have finished." This relation was spread about, and the merit of this pen was esteemed so highly, that a celebrated countess begged the doctor to make her a present of it: he did so; and her ladyship had a gold case made, with a short history of the pen written upon it, and placed it in her cabinet of curiosities.

461. BYRON'S PEN.

Byron wrote his celebrated poem of the Bride of Abydos in one night, and without mending his pen. The pen is yet preserved in the British Museum.

462. BOODE'S PEN.

Andrew Boode, M. D., first physician to Henry VIII., and the original Merry Andrew, was a man of considerable abilities for the times in which he lived. He wrote a book of near three hundred pages, 12mo., with a pen without mending it. The book was printed in London, in 1541, and entitled the Principles of Astronomical Prognostication. He died in 1549.

463. ELIOT'S PEN.

Among many other important literary services rendered by the excellent John Eliot to the church, not the least was his translation of the entire Bible into the Indian language, the whole of which, it is said, was written out with one pen!

464. HISTORY OF A QUILL.

In the year 1610, an English version of Camden's Britannia appeared, which was the work of the industrious Philemon Holland, a physician and schoolmaster, who boasted of having written a large folio volume with one pen, on which he composed the following lines:—

"With one sole pen I wrote this book,
Made of a gray goose quill;
A pen it was when I it took,
And a pen I leave it still."

§ 48. MISCELLANEOUS.

465. SON OF HENRY IV.

Henry IV., on receiving a letter from Prince Henry, immediately opened it,—a custom not usual with him,—and compared the writing with the signature, to decide whether it were of one hand. Sir George Carew, observing the French king's hesitation, called Mr. Douglass to testify to the fact; on which Henry the Great, admiring an art in which he had little skill, and looking on the neat elegance of the writing before him, politely observed, "I see that in writing fair, as in other things, the elder must yield to the younger."

466. "WRITE LIKE AN ANGEL."

There is a strange phrase connected with the art of the calligrapher, which I think may be found in most, if not in all modern languages—to write like an angel. Ladies have been frequently compared to angels; they are beautiful as angels, and sing and dance like angels; but however intelligible these are, we do not so easily connect penmanship with the other celestial accomplishments. This fanciful phrase, however, has a very human origin. Among those learned Greeks who emigrated to Italy, and afterwards into France, in the reign of Francis I., was one Angelo Vergecio, whose beautiful calligraphy excited the admiration of the learned. The French monarch had a Greek font cast, modelled by his writing. The learned Henry Stephens, who, like Porson for correctness and delicacy, was one of the most elegant writers of Greek, had learnt the practice from Angelo. His name became synonymous for beautiful writing, and gave birth to the vulgar proverb or familiar phrase, to write like an angel.

467. THE INVISIBLE DESPATCH.

The plan of writing with rice water, to be rendered visible by the application of iodine, was practised with great success in the correspondence during the late war in India. The first letter of this kind was received from Jellalabad, concealed in a quill. On opening it, a small paper was unfolded, on which appeared only a single word—"iodine." The magic liquid was applied, and an important despatch from Sir Robert Sale stood forth.

468. EXTRAORDINARY WAGER.

The London Morning Post says a wager came off, the terms of which were as follows:—

"I will bet any man one hundred pounds that he cannot make a million strokes with pen and ink within a month." They were not to be mere dots or scratches, but fair down strokes, such as form the child's first lesson in writing. A gentleman accepted the challenge. The month allowed was the lunar month, of only twenty-eight days; so that, for the completion of the undertaking, an average of thirty-six thousand strokes per diem was required. This, at sixty per minute, or three thousand six hundred per hour,—and neither the human intellect nor the human hand can be expected to do more,—would call for ten hours' labor in every four and twenty. With a proper feeling of the respect due to the observance of the Sabbath, he determined to abstain from his work on the Sundays; and by this determination, he diminished by four days the period allowed him; at the same time, by so doing, he increased the daily average of his strokes to upwards of forty-one thousand. On the first day he executed about fifty thousand strokes; on the second, nearly as many. But at length, after many days, the hand became stiff and weary, the wrist swollen, and it required the almost constant attendance of some assiduous relation or friend to besprinkle it, without interrupting its progress over the paper, with a lotion calculated to relieve and invigorate it. On the twenty-third day, the million strokes, exceeded by some few thousands, "to make assurance doubly sure," are accomplished; and the piles of paper that exhibit them testify that to the courageous heart, the willing hand, and the energetic mind, nothing is impossible. These interesting papers are not placed in the archives of the Royal Society, of which their author is a fellow, but were claimed and received by the person who paid the wager.

469. "THE LITERARY CLUB."

At his hours of leisure Mr. Reynolds considered it necessary to his mental improvement, as well as to his professional interests, to mix in learned and convivial society; and about this time, in order not only to enjoy it with freedom, but also more particularly with the kind intention of gratifying his venerable friend, he became the proposer, and, with the assistance of Johnson, was the founder, of that club, so long in existence, and for many years denominated the "Literary Club." The original design, as first declared at its institution, in February, 1764, was to confine the club to twelve members, consisting of Sir Joshua, then only Mr. Reynolds, Drs. Johnson, Goldsmith, Nugent, and Percy, afterwards Bishop of Dromore, Sir Robert Chambers, and Sir John Hawkins, with Messrs. Burke, Langton, Chamier, Dyer, and the Honorable Topham Beauclerk.

These were thus so judiciously selected, as Mr. Malone observes, and were men of such talents, and so well known to each other, that any two of them, if they should not happen to be joined by any more, might be good company for each other. Such was the beginning of a society, which so many years existed, boasting of having had enrolled on its list of members many of the most celebrated characters of the last century.

The place of meeting, says Sir John Hawkins, was the Turk's Head, in Gerard Street; the day, Monday in every week; and the hour of assembling, seven in the evening. "Our evening toast," continues he, "was, Eto perpetua. A lady distinguished by her beauty and taste for literature, Mrs. Montague, invited us two successive years to a dinner at her house. Curiosity was her motive, and possibly a desire of intermingling with our conversation the charms of her own. She affected to consider us as a set of literary men, and perhaps gave the first occasion for distinguishing the society by the name of the Literary Club—a distinction which it never assumed to itself."

470. THE WITTENAGEMOT OF THE CHAPTER.

"From 1797 to 1805, I was accustomed," says Mr. Stephens, in the Stephensiana, "to use the Chapter Coffee-house, where I always met with intelligent company, and enjoyed an interesting conversation. The box in the north-east corner used to be called the Wittenagemot. Early in the morning it was occupied by neighbors, who were designated the Wet Paper Club, as it was their practice to open the papers as brought in by the newsmen, and read them before they were dried by the waiter. A dry paper they viewed as a stale commodity.

"In the afternoon the other party enjoyed the wet evening papers, and it was these whom I met.

"Dr. Buchan, author of the Domestic Medicine, generally held a seat in this box; and though he was a tory, he heard the freest discussions with good humor, and commonly acted as a moderator. His fine physiognomy and his white hairs qualified him for this office. But the fixture in the box was a Mr. Hammond, a Coventry manufacturer, who, evening after evening, for nearly forty-five years, was always to be found in his place, and during the entire period was much distinguished for his severe and often able strictures on the events of the day. He had thus debated through the days of Wilkes, of the American war, and of the French wars, and, being on the side of liberty, was constantly in opposition. His mode of arguing was Socratic, and he generally applied to his adversary the reductio ad absurdum, often creating bursts of laughter.

"The register, or chronicle of the box, was a Mr. Murray, an Episcopal Scotch clergyman, who generally sat in one place from nine in the morning till nine at night, and was famous for having read, at least once through, every morning and evening paper published in London during the last thirty years. His memory being good, he was appealed to whenever any point of fact within the memory of man happened to be disputed. It was often remarked, however, that such incessant daily reading did not tend to clear his views.

"Among those from whom I constantly profited was Dr. Berdmore, master of the Charter House; Walker, the rhetorician; and Dr. Towers, the political and historical writer. Dr. B. abounded in anecdote; Walker, to the finest enunciation, united the most intelligent head I ever met with; and Towers, over his half pint of Lisbon, was sarcastic and lively, though never deep.

"Among our constant visitors was the celebrated Dr. George Fordyce, who, having much fashionable practice, brought news which had not generally transpired. He had not the appearance of a man of genius, nor did he debate; but he possessed sound information on all subjects.

"Dr. Gower, the urbane and able physician of the Middlesex, was another pretty constant visitor, and added much to our stock of information. It was gratifying to hear such men as Fordyce, Gower, and Buchan, in familiar chat. On subjects of medicine they seldom agreed, and when such were started, they generally laughed at one another's opinions.

"There was a growling man of the name of Dobson, who, when his asthma permitted, vented his spleen upon both sides; and a lover of absurd paradoxes, of the name of Heron, author of some works of merit, but so devoid of principle, that, deserted by all, he would have died from want, if Dr. Garthshore had not placed him as a patient in the empty Fever Institution.

"Robinson, the king of the booksellers, was frequently of the party, as well as his brother John, a man of some talent; and Joseph Johnson, the friend of Priestley, and Paine, and Cowper, and Fuzeli. Phillips, then commencing his Magazine, was also on a keen lookout for recruits, with his waistcoat pocket full of guineas, to slip his enlisting money into their hands.*

* The proprietor of the Monthly Magazine states, in a note to this article, that at the period of its commencement,

"Alexander Chalmers, the workman of the Robinsons, and through their introduction editor of many large books, also enlivened the box by many sallies of wit and humor, and anecdotes, of which he had a plentiful store at command. He always took much pains to be distinguished from his namesake George, who, he used to say, carried 'the leaden mace,' and was much provoked whenever he happened to be taken for his namesake.

"Cahusac, a teacher of the classics, M'Leod, a writer in the papers, the two Parrys, (of the Courier, then the organ of Jacobinism,) and Captain Skinner, a man of elegant manners, who personated our nation in the procession of Anacharsis Clootz, at Paris, in 1793, were also in constant attendance.

"One Baker, once a Spitalfields manufacturer, a great talker, and not less remarkable as an eater, was constant; but having shot himself at his lodgings in Kirby Street, it was discovered that for some years he had had no other meal per day besides the supper which he took at the Chapter, where there being a choice of viands at the fixed price of one shilling, this, with a pint of porter, constituted his subsistence, till, his last resources failing, he put an end to himself.

"Lowndes, the celebrated electrician, was another of our set, and a facetious man. Buchan, Jun., a graduated son of the doctor, generally came with Lowndes, and though somewhat dogmatical, yet he added to the variety and good intelligence of our discussions, which, from the mixture of company, were as various as the contents of the newspapers.

"Dr. Busby, the musician, and a very ingenious man, often obtained a hearing, and was earnest in disputing with the Tories. And Macfarlane, the author of the History of George the Third, was always admired for the soundness of his views; but this worthy man was killed by the pole of a coach, during a procession of Sir F. Burdett, from Brentford. Mr. W. Cooke, author of Conversation, constantly exemplified his own rules in his gentlemanly manners and well-timed anecdotes.

"Kelley, an Irish schoolmaster and gentlemanly man, kept up warm debates by his equivocating politics, and was often roughly handled by Hammond and others, though he bore his defeats with constant good humor.

"There was a young man of the name of Wilson, who acquired the name of Long-bow Wilson from the number of extraordinary secrets of the haut ton, which he used to retail by the hour. He was a good-tempered, and certainly very amusing person, who seemed likely to be an acquisition among the Wittenagemot; but, having run up a score of thirty or forty pounds, he suddenly absented himself. Miss Brun, the keeper of the house, begged of me, if I met with him, to tell him that she would give him a receipt for the past, and further credit to any amount, if he would only return to the house; 'for,' said she, 'if he never paid us, he was one of the best customers we ever had, contriving, by his stories and conversation, to keep a couple of boxes crowded the whole night, by which we made more punch, and more brandy and water, than from any other single cause whatever.'

"Jacob, afterwards an alderman and M. P., was a frequent visitor, and then as remarkable for his heretical, as he was subsequently for his orthodox, opinions in his speeches and writings.

"Waithman, the active and eloquent common councilman, often mixed with us, and was always clear-headed and agreeable. One James, who had made a large fortune by vending tea, contributed many good anecdotes of the age of Wilkes.

"Several stock brokers visited us, and among others of that description was Mr. Blake, the banker, of Lombard Street, a remarkably intelligent old gentleman; and there was Mr. Patterson, a North Briton, a long-headed speculator, who had the reputation of being a skilful mathematician, and taught mathematics to Pitt.

"Some young men of talent came among us from time to time, as Lovett, a militia officer, Hennell, a coal merchant, and some others, whose names I forget; and these seemed likely to keep up the party. But all things have an end. Dr. Buchan died; some young sparks affronted our Nestor, Hammond, on which he absented himself, after nearly fifty years' attendance, and the noisy box of the Wittenagemot was, for some years previously to 1820, remarkable for its silence and dullness. The two or three last times I was at the Chapter, I heard no voice above a whisper, and I almost shed a tear on thinking of men, habits, and times gone by forever."

471. THE KIT CAT CLUB AND KIT CAT PICTURES.

The Kit Cat Club, which consisted of the most distinguished wits and statesmen among the whigs, was remarkable for the strictest zeal towards the house of Hanover. They met at a house in Shire Lane, and took their title from the name of Christopher Cat, a pastry-cook, who excelled in making mutton pies, which were regularly part of the entertainment.

"Immortal made, as Kit Cat by his pies."

Before Tonson went abroad, he had acquired a villa at Barn Elms, in Surrey, about six miles from London, which he adorned with the portraits of the Kit Cat Club, painted by Kneller, on canvas somewhat larger than a three quarters, and less than a half length; a size which has ever since been denominated a Kit Cat from this circumstance. The room where these portraits were originally intended to be hung (in which the club often dined) not being sufficiently lofty for half-length pictures, that circumstance is said to have been the occasion of a shorter canvas being used, which is now denominated a Kit Cat, and is sufficiently long to admit a hand. The canvas for a Kit Cat is thirty-six inches long, and twenty-eight wide. A splendid volume, under the title of the Kit Cat Club, done from the original paintings of Sir Godfrey Kneller by Mr. Faber, sold by J. Tonson, in the Strand, and T. Faber, at the Golden Head, in Bloomsbury Square, was published in 1735, containing an engraved title-in the winter of 1795-6, he lodged and boarded at the Chapter, and not only knew the characters referred to by Mr S., but many others equally original, from the voracious glutton in politics, who waited for the wet papers in the morning twilight, to the comfortless bachelor, who sat till the fire was raked out at half past twelve at night, all of whom took their successive stations, like figures in a magic lantern. In regard to the enlivening money to which Mr S. alludes, it may be proper to state, that so many trumphy periodical works, then, as now, were constantly obtruded on the public, that it was difficult to impress on men of talents the possibility of establishing a work of permanent character, like the Monthly Magazine; and to secure reluctant aid, the editor sometimes, in a parting shake by the hand, therefore left five guineas in the palm of his desired assistant. So tangible an argument in every case allayed scruples, and tended, among other circumstances, to raise his Miscellany to that pinnacle of celebrity which it has ever since maintained.

page and dedication, and forty-three portraits, beginning with Sir Godfrey Kneller, and ending with Mr. Tonson, who is represented in a gown and cap, holding in his hand a volume lettered "Paradise Lost." Faber began the plates, which are all dated in 1732, and the volume is dedicated to the Duke of Somerset, "to whose liberality the collection of prints owed its very being, in setting the example to the other members of the Kit Cat Club of honoring Mr. Tonson with these portraits," and who was "ever eminently distinguished by that noble principle,—for the support of which that association was known to have been formed,—the love of their country and its constitutional liberties." It appears from the will of the younger Jacob Tonson, which was made August 16, and proved December 6, 1735, that he was then, by the grant and assignment of his uncle, entitled to this collection of pictures after his uncle's death, and that the testator had not long before erected a new room at Barn Elms, in which the Kit Cat portraits were then hung.

At Water Oakley, in the parish of Bray, near Windsor, Richard Tonson, great nephew of Jacob, built a room, lighted at the top by a dome, and an ante-chamber for the reception of the celebrated Kit Cat portraits, which had descended to him on the death of his brother Jacob. They were ranged on each side of the room, in two rows, and in a pleasing order.

The portraits afterwards became the property of William Baker, Esq., of Hertingfordbury, late M. P. for Herts, whose father married the eldest daughter of the second Jacob Tonson.

473. ITEMS RESPECTING THE KIT CAT CLUB.

Jacob Tonson, the bookseller, was secretary to the club. "You have heard of the Kit Cat Club," says Pope to Spencer. Sir Richard Steele, Addison, Congreve, Garth, Vanburgh, Manwaring, Stepney, and Walpole belonged to it.

Tonson, whilst secretary, caused the club meetings to be transferred to a house belonging to himself at Barn Elms, and built a handsome room for the accommodation of the members. Garth wrote the verses for the toasting-glass of this club, which, as they are preserved in his works, have immortalized four of the reigning beauties at the commencement of the last century—Lady Carlisle, Lady Essex, Lady Hyde, and Lady Wharton.

In 1817, the club-room was standing, and was the property of Mr. Hoare, the London banker. Sir Richard Phillips visited it at this date, when it was sadly in decay. It was eighteen feet high, and forty feet long by twenty wide. The mouldings and ornaments were in the most superb fashion of the last century; but the whole was falling to pieces from the effects of dry rot. There was the faded cloth-hanging of the walls, whose red color once set off the famous portraits of the club that hung around it. Their marks and sizes were still visible, and the numbers and names remained as written in chalk for the guidance of the stranger. "Thus," says Sir Richard, "was I, as it were, by those still legible names, brought into personal contact with Addison, and Steele, and Congreve, and Garth, and Dryden, and with many hereditary nobles, remembered only because they were patrons of those natural nobles. I read their names aloud; I invoked their departed spirits; I was appalled by the echo of my own voice. The holes in the floor, the forests of cobwebs in the windows, and a swallow's nest in the corner of the ceiling, proclaimed that I was viewing a vision of the dreamers of a past age—that I saw realized before me the speaking vanities of the anxious career of man. The blood of the reader of sensibility will thrill as mine thrilled. It was feeling without volition, and therefore incapable of analysis."

Not long after, this club-room was united to a barn, to form a riding-house. The Kit Cat pictures were painted early in the eighteenth century, and about the year 1710 were brought to this spot; but the club-room was not built till ten or fifteen years afterwards. The paintings were forty-two in number, and were presented by the members to the elder Tonson, who died in 1736. He left them to his great-nephew, also an eminent bookseller, who died in 1767. They were then removed from the building at Barn Elms to the house of his brother, at Water Oakley, near Windsor; and on his death, to the house of Mr. Baker, of Hertingfordbury, where they were splendidly lodged, and in fine preservation. We are not aware if the collection has been dispersed.

473. THE BLUE STOCKING CLUB.

Towards the close of the last century, there met at Mrs. Montague's a literary assembly called the Blue Stocking Club, in consequence of one of the most admired of the members, Mr. Benjamin Stillingfleet, always wearing blue stockings. The appellation soon became general as a name for pedantic or ridiculous literary ladies. Hannah More wrote a volume in verse entitled the Bas Bleu, or Conversation. It proceeds on the mistake of a foreigner, who, hearing of the Blue Stocking Club, translated it literally Bas Bleu. Johnson styled this poem "a great performance." The following couplets have been quoted and remembered as terse and pointed:—

"In men this blunder still you find,— All think their little set mankind."

"Small habits, well pursued betimes,
May reach the dignity of crimes."

474. THE BEEFSTEAK CLUB.

George Lambert was for many years principal scene painter to Covent Garden Theatre, and, being a person of great respectability in character and profession, he was often visited, whilst at work, by persons of consideration. As it frequently happened that he was too much pressed by business to leave the theatre for dinner, he contented himself with a beefsteak broiled upon the fire in the painting room. In this humble meal he was sometimes joined by his visitors. The conviviality of the accidental meeting inspired the party with a resolution to establish a club, which was accordingly done, under the title of the Beefsteak Club, and the party assembled periodically in the painting room. The members were afterwards accommodated with a private apartment in the theatre, where the meeting was held for many years; but after Covent Garden was last rebuilt, the place of meeting was changed to the Shakespeare Tavern. It was then removed to the Lyceum Theatre, in the Strand, on the destruction of which, by fire, in 1830, the place of meeting was transferred to the Bedford Coffee-house, in Covent Garden. The régime of the club is a course of beefsteaks, followed by stewed cheese in silver dishes. The number of members is only twenty-four, and the days of meeting are every Saturday, from November until the end of June.

475. LITERARY DICTATORSHIP.

So pusillanimous, in the day of Johnson's Club, were educated persons in general, that they submitted to the domination of a self-chosen few, who, in their turn, had a despot over themselves; for, while the club intimidated the town, Johnson awed the club. In one instance, when Sheridan was beginning to be known in the world, though before his first dramatic productions, he dined in company with Johnson and several of the club, when the doctor advanced one of his dogmas, tantamount to saying that black is white. Sheridan gave a plump negative to the doctor's affirmation, and argued against it manfully, with all the eagerness of youth. The party trembled for him, and, shrugging up their shoulders, seemed to say, "Poor young man! clever, but ruined. He is rousing the lion, and it will soon be all over with him." The lion, however, was in one of his generous moods; though galled, he was not revengeful. He took his defeat — for defeated he was — in good part, and Sheridan escaped annihilation. "What times," says George Colman, fairly enough, "when a young genius could be reputation-crushed — and that genius Sheridan — by entering into discussion with a literary dictator!" However, these things are pretty much at an end now. The world of letters is on a republican footing, and the man who presumes to set himself up as a dictator would be only laughed at. Johnson's powers would be acknowledged at all times, but his authority no longer.

476. HOOK AT THE ATHENÆUM CLUB.

It is said that at the Athenæum Club, in Pall Mall, the number of dinners fell off, by upwards of three hundred per annum, after Theodore Hook disappeared from his favorite corner, near the door of the coffee-room. The corner alluded to will, we suppose, long retain the name which it derived from him — Temperance Corner. Many grave and dignified persons being frequent guests, it would hardly have been seemly to have been calling for repeated supplies of a certain description; but the waiters well understood what the oracle of the corner meant by "Another glass of toast and water," or "A little more lemonade."

§ 50. COMMENTARIES AND COMMENTATORS.

477. CARYLL.

Caryll wrote the endless Commentary on Job, consisting of twenty-four hundred folio pages, in small type. Of that monument of human perseverance, which, commenting on Job's patience, inspired what few works do to whoever read them, the exercise of the virtue it inculcated, the publisher, in his advertisement in Clavel's Catalogue of Books, (1681,) announces the two folios in six hundred sheets each. These were a republication of the first edition, in twelve volumes quarto. He apologizes that "it had been so long a doing, to the great vexation and loss of the proposer." He adds, "Indeed, some few lines, no more than what may be contained in a quarto page, are expunged, they not relating to the exposition, which nevertheless some, by malicious prejudice, have so unjustly aggravated, as if the whole work had been disordered." He apologizes for curtailing a few lines from twenty-four hundred folio pages, and he considered that these few lines were the only ones that did not relate to the exposition!

478. THOMAS SCOTT.

After Thomas Scott received ordination and entered on his duties as a curate, he applied himself, with the most unwearied assiduity, to the study of the learned languages, and such other subjects as were connected with the duties of his profession. He spared, he tells us, no pains, shunned as much as he well could all acquaintances and diversions, and even retrenched from his usual hours of sleep, that he might increase his intellectual acquisitions. In nine months, he read through the entire works of Josephus in the original Greek. With the Septuagint and Hebrew Bible he became familiar. His progress in the latter was remarkable. "Of the Hebrew," he says, "some twenty weeks ago I knew not a letter; and I have now read through one hundred and nineteen of the Psalms, and twenty-three chapters of Genesis, and commonly now read two chapters every day, tracing every word to its original, unfolding every verbal difficulty."

At the age of sixty, he applied himself to the Arabic and Susoo — the latter an African dialect, and both exceedingly difficult languages to master. During the acquisition of these languages, and for many years afterwards, he suffered severely from chronic complaints. At the age of seventy-two years, he informs us that he never studied more hours each day in his life. "Never," says he, "was a man employed more full of employment than our house; five sheets of Commentary a week to correct, and as many more sheets of copy (quarto) to prepare."

He was employed upon his Commentary for thirty-three years. The marginal references alone cost him seven years of severe labor. For nearly forty years he was employed eight, ten, and sometimes fourteen hours a day in his study.

"The sale of his works," a writer remarks, "of plain didactic theology, during his lifetime, amounted to two hundred thousand pounds sterling. Probably an equal sum has been expended for these same works since his death. Of his Commentary on the Scriptures, not less than thirty-five thousand copies have been sold in the United States alone, at a sum of at least seven hundred thousand dollars. Two [or three] stereotype editions of it have been published. The work is now, at the distance of more than thirty years from its publication, as popular as ever. The annual sale is now, in this country, not less than fifteen hundred copies."

479. A VILLAGE READER.

It is well known that Thomas Scott, the celebrated commentator on the Bible, published an edition of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, with expository notes. A copy of this work he benevolently presented to one of his poor parishioners. Meeting him soon after, Mr. S. inquired whether he had read it. The reply was, "Yes, sir." "Do you think you understand it?" "O yes, sir," was the answer, with this somewhat unexpected addition, "and I hope before long I shall understand the notes."

480. IRISH LABORER'S COMMENTARY.

The Boston Christian Alliance tells us, in 1848, —

An Irish day laborer, in this city, by the name of Peter Clarkin, has just published a work expository of the book of the Revelation — a book which has tasked the critical ingenuity of the most learned men. The Mercantile Journal says, "It is divided into twenty-two chapters, in which all the prophecies in the Revelation of the evangelist are explained, and its mysticisms elucidated, according to the views of the author, after a careful and unaided investigation for several years. This is a remarkable production, when considered as the work of an uneducated Irish laborer, who was early instructed in the principles of the Roman Catholic religion. The writer shows, in the course of the volume, that he has diligently studied the Scriptures, and must also have dipped occasionally into historical and ecclesiastical lore. But if the book should not stand high among religious persons as a true interpreter of the Apocalypse, it may, at least, be ranked among not the least interesting of the curiosities of literature."

481. COMMENTATORS ON CAMOENS.

Of the pedantic triflings of commentators, a controversy among the Portuguese, on the works of Camoens, is not the least. Some of these profound critics, who affected great delicacy in the laws of epic poetry, pretended to be doubtful whether the poet had fixed on the right time for a king's dream; whether, said they, a king should have a propitious dream on his first going to bed or at the dawn of the following morning. No one seemed to be quite certain; they puzzled each other till the controversy closed in this felicitous manner, and satisfied both the night and the dawn critics. Barreto discovered that an accent on one of the words alluded to in the controversy would answer the purpose, and, by making King Manuel's dream to take place at the dawn, would restore Camoens to their good opinion, and preserve the dignity of the poet.

§ 51. CONTROVERSY AND CONTROVERSIALISTS.

482. GREAT QUESTION.

Henry, in his History of England, states that the following parts of learning were cultivated, in some degree, in Britain, during the period from 1066 to 1216: grammar, rhetoric, logic, metaphysics, physics, ethics, scholastic divinity, the canon law, arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, astrology, and medicine. He also gives the following, to show the trifling questions that were agitated by the logicians of that period: —

"When a hog is carried to market, with a rope tied about its neck, which is held at the other end by a man, whether the hog is carried to market by the rope or the man."

483. THE SCHOLASTICS.

On the subject of literary controversies we cannot pass over the various sects of the scholastics. The most memorable, on account of the extent, the violence, and duration of their contests, are those of the Nominalists and the Realists.

It was a most subtle question assuredly, and the world thought, for a long while, that their happiness depended on deciding whether universals, that is, genera, have a real essence, and exist independent of particulars, that is, species; whether, for instance, we could form an idea of asses prior to individual asses. Rossetine, in the eleventh century, adopted the opinion that universals have no real existences, either before or in individuals, but are mere names and words by which the kind of individuals is expressed — a tenet propagated by Abelard, which produced the sect of the Nominalists. But the Realists asserted that universals existed independently of individuals.

Nothing could exceed the violence with which these disputes were conducted. Vives himself, who witnessed the contests, says that "when the contending parties had exhausted their stock of verbal abuse, they often came to blows; and it was not uncommon, in these quarrels about universals, to see the combatants engaging not only with their fists, but with clubs and swords, so that many have been wounded, and some killed."

We add a curious extract from John of Salisbury on this war of words, which Mosheim has given in his Ecclesiastical History. He observes, on all this terrifying nonsense, that "there had been more time consumed in it than the Cæsars had employed in making themselves masters of the world; that the riches of Cæsus were inferior to the treasures that had been exhausted in this controversy; and that the contending parties, after having spent their whole lives on this single point, had neither been so happy as to determine it to their satisfaction, nor to make, in the labyrinths of science where they had been groping, any discovery that was worth the pains they had taken."

484. BENEDICTIS AND GRIMALDI.

Father De Benedictis, a Jesuit and professor in the collegio at Naples, published in 1668 four volumes of peripatetic philosophy, to establish the principles of Aristotle. The work was exploded, and he wrote an abusive treatise under the nom de guerre of Benedetto Aletino. A man of letters, Constantino Grimaldi, replied. Aletino rejoined: he wrote letters, an apology for the letters, and would have written more for Aristotle than Aristotle himself perhaps would have done. However, Grimaldi was no ordinary antagonist, and not to be outwared. He had not only the best of the argument, but he was resolved to tell the world so, as long as the world would listen. Whether he killed off Father Benedictis is not affirmed; but the latter died during the controversy. Grimaldi, however, afterwards pursued his ghost, and buffeted the father in his grave. This enraged the university of Naples; and the Jesuits, to a man, denounced Grimaldi to Pope Benedict XIII. and Cardinal D'Althan, the Viceroy of Naples. On this the pope issued a bull prohibiting the reading of Grimaldi's works, or keeping them, under pain of excommunication; and the cardinal, more active than the bull, caused all the copies which were found in the author's house to be thrown into the sea. The author, with tears in his eyes, beheld them expatriated, and hardly hoped their voyage would have been successful. However, all the little family of the Grimaldis were not drowned; for a storm arose, and happily drove ashore many of the floating copies; and these falling into good and charitable hands, the heretical opinions of poor Grimaldi against Aristotle and school divinity were still read by those who were not out-terrified by the pope's bulls. The salted passages were still at hand, and quoted with a double zest against the Jesuits.

485. DESMAHIS.

Desmahis hated quarrels between men of letters. Some person observed to him that the number of men of letters was very small, in comparison with the bulk of mankind.

"If harmony," said he, "prevailed among them, — small as their number is, — they would lead the public opinion, and be the masters of the world."

486. TWO SCHOLARS.

"Literary wars," says Bayle, "are sometimes as lasting as they are terrible." A disputation between two great scholars was so interminably violent, that it lasted thirty years! He humorously compares it to the German war which lasted as long.

487. ADDISON AND STANYAN.

Mr. Temple Stanyan borrowed a sum of money of Addison, with whom he lived in habits of friendship, conversing on all subjects with equal freedom; but from this time Mr. Stanyan agreed implicitly to every thing Addison advanced, and never, as formerly, disputed his positions. This change of behavior did not long escape the notice of so acute an observer, to whom it was by no means agreeable. It happened, one day, that a subject was started on which they had before warmly controverted each other's notions; but now Mr. Stanyan entirely acquiesced in Addison's opinion, without offering one word in defence of his own. Addison was displeased, and said, with considerable emotion, "Sir, either contradict me, or pay me my money."

488. CONTROVERSY ON THE EPISTLES TO PHALARIS.

On the death of Mr. Justel, Dr. Richard Bentley was nominated keeper of the Royal Library at St. James's; and he had his patent in April, 1694. About this time, the famous dispute between him and the Hon. Mr. Boyle, whether the Epistles of Phalaris were genuine or not, in some measure at first took rise; which occasioned so many books and pamphlets, and made so much noise in the world.

Among other publications, Mr. Boyle put out a new edition of Phalaris; but, wanting to consult a manuscript Phalaris in the King's Library, he sent to Mr. Bennet, bookseller in London, to get him the manuscript by applying for it to Dr. Bentley in his name. After earnest solicitation, and great delays for many months, Mr. Bennet at last got possession of the manuscript, who, imagining there was no great hurry to return it, did not immediately set the collator, Mr. Gibson, to work upon it. But Dr. Bentley being to go on a journey in Worcestershire at that time for six months, about six days after the manuscript had been delivered, he called for it again, and would by no means be prevailed upon to let Mr. Bennet have the use of it any longer, though he told him the collation was not perfected, and denied his request in a very rude manner, throwing out many slighting and disparaging expressions, both respecting Mr. Boyle and the work.

This is the case as told by Mr. Bennet, Dr. King, Mr. Boyle, &c., who, thinking himself ill used, towards the end of his preface, where he is giving some account of the edition of Phalaris, and the manuscript consulted in it, added the following words: "I likewise gave orders," says he, "to have the Epistles collated with the manuscript in the King's Library; but my collator was prevented from going beyond the fortieth epistle, by the singular humanity of the library keeper, who refused to let me have any further use of the manuscript." The Epistles being published, Dr. Bentley sent a letter to Mr. Boyle at Oxford, to give him a true information of the whole matter; wherein, as Mr. Boyle acknowledges, having expressed himself with great civility, he represented the matter of fact quite otherwise than he had heard it; expecting that, upon the receipt of the letter, he would put a stop to the publication of the book, till he had altered that passage, and printed the page anew. To which letter, Mr. Boyle says, he immediately returned a civil answer.

Here the matter rested for two years and a half after the edition of Phalaris; when Dr. Bentley, in an appendix to Mr. Wotton's Reflections on Ancient and Modern Learning, inserted his Dissertation on the Epistles of Themistocles, Socrates, Euripides, Phalaris, and the Epistles of Æsop; asserting that the Epistles which had been ascribed to Phalaris for so many years past were spurious, and the production of some sophist; and, partly in anger for the attack in Mr. Boyle's preface to them, fulls with some warmth on Mr. Boyle's new edition and version, saying, he had foolishly busied himself about a contemptible and spurious author, and had made a bad book worse by a very ill edition of it, &c., &c., and, in part of the book, justifies himself as to the affair of the manuscript in these words: "A bookseller came to me, in the name of the editors, to beg the use of the manuscript; it was not then in my custody; but, as soon as I had the power of it, I went voluntarily and offered it him; bidding him tell the collator not to lose any time, for I was shortly to go out of town for two months. It was delivered, used, and returned. Not a word was said by the bearer, nor the least suspicion in me that they had not finished the collation."

The doctor is not now imagined to have had the worst of the argument, or to have handled it without some merit and applause as to wit and humor, though Mr. Boyle only received congratulations on this occasion. Thus Dr. Garth says, —

"So diamonds take a lustre from their foil,
And to a BENTLEY 'tis we owe a BOYLE."

Another very learned and very judicious writer, Dr. Henry Felton, said a very just and a very handsome thing upon this dispute: "Perhaps Mr. Boyle's book will be charged upon some sophist too; yet, taking it for genuine at present, if we must own that Dr. Bentley is the better critic, we must acknowledge his antagonist is much the genteeler writer."

The doctor had also some wags who were his enemies even at Cambridge, by drawing his picture in the hands of Phalaris's guards, who were putting him into their master's bull; and out of the doctor's mouth came a label with these words, "I had rather be ROASTED than BOYLED."

The inimitable Dean of St. Patrick's also, in his Tale of a Tub, has some strokes on Dr. Bentley on this occasion, particularly in the episode on the Battle of the Books, where, on account of the doctor's dissertation on Phalaris, &c., being annexed to Mr. Wotton's Reflections on Learning, and their being great friends, he makes Mr. Wotton and Dr. Bentley, standing side by side in each other's defence, to be both transfixed to the ground by one stroke of the javelin of Mr. Boyle; and this he heightens by the simile of a cook spitting a brace of woodcocks.

489. GILLIES AND PORSON.

Dr. Gillies, the historian of Greece, and Mr. Porson, used now and then to meet. The consequence was certain to be a literary contest. Porson was much the deeper scholar of the two. Dr. Gillies was one day speaking to him of the Greek tragedies, and of Pindar's odes. "We know nothing," said Dr. Gillies, emphatically, "of the Greek metres." Porson answered, "If, doctor, you will put your observation in the singular number, I believe it will be very accurate."

490. HALL AND THE VAIN YOUNG AUTHOR.

A young man of more vanity than prudence once told Robert Hall that he intended to refute a certain book which was much admired by the latter. "You attack that author!" exclaimed the indignant Hall, "a fly take wings against an archangel!"

491. BROUGHAM AND BARNES.

A newspaper tradition says, that Barnes, a former editor of the London Times, went one day to Lord Brougham, then chancellor, and, waiting for him in his private room at the court, took up the Morning Chronicle, in which there was that morning a denunciation of an article Brougham had the day before written in the Times. Barnes suspected the authorship from the style; and when the legal dignity left the judgment seat to speak with the editor, the latter saluted the chancellor with, "Well, this is almost too bad to demolish yourself in this way!" Brougham was taken aback. Barnes saw at once that the random guess was a hit, pursued his advantage, followed up the attack, and Brougham admitted that he was the writer of the reply to his own onslaught.

492. REV. DR. BEECHER.

The Rev. Dr. Lyman Beecher, some years since, was going home one night with a volume of an encyclopædia under his arm, when he saw a small animal standing in his path. The doctor knew that it was a skunk, but very imprudently hurled the book at him. The skunk, as might have been expected, opened his battery with a return of fire so well directed that the divine was glad to retreat. When he arrived at home, his friends could scarcely come near him, and his clothes were so infected that he was obliged to bury them.

Some time after this, some one published a pamphlet, speaking very abusively of the worthy doctor, who was asked, "Why don't you publish a book, and put him down at once?" His reply was prompt and wise: "Sir, I have learnt better. Some years ago, I issued a whole quarto volume against a skunk, and I got the worst of it. I never mean to try the experiment again."

CONVERSATION.

§ 52. DEFICIENCIES.

493. TASSO, MILTON, BENTLEY, AND OTHERS.

Tasso's conversation, which his friend Manso has attempted to preserve to us, was neither gay nor brilliant; and Goldoni, in his drama of Torquato Tasso, has contrasted the poet's writings and his conversation:—

"Amirò il suo talento, gradisco i carmi suoi; Ma piacer non trovo a conversar con lui."

The sublime Dante was taciturn or satirical. Butler was sullen or biting. Gray and Alfieri seldom talked or smiled.

Hogarth and Swift, who looked on the circles of society with eyes of inspiration, were absent in company.

Milton was unsociable, and even irritable when much pressed by the talk of others.

Dean Kirwan, though copious and eloquent in public address, was meagre and dull in colloquial discourse.

494. VIRGIL, LA FONTAINE, AND OTHERS.

Virgil was heavy in conversation, and resembled more an ordinary man than an enchanting poet.

La Fontaine, says La Bruyère, appeared coarse, heavy, and stupid; he could not speak or describe what he had just seen; but when he wrote, he was the model of poetry.

It is very easy, said a humorous observer on La Fontaine, to be a man of wit or a fool; but to be both, and that, too, in the extreme degree, is indeed admirable, and only to be found in him. This observation applies to that fine natural genius, Goldsmith.

Chancer was more facetious in his tales than in his conversation, and the Countess of Pembroke used to rally him by saying that his silence was more agreeable to her than his conversation.

Isocrates, celebrated for his beautiful oratorical compositions, was of so timid a disposition that he never ventured to speak in public. He compared himself to the whetstone, which will not cut, but enables other things to do this; for his productions served as models to other orators. When seated at the table of Nicoreon, King of Cyprus, he was requested to give his opinion on a certain subject; but he answered, "What I know is perhaps not seasonable, and what is seasonable I do not know." Vaucanson was said to be as much a machine as any he had made.

Dryden said of himself, "My conversation is slow and dull, my humor saturnine and reserved. In short, I am none of those who endeavor to break jests in company, or make repartees."

495. BUFFON AND MONTBELLIARD.

It is remarkable that the conversationists have rarely proved themselves to be the abler writers, though we shall furnish some brilliant exceptions. A pen is generally the extinguisher of these luminaries. A curious contrast occurred between Buffon and his friend Montbelliard, who was associated in his great work; the one possessed the reverse qualities of the other. Montbelliard threw every charm of animation over his delightful conversation; but when he came to take his seat at the rival desk of Buffon, an immense interval separated them. His tongue distilled the music and the honey of the bee, but his pen seemed to be iron, as cold and as hard, while Buffon's was the soft pencil of the philosophical painter of nature.

496. COWLEY AND KILLIGREW.

The characters of Cowley and Killigrew are striking instances of the disparity in the same men between their power with the tongue and their power with the pen. Cowley was embarrassed in conversation, and had not quickness in argument or repartee; pensive elegance and refined combinations could not be struck at to catch fire; while with Killigrew the sparkling bubbles of his fancy rose and dropped; yet, when this delightful conversationist wrote, the deception ceased. Denham, who knew them both, hit off the difference between them:—

"Had Cowley ne'er spoke, Killigrew ne'er writ, Combined in one, they had made a matchless wit."

Thought and expression are only found easily when they lie on the surface; the operations of the intellect, with some, are slow and deep. Hence it is that slow-minded men are not, as men of the world imagine, always the dulllest.

497. DESCARTES AND THOMAS.

Descartes, whose habits were formed in solitude and meditation, was silent in mixed company; and Thomas described his mind by saying that he had received his intellectual wealth from nature in solid bars, but not in current coin.

498. SMITH AND ARTISTS.

James Smith says, "I don't fancy painters. General Phipps used to have them much at his table. He once asked me if I liked to meet them. I answered, 'No; I know nothing in their way, and they know nothing out of it.'"

499. CORNEILLE.

The great Peter Corneille, whose genius resembled that of Shakspeare, and who has so forcibly expressed the sentiments of the hero, had nothing in his exterior that indicated his genius; on the contrary, his conversation was so insipid that it never failed of wearying. Nature, who had lavished on him the gifts of genius, had forgotten to blend with them her more ordinary ones. He did not even speak correctly that language of which he was such a master.

When his friends represented to him how much more he might please by not disdaining to correct these trivial errors, he would smile, and say, "I am not the less Peter Corneille!"

500. BEN JONSON.

Ben Jonson used to sit silent in learned company, "and suck in," as Fuller says, "not only his wine, but their several humors." Like Shakspeare, he held the mirror up to nature, but chose sometimes to look into the glass himself.

501. ROBERTSON AND HIS NEIGHBOR.

The personal familiarity of ordinary minds with a man of genius has often produced a ludicrous prejudice. A Scotchman, to whom the name of Dr. Robertson had travelled down, was curious to know who he was. "Your neighbor." But he could not persuade himself that the man whom he conversed with was the great historian of his country.

502. SOUTHEY.

Southey was stiff, sedate, and so wrapped up in a garb of almost asceticism, that Charles Lamb once stutteringly told him that "he was m-made for a m-m-monk, but somehow or other the co-cowl didn't fit."

503. ADDISON.

"Addison," says Pope, "was perfectly good company with intimates, and had something more charming in his conversation than I ever knew in any other man; but with any mixture of strangers, and sometimes only with one, he seemed to preserve his dignity much, with a stiff sort of silence."

504. JUNIUS—CONYERS.

It is said of the learned Junius, that he had such an invincible modesty, that, throughout his life, he appeared to common observers under peculiar disadvantages, and could scarcely speak, upon the most common subjects, without a suffusion of countenance. In this respect, he seems to have equalled the famous Mr. Addison, who likewise was at once one of the greatest philosophers, as well as one of the most abashed and modest men of his time.

Such was the diffidence of that good man, Dr. Conyers, that, if he saw a stranger in his congregation, especially if he suspected him to be a minister, it would so disconcert him as to render him almost incapable of speaking. On these occasions, he would sometimes say to Mr. Thornton, "If you expect a blessing under my ministry, I beg you will not bring so many black coats with you."

§ 53. DISTINGUISHED CONVERSATIONISTS.

505. RACINE'S CONFESSION.

The confidential confession of Racine to his son is remarkable. "Do not think that I am sought after by the great for my dramas; Corneille composes nobler verses than mine, but no one notices him, and he only pleases by the mouth of the actors. I never allude to my works when with men of the world, but I amuse them about matters they like to hear. My talent with them consists not in making them feel that I have any, but in showing them that they have."

506. GIBBON AND FOX.

Gibbon, one of the most fastidious of men, and disposed by neither party nor personal recollections to be enamored of Fox, describes his conversation as admirable. They met at Lausanne, spent a day without other company, "and talked the whole day." The test was sufficiently long under any circumstances, but Gibbon declares that Fox never flagged; his animation and variety of topic were inexhaustible.

507. BENTLEY, GROTIUS, AND GOLDSMITH.

Dr. Bentley was loquacious. Dr. Stillingfleet, Bishop of Worcester, to whom this talented man was chaplain, said that if Bentley had been a little more diffident, he would have been the most extraordinary man in Europe.

Grotius was very talkative, but he was thoughtful, and richly stored with learning.

Of Goldsmith it was said, "He wrote like an angel, and talked like poor Poll."

508. BURKE AND THE GRASSHOPPER.

Mr. Burke's Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful raised him in the world, and introduced him to the acquaintance of several persons distinguished by rank or talents. That his conversation was eminently interesting, entertaining, and instructive, is universally admitted. It was very discursive. If the persons with whom he conversed had full leisure to listen, and only wished for general information, nothing can be conceived more delightful; it abounded with eloquence, elegance, learning, novelty, and pleasantry; it was the basket of Pomona, full of every choice and every common fruit. But if a person wished for information upon any particular point, and his time for listening was limited, Mr. Burke's eloquent rambles were sometimes very provoking. Sir Philip Francis once waited upon him, by appointment, to read over to him some papers respecting Mr. Hastings's delinquencies. He called on Mr. Burke, in his way to the house of a friend, with whom he was engaged to dine. He found him in his garden, holding a grasshopper. "What a beautiful animal is this!" said Mr. Burke; "observe its structure: its legs, its wings, its eyes." "How can you," said Sir Philip, "lose your time in admiring such an animal, when you have so many objects of moment to attend to?" "Yet, Socrates," said Mr. Burke, "according to the exhibition of him in Aristophanes, attended to a much less animal; he actually measured the proportion which its size bore to the space it passed over in its skip. I think the skip of a grasshopper does not exceed its length: let us see." "My dear friend," said Sir Philip, "I am in a great hurry; let us walk in, and let me read my papers to you." Into the house they walked; Sir Philip began to read, and Mr. Burke appeared to listen. At length, Sir Philip having misplaced a paper, a pause ensued. "I think," said Mr. Burke, "that naturalists are now agreed that locusta, not cicada, is the Latin word for grasshopper. What is your opinion, Sir Philip?" "My opinion," answered Sir Philip, packing up his papers, and preparing to move off, "is, that till the grasshopper is out of your head, it will be idle to talk to you of the affairs of India."

It may be added, that when Mr. Burke was in conversation, he frequently appeared rather to speak from the reflections which were working in his own mind upon what his friend had said, than to give a direct answer to it, or make a direct observation upon it.

509. PHILLIPS'S ACCOUNT OF CURRAN.

I caught the first glimpse of the little man through the vista of his garden. There he was,—on a third time afterward, I saw him in a dress which you would imagine he had borrowed from his tipstaff,—his hands on his sides; his under lip protruded; his face almost parallel with the horizon; and the important step and eternal attitude only varied by the pause during which his eye glanced from his guest to his watch, and from his watch reproachfully to his dining-room: it was an invariable peculiarity—one second after four o'clock, and he would not wait for the viceroy. The moment he perceived me, he took me by the hand, said he would not have any one introduce me; and with a manner I often thought was charmed, he at once banished every apprehension, and completely familiarized me at the priory. I had often seen Curran—often heard him—often read him; but no man ever knew any thing about him who did not see him at his own table, with the few whom he selected. He was a little convivial deity; he soared in every region, and was at home in all; he touched every thing, and seemed as if he had created it; he mastered the human heart with the same ease that he did his violin. You wept, and you laughed, and you wondered; and the wonderful creature, who made you do all at will, never let it appear that he was more than your equal, and was quite willing, if you chose, to become your auditor. It is said of Swift that his rule was to allow a minute's pause after he had concluded, and then, if no person took up the conversation, to recommence himself. Curran had no conversational rule whatever: he spoke from impulse, and he had the art so to draw you into a participation, that, though you felt an inferiority, it was quite a contented one. Indeed, nothing could excel the urbanity of his demeanor. At the time I speak of, he was turned of sixty, yet he was as playful as a child. The extremes of youth and age were met in him: he had the experience of the one, and the simplicity of the other.

510. CANNING FLOORING AN IMPERTINENT.

"Lord —— called on Frere," says Coleridge, "and asked himself to dinner. From the moment of his entry he began to talk to the whole party, and in French,—all of us being genuine English,—and I was told his French was execrable. He had followed the Russian army into France, and seen a good deal of the great men concerned in the war; of none of those things did he say a word, but went on, sometimes in English and sometimes in French, gabbling about cookery, and dress, and the like. At last he paused for a little; and I said a few words, remarking how a great image may be reduced to the ridiculous and contemptible by bringing the constituent parts into detail, and mentioned the grandeur of the deluge, and the preservation of life in Genesis and the Paradise Lost, and the ludicrous effect produced by Drayton's description in his Noah's flood:—

'And now the beasts are walking from the wood,
As well of raving as that chew the cud.
The king of beasts his fury doth suppress,
And to the ark leads down the lioness;
The bull for his beloved mate doth low,
And to the ark brings on the fair-eyed cow,' &c.

"Hereupon Lord —— resumed, and spoke in raptures of a picture which he had lately seen of Noah's ark, and said the animals were all marching two and two, the little ones first, and that the elephants came last in great majesty, and filled up the foreground. 'Ah! no doubt, my lord,' said Canning, 'your elephants, wise fellows! staid behind to pack up their trunks.'

"This floored the ambassador for half an hour."

511. DR. BIRCH.

Of Dr. Birch Johnson was used to speak in this manner: "Tom is a lively rogue; he remembers a great deal, and can tell many pleasant stories; but a pen is to Tom a torpedo; the touch of it benumbs his hand and his brain. Tom can talk; but he is no writer."

512. JOHNSON—BURKE.

It has been aptly said of Johnson's style, that it "rolls round, like the sails of a mill, ponderously and sonorously, and monotonously, yet seldom grinding any corn." Yet, in conversation, his words were close and sinewy enough. It was rarely then that his pistol missed fire; and, if it did, "he knocked you down with the but-end of it," according to Goldsmith.

It was a fine compliment which Johnson, when debilitated by sickness, paid to Burke—the only man who was a match for that conversational tyrant: "That fellow calls forth all my powers. Were I to see Burke now, it would kill me." "Can he wind into a subject, like a serpent, as Burke does?" was the shrewd question put to Boswell by Goldsmith.

513. TYERS ON JOHNSON'S CONVERSATIONAL POWERS.

Tyers says of Johnson, though his time seemed to be bespoke, and quite engrossed, his house was always open to all his acquaintance, new and old. His amanuensis has given up his pen, the printer's devil has waited on the stairs for a proof-sheet, and the press has often stood still, while his visitors were delighted and instructed. No subject ever came amiss to him. He could transfer his thoughts from one thing to another with the most accommodating facility. He had the art, for which Locke was famous, of leading people to talk of their favorite subjects, and on what they knew best. By this he acquired a great deal of information. What he once learned he rarely forgot. They gave him their best conversation, and he generally made them pleased with themselves for endeavoring to please him.

Poet Smart used to relate, "that his first conversation with Johnson was of such variety and length, that it began with poetry and ended in fluxions." He always talked as if he was talking upon oath. He was the wisest person, and had the most knowledge in ready cash, that I ever had the honor to be acquainted with. Johnson's advice was consulted on all occasions. He was known to be a good casuist, and therefore had many cases submitted for his judgment. His conversation, in the judgment of several, was thought to be equal to his correct writings. Perhaps the tongue will throw out more animated expressions than the pen. He said the most common things in the newest manner. He always commanded attention and regard.

514. CONVERSATION WITHOUT EFFORT.

"I used," says Mrs. Piozzi, "to think Johnson's determined preference of a cold monotonous talker over an emphatical and violent one would make him quite a favorite among the men of ton, whose insensibility or affectation of perpetual calmness certainly did not give to him the offence it does to many. He loved conversation without effort, he said; and the encomiums I have heard him so often pronounce on the manners of Topham Beauclerc, in society, constantly ended in that peculiar phrase, that 'it was without effort.'"

515. COLERIDGE IN CONVERSATION

Dr. Dibdin has given an animated description of Coleridge's lecturing and conversation, which concurs with the universal opinion.

"I once came from Kensington, in a snow-storm, to hear Mr. Coleridge lecture on Shakspeare. I might have sat as wisely, and more comfortably, by my own fireside, for no Coleridge appeared. I shall never forget the effect his conversation made upon me at the first meeting, at a dinner party. It struck me not only as something quite out of the ordinary course of things, but as an intellectual exhibition altogether matchless. The viands were unusually costly, and the banquet was at once rich and varied; but there seemed to be no dish like Coleridge's conversation to feed upon, and no information so instructive as his own. The orator rolled himself up, as it were, in his chair, and gave the most unrestrained indulgence to his speech; and how fraught with acuteness and originality was that speech, and in what copious and eloquent periods did it flow! The auditors seemed rapt in wonder and delight, as one conversation, more profound or clothed in more forcible language than another, fell from his tongue. He spoke for nearly two hours with unhesitating and uninterrupted fluency. As I returned homewards, to Kensington, I thought a second Johnson had visited the earth, to make wise the sons of men, and regretted that I could not exercise the powers of a second Boswell, to record the wisdom and the eloquence that fell from the orator's lips.

"The manner of Coleridge was emphatic rather than dogmatic, and thus he was generally and satisfactorily listened to. It might be said of Coleridge, as Cowper has so happily said of Sir Philip Sidney, that he was the 'warbler of poetic prose.' There was always this characteristic feature in his multifarious conversation, — it was always delicate, reverend, and courteous. The chastest ear could drink in no startling sound; the most serious believer never had his bosom ruffled by one sceptical or reckless assertion. Coleridge was eminently simple in his manner. Thinking and speaking were his delight; and he would sometimes seem, during the most fervid movements of discourse, to be abstracted from all, and every thing around and about him, and to be basking in the sunny warmth of his own radiant imagination."

516. SILENCE NOT ALWAYS WISDOM.

Coleridge once dined in company with a person who listened to him, and said nothing for a long time; but he nodded his head, and Coleridge thought him intelligent. At length, towards the end of the dinner, some apple dumplings were placed on the table, and the listener had no sooner seen them than he burst forth, "Them's the jockeys for me!" Coleridge adds, "I wish Spurzheim could have examined the fellow's head."

Coleridge was very luminous in conversation, and invariably commanded listeners; yet the old lady rated his talent very lowly, when she declared she had no patience with a man who would have all the talk to himself.

517. LEIGH HUNT AND CARLYLE.

The following characteristic story of these two "intellectual gladiators" is related in the New Spirit of the Age: —

Leigh Hunt and Carlyle were once present among a small party of equally well-known men. It chanced that the conversation rested with these two, both first-rate talkers, and the others sat well pleased to listen. Leigh Hunt had said something about the Islands of the Blest, or El Dorado, or the Millennium, and was flowing on in his bright and hopeful way, when Carlyle dropped some heavy tree-trunk across Hunt's pleasant stream, and banked it up with philosophical doubts and objections at every interval of the speaker's joyous progress. But the unmitigated Hunt never ceased his overflowing anticipations, nor the saturnine Carlyle his infinite demurs to those finite flourishings. The listeners laughed and applauded by turns, and had now fairly pitted them against each other, as the philosopher of Hopefulness and of the Unhopeful. The contest continued with all that ready wit and philosophy, that mixture of pleasantry and profundity, that extensive knowledge of books and character, with their ready application in argument or illustration, and that perfect ease and good nature, which distinguish each of these men. The opponents were so well matched, that it was quite clear the contest would never come to an end. But the night was far advanced, and the party broke up. They all sallied forth, and, leaving the close room, the candles, and the arguments behind them, suddenly found themselves in presence of a most brilliant starlight night. They all looked up. "Now," thought Hunt, "Carlyle's done for! He can have no answer to that!" "There!" shouted Hunt, "look up there! Look at that glorious harmony, that sings with infinite voices an eternal song of hope in the soul of man." Carlyle looked up. They all remained silent to hear what he would say. They began to think he was silenced at last — he was a mortal man. But out of that silence came a few low-toned words, in a broad Scotch accent. And who on earth could have anticipated what the voice said? "Eh! it's a sad sight!" Hunt sat down on a stone step. They all laughed, then looked very thoughtful. Had the finite measured itself with infinity, instead of surrendering itself up to the influence? Again they laughed, then bade each other good night, and betook themselves homeward with slow and serious pace. There might be some reason for sadness, too. That brilliant firmament perhaps contained infinite worlds, each full of struggling and suffering beings — of beings who had to die.

518. FISHER AMES.

Fisher Ames was one of the most able political writers and orators of the American revolution. His public speeches were characterized by the most mastery and effective eloquence.

On a certain important occasion, when he had put forth one of his most powerful efforts, the assembly were so completely wrought up and borne away by the speaker's burning arguments and enthusiastic appeals, that a motion was made and carried to adjourn the decision of the subject to a future meeting, on the ground that such was the excitement produced by the orator, that the assembly were then unqualified to decide. We remember only one similar case on the records of forensic eloquence, when Parliament, after listening to the overwhelming plea of Sheridan at the trial of Warren Hastings, came to a like decision.

But great as Fisher Ames was as a writer and public speaker, he was not less distinguished in the social circle. His fluent language, vivid fancy, well-stored memory, and deep good sense made his conversation exceedingly entertaining and profoundly instructive. He often engrossed the whole conversation in company, like Johnson and Coleridge; but he rarely harangued, like them, to unwilling auditors.

The best talkers would speedily become silent in his society, much preferring the pleasure of listening to him to that of being listened to themselves.

519. STUART—ALLSTON.

Stuart, the American painter, was remarkable for his conversational powers. He had a penetrating mind, a retentive memory, a fluent tongue, and the power of adapting his discourse to all classes of his customers in a manner that was truly wonderful. While President Madison was sitting to Stuart for his portrait, the artist turned the stream of conversation on political affairs, and drew largely on his resources for facts and arguments on topics most interesting to his distinguished patron. Madison was so surprised and delighted with his conversation, that on parting with him he said, "Mr. Stuart, before I came here, I expected I should find you a skilful painter, as indeed I have; but, sir, little did I think I should find in you such eminent statesmanship and artistic excellence combined!"

Washington Allston was also a great conversationist; and his tongue wrought on his associates and acquaintances like an enchanter's spell. He would sit in the evening, amid the charmed circle, whiffing his cigar and sipping his glass of wine, while the sallies of wit, and genius, and eloquence, that fell from his lips, forbade their taking any note of time, and the small hours would be close upon them before they had thought of retiring.

520. EDGAR ALLEN POE.

The conversation of Edgar Allen Poe, the gifted American poet, was at times, says R. W. Griswold, almost supermortal in its eloquence. His voice was modulated with astonishing skill, and his large and variably expressive eyes looked repose or shot fiery tumult into theirs who listened, while his own face glowed or was changeless in pallor as his imagination quickened his blood or drew it back frozen to his heart. His imagery was from the worlds which no mortal can see but with the vision of genius. Suddenly starting from a proposition exactly and sharply defined in terms of utmost simplicity and clearness, he rejected the forms of customary logic, and, by a crystalline process of accretion, built up his ocular demonstrations in forms of gloomiest and ghastliest grandeur, or in those of the most airy and delicious beauty — so minutely and distinctly, yet so rapidly, that the attention which was yielded to him was chained till it stood among his wonderful creations, till he himself dissolved the spell, and brought his hearers back to common and base existence by vulgar fancies or exhibitions of the ignoblest passion.

521. MISS MARGARET FULLER.

Miss Margaret Fuller, by marriage Marchioness of Ossoli, who, with her husband and child perished in the wreck of the brig Elizabeth, from Leghorn, near Fire Island, in July, 1850, was one of the most gifted literary women of America. She was an eminent scholar, and even at eight years of age was accustomed to compose in Latin verse. Her reviews and criticisms on current literature, art, and music, have been extensively read, and found warm admirers; and her Summer on the Lakes, Woman in the Nineteenth Century, Papers and Literature and Art, however objectionable in some respects, contain passages of extraordinary beauty and elevation of sentiment. There are at times a masculine vigor of thought and a fearlessness of utterance that are truly surprising.

Miss Fuller, however, wrote laboriously, slowly, and not always lucidly or happily. "Her great thoughts were seldom irradiated by her written language;" more frequently they were clouded by it. But in conversation her intellect shone forth effulgently; profound and admirable thoughts clothed in the most felicitous and eloquent diction, surprised intelligent listeners, and led some to characterize her as "the best talker since De Stael."

It is thought by some that her early and life-long familiarity with foreign languages might have marred her use of her native tongue in composition; but whatever was the cause, the contrast between the verbiage of her writings and that of her conversation is one of the most remarkable on record.

§ 54. IMPROVEMENT FROM CONVERSATION.

522. LOCKE.

Mr. Locke was asked how he had contrived to accumulate a mine of knowledge so rich, yet so extensive and deep. He replied, that he attributed what little he knew to the not having been ashamed to ask for information, and to the rule he had laid down of conversing with all descriptions of men, on those topics chiefly that formed their own peculiar professions or pursuits.

523. SIR WALTER SCOTT.

Sir Walter Scott gives us to understand, that he never met with any man, let his calling be what it might, even the most stupid fellow that ever rubbed down a horse, from whom he could not, by a few moments' conversation, learn something which he did not before know, and which was valuable to him. This will account for the fact that he seemed to have an intuitive knowledge of every thing.

§ 55. MISCELLANEOUS.

524. FONTENELLE AND HIS NEPHEW.

Fontenelle, in his old age, was very deaf, and was always attended in company by a nephew, a talkative, vain young man. When any thing remarkable had escaped Fontenelle's auditory nerve, he used to apply to his nephew, "What was said?" This cockcomb would often answer, "Uncle, I said ———" "Bah!" was the constant retort of the philoso-

525. VOLTAIRE

When still a young man, and eager for instruction, Voltaire was perpetually putting questions. Despreaux on one occasion reproved him for this propensity with impatience and something of harshness. At a more advanced age, he held people who are ever asking questions in such aversion, that he has often been known to rise bluntly and leave his place. He said to an inhabitant of Geneva, who had furnished him with the idea and model of the interrogating bailiff in the Droit du Seigneur, "Sir, I am very well pleased to see you; but I inform you beforehand, that I know nothing about what you are going to ask."

526. THE ART OF CONVERSATION.

The following advertisement appeared in a Brussels paper:—

"The Baron Frederic d'A* has the honor to inform the public that, being gifted with a remarkable talent for conversation, nourished by such solid studies as are very rare in these times, and having garnered up in his various travels numerous interesting and instructive observations, he offers his services to the masters and mistresses of houses, and to all that unfortunate class of persons who are dying of ennui because they do not know how to talk. The Baron d'A. holds conversations in his saloon, which is open twice a day to subscribers at five dollars per month, and is the rendezvous of a select circle of polite talkers.

"He here consecrates three hours of the day to instructive and agreeable converse. The evenings are devoted to news, literature, the arts, and observations on manners, which are made satirical without being bitter. Politics are wholly excluded. The baron will attend at private houses at the rate of two dollars the hour. The baron will not accept more than three invitations to dinner at four dollars each, not including the evening. He graduates the tone of his conversation by the amount of his pay. Conundrums, puns, and plays upon words must be particularly arranged for. The Baron Frederic d'A. is also prepared to furnish any number of talkers, elegantly dressed, who will aid him in sustaining and varying the conversation in case his employers wish to avoid the embarrassment and trouble of taking any part in the conversation.

"He will also provide friends for strangers, and for those who are seeking an entrance into good society."

527. MADAME NECKER'S TABLE TALK.

During one day, at Madame Necker's, the Chevalier de Chastellux happened to arrive first of the company, and so early that the mistress of the house was not in the drawing-room. In walking about, he saw on the ground, under Madame Necker's chair, a little book, which he picked up; it was a white paper book, of which several pages were in the handwriting of Madame Necker. It was the preparation for the very dinner to which he was invited. Madame Necker had written it the evening before, and it contained all she was to say to the most remarkable persons at table. After reading the little book, M. de Chastellux hastened to replace it under the chair. A moment afterwards, a valet de chambre entered to say, that Madame Necker had forgotten her pocket-book in the drawing-room. It was found, and carried to Madame Necker. The dinner was delightful to M. de Chastellux, who saw that Madame Necker said word for word what she had written in her pocket-book.

528. ROUSSEAU MAKING LACE-STRINGS.

When Rousseau once retired to a village, he had to endure his conversation: for this purpose he was compelled to invent an expedient to get rid of his uneasy sensations. "Alone," says Rousseau, "I have never known ennui, even when perfectly unoccupied; my imagination, filling the void, was sufficient to busy me. It is only the inactive chit-chat of the room, when every one is seated face to face, and only moving their tongues, which I never could support. There to be a fixture, nailed with one hand on the other, to settle the state of the weather, or watch the flies about one, or, what is worse, to be bandying compliments, this to me is not bearable." He hit on the expedient of making lace-strings, carrying his working-cushion in his visits, to keep the peace with the country gossips.

529. FUSELI AND SMALL CONVERSATION.

Fuseli had a great dislike to commonplace observations. After sitting perfectly silent for a long time in his own room, during "the bald, disjointed chat" of some idle callers-in, who were gabbling with one another about the weather, and other topics of as interesting a nature, he suddenly exclaimed, "We had pork for dinner to-day!" "Dear Mr. Fuseli, what an odd remark!" "Why, it is as good as anything you have been saying for the last hour."

§ 56. COPYRIGHT.

530. FIRST DECIDED PROTECTION OF AUTHORS IN ENGLAND.

The first appearance of any thing in the shape of a legal security granted to authors for their productions, is referred, by Mr. D'Israeli, to the reign of Queen Elizabeth. No book was allowed to be published without the permission of the licensors of the press, who were instructed, for the better protection of literary property, only to give one license for the same book. This does not, however, appear to have had the desired effect, since these persons were easily tampered with, by the booksellers of those days, to furnish half a dozen authorities to different persons for the same work. In Queen Anne's reign, the office of licenser of the press was done away with, and literature received a more definite and decided protection. A limited term was granted to every author to reap the fruit of his labors; after which a man's right in his own work ceased altogether. This has been the case ever since.

531. CONTEMPORARY COPYRIGHTS.

The late Mr. Tegg, the publisher in Cheapside, gave the following list of remunerative payments to distinguished authors in his time; and he is believed to have taken considerable pains to verify the items:—

Fragments of History, by Charles Fox, sold by Lord Holland, for 5000 guineas. Fragments of History, by Sir James Mackintosh, £500. Lingard's History of England, £4683. Sir Walter Scott's Bonaparte was sold, with the printed books, for £18,000; the net receipts of copyright on the first two editions only must have been £10,000. Life of Wilberforce, by his sons, 4000 guineas. Life of Byron, by Moore, £4000. Life of Sheridan, by Moore, £2000. Life of Hannah More, £2000. Life of Cowper, by Southey, £1000. Life and Times of George IV., by Lady C. Bury, £1000. Byron's Works, £20,000. Lord of the Isles, half share, £1500. Lalla Rookh, by Moore, £3000. Rejected Addresses, by Smith, £1000. Crabbe's Works, republication of, by Mr. Murray, £3000. Wordsworth's Works, republication of, by Mr. Moxon, £1050. Bulwer's Rienzi, £1600. Marryat's Novels, £500 to £1500 each. Trollope's Factory Boy, £1800. Hannah More devoted £30,000 per annum for her copyrights, during the latter years of her life. Rundell's Domestic Cookery, £2000. Nicholas Nickleby, £3000. Eustace's Classical Tour, £2100. Sir Robert Inglis obtained for the beautiful and interesting widow of Bishop Heber, by the sale of his journal, £5000.

532. AMERICAN COPYRIGHTS.

Our publishers usually pay authors ten per cent. on the retail price of their works. But authors of extraordinary popularity in some instances have received from twenty to forty per cent.

Stephens, author of Travels in the Holy Land, &c., had received from his publishers, the Harpers, as early as 1848, more than fifteen thousand dollars; and Prescott, for his Life of Ferdinand and Isabella, and his Conquest of Mexico, had received some twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars from the same firm.

533. DESCENDANTS OF CORNEILLE AND MOLIÈRE.

Authors, by a strange singularity, are disinherited at their birth; for, on the publication of their works, these cease to be their own property. Let that natural property be secured, and a good book would be an inheritance, a leasehold or a freehold, as you choose it; it might at least last out a generation, and descend to the author's blood, were they permitted to live on their father's glory, as in all other property they do on his industry. Something of this nature has been instituted in France, where the descendants of Corneille and Molière retain a claim on the theatres whenever the dramas of their great ancestors are performed. In that country, literature has always received peculiar honors; it was there decreed, in the affairs of Crebillon, that literary productions are not seizable by creditors.

534. LITERARY COMPENSATION.

The French papers furnish some curious particulars relative to the publication of M. Thiers's History of the Consulate and the Empire—a continuation of his History of the Revolution. A partnership fund amounting to five hundred and twenty-five thousand francs, (twenty-one thousand pounds sterling,) was, it seems, provided for the payment of the copyright and expenses, and the society, provisionally formed some years ago, was to receive a regular working organization, when the author should have completed his manuscript. The society now, by public act, declares that "M. Thiers's work being in a very advanced state, the members consider it for their interest at once to begin the publication." The author has, it is said, already received three hundred and twenty thousand francs on account of his work, which was to be paid at the rate of forty thousand francs for each of the first nine volumes: the tenth and concluding volume entitles him to one hundred and forty thousand francs. M. Thiers receives, then, for copyright five hundred thousand francs—no less a sum, in English money, than twenty thousand pounds. At this rate, M. Thiers undoubtedly finds it worth his while to write.

535. INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

The acknowledged inferiority, in certain branches, of American to English literature, is chiefly owing to the absence of a law of international copyright. The system of legalized freebooty—that right of border foray which enables an American publisher to appropriate the labors of an English author, and defraud him of his hire—has been, by a most just retribution, the bane of American literature. Thanks to this system, authorship by profession is in America a career, if not impossible and unknown, at least one to which the entrance is fenced off by difficulties that must deter many from entering upon it. On this point Mr. Griswold speaks with authority:—

"A short time before Mr. Washington Irving was appointed minister to Spain, he undertook to dispose of a production of merit, written by an American who had not yet established a commanding name in the literary market, but found it impossible to get an offer from any of the principal publishers. 'They even declined to publish it at the author's cost,' he says, 'alleging that it was not worth their while to trouble themselves about native works, of doubtful success, while they could pick and choose among the successful works daily poured out by the English press, for the copyright of which they had nothing to pay.' And not only is the American thus in some degree excluded from the audience of his countrymen, but the publishers, who have a control over many of the newspapers and other periodicals, exert themselves, in the way of their business, to build up the reputation of the foreigner whom they rob, and to destroy that of the home author who aspires to a competition with him.

"This legalized piracy," continues Mr. Griswold, warning as he proceeds, "supported by some sordid and base argument, keeps the criminal courts busy; makes divorce committees in the legislature staiding instead of special; every year yields abundant harvests of profligate sons and daughters; and inspires a growing contempt for our plain republican forms and institutions. Injurious as it is to the foreign author, it is more so to the American, and it falls with heaviest weight upon the people at large, whom it deprives of that nationality of feeling which is among the first and most powerful incentives to every kind of greatness."

CRITICISM AND CRITICS.

§ 57. ASTUTE CRITICS HOAXED.

536. ANGELO AND SODERINI.

ANGELO was requested by the gonfaloniere Soderini at Florence to undertake to form a statue out of a misshapen block, on which Simon da Fiesole had many years before been unsuccessfully employed in endeavoring to represent the proportions of a giant in marble. Angelo fearlessly accepted the commission, and in spite of the difficulties to be encountered, succeeded in producing the beautiful figure known under the name of the David, and which now stands in front of the Palazzo Vecchio.

The statue being finished, the gonfaloniere, who professed himself a connoisseur, came to inspect the purchase, and, among other criticisms which he made, objected to the nose, pronouncing it to be out of all due proportion to the rest of the figure, and added that he wished some reduction should take place in the size. Angelo knew well with whom he had to deal; he mounted the scaffold, for the figure is upwards of twelve feet high, and giving a few sonorous but harmless blows with his hammer on the stone, let fall a handful of marble-dust, which he had scraped up from the floor below; and then, descending from his station, turned to the gonfaloniere with a look expectant of approbation. "Ay!" exclaimed the sagacious critic, "this is excellent; now you have given it life indeed." M. Angelo was content; and receiving his four hundred scudi for his task, wisely said no more; it would have been no gratification to a man like him to have shown the incapacity of a critic like Soderini.

537. ANTONIO LUSCO.

Antonio Lusco, the intimate friend of Poggio, was, like himself, secretary to Martin V. This pontiff thought so highly of him, that he employed him in the most important negotiations, as in the embassy to Philip, Duke of Milan, in 1423, to prevail upon him to make peace with the Kerentines. Martin V. having ordered him to compose a letter, and to communicate it to some one in whom the pontiff had great confidence, Antonio found him at table, and happening to be a little heated with wine at the time, he blamed the composition rather severely, and told him it must be completely altered.

"I shall alter it," said Antonio to a friend, "as John Galeazzo's tailor did his robe-de-chambre. The duke, after a hearty supper, finding his robe-de-chambre rather tight, sent for his tailor to have it altered. The tailor took it away, and brought it back next morning without altering a stitch, and the duke found it fitted admirably. It will be the same with my letter," said Antonio.

538. HALIFAX AND POPE'S ILLAD.

When Pope was first introduced to read his Iliad to Lord Halifax, the noble critic did not venture to be dissatisfied with so perfect a composition; but this passage and that word, this turn and that expression, formed the broken cant of his criticisms. The honest poet was stung with vexation; for, in general, the parts at which his lordship hesitated were those with which he was most satisfied. As he returned home with Sir Samuel Garth, he revealed to him his anxiety of mind. "O," replied Garth, laughing, "you are not so well acquainted with his lordship as myself; he must criticize. At your next visit read to him those very passages as they now stand; tell him that you have recollected his criticisms; and I'll warrant you of his approbation of them. This is what I have done a hundred times myself." Pope made use of this stratagem; it took, like the marble-dust of Angelo; and my lord exclaimed, "Dear Pope, they are now inimitable!"

539. MEINHOLDT'S HOAX.

A recent literary hoax, says a modern writer, has been practised by Dr. Meinholdt, the author, but pretended editor, of a strange legend called the Amber Witch, from a mutilated MS. found at Usedom, in Pomerania, by an old sexton, in a closet of the church. It appears that the worthy doctor is the author of some poems, and, we believe, other works, which had not made a very strong impression on the public mind, owing, it is believed, to the chilling influence of certain reviews and notices; particularly those of the "Tubingen Critical Sages," whose training in the infallible Hegelian philosophy has endowed them with an unerring judgment as to the authenticity of every kind of writing—whose well-tryed acuteness can detect the myth in every form—who throughout the gospels profess to discriminate, from internal instinct, the precise degree of credibility of each chapter, each narrative, each word, with a certainty which disdains all doubt; and a firmness no argument could possibly move. Dr. Meinholdt, however, not sharing largely in the reverential deference paid to the Tubingen Reviewers, resolved to put a trick upon them, and invalidate the strength which they had wielded so unkindly towards his authentic writings. With this view, he issued the Amber Witch in the form and fashion above alluded to, receiving the warm suffrages of his former severe judges. At the proper time, the doctor avowed the work as an invention of his own, and of course came in for a good portion of abuse. Some were greatly scandalized, that a reverend doctor should have been guilty of a fraud. Others called it a lying assumption, an unpardonable levity, worthy of severe censure. But the best part of the story is, that, in order to secure their own reputation for critical acumen, a large portion affected to discredit the doctor's confession, and denied his ability to produce such a work, which they had determined should be "genuine."

§ 58. VARIOUS STANDARDS OF CRITICISM.

540. INTELLECTUAL DIFFERENCES.

Natural differences of intellect operate strikingly in the remarkable contempt of men of genius for those pursuits, and the pursuers, which require talents quite distinct from their own, with a cast of mind thrown by nature into another mould. Hence we must not be surprised at the antipathies of Selden and Locke, of Longuerue and Buffon, and this class of genius, against poetry and poets, while, on the other side, these undervalue the pursuits of the antiquary, the naturalist, and the metaphysician, by their own favorite course of imagination. We can only understand in the degree we comprehend; and in both these cases the parties will be found quite deficient in those qualities of genius which constitute the excellence of the other. A professor of polite literature condemned the study of botany, as adapted to mediocrity of talent, and only demanding patience; but Linnæus showed how a man of genius becomes a creator even in a science which seems to depend only on order and method.

541. PEIRESC.

A very curious circumstance has been revealed of Peiresc, whose enthusiasm for science was long felt throughout Europe; his name was known in every country, and his death was lamented in forty languages; yet was this great man unknown to several men of genius in his own country; Rochefoucault declared he had never heard of his name, and Malherbe wondered why his death created so universal a sensation. Thus we see the classes of literature, like the planets of heaven, revolving like distinct worlds; and it would not be less absurd for the inhabitants of Venus to treat with contempt the powers and faculties of those of Jupiter, than it is for the men of wit and imagination those of the men of knowledge and curiosity. They are incapable of exerting the peculiar qualities which give a real value to those pursuits, and therefore they must rely on their nature and their result.

542. MUTUAL CONTEMPT OF AUTHORS.

Among men of genius that want of mutual esteem, usually attributed to envy or jealousy, often originates in a deficiency of analogous ideas, or sympathy, in the parties. On this principle several curious phenomena in the history of genius may be explained. When one great author depreciates another, it has often no worse source than his own taste. The witty Cowley despised the natural Chaucer; the cold, classical Boileau the rough sublimity of Crebillon; the refining Marivaux the familiar Molière. Fielding ridiculed Richardson, whose manner so strongly contrasted with his own; and Richardson contemned Fielding, and declared he would not last. Cumberland escaped a fit of displeasure, not living to read his own character by Bishop Watson, whose logical head tried the lighter elegances of that polished man by his own nervous genius, destitute of whatever was beautiful in taste. There was no envy in the breast of Johnson when he advised Mrs. Thrale not to purchase Gray's Letters, as trifling and dull, no more than in Gray himself, when he sunk the poetical character of Shenstone, his simplicity and purity of feeling, by an image of ludicrous contempt. The deficient sympathy in these men of genius, for modes of feeling opposite to their own, was the real cause of their opinions; and thus it happens that even superior genius is so often liable to be unjust and false in its decisions.

543. MALHERBE'S STANDARD.

Malherbe, on hearing a prose work of great merit much extolled, dryly asked if it would reduce the price of bread. Nor was his appreciation of poetry much higher, when he observed that a good poet was of no more service to the church or the state than a good player at ninepins.

544. COWPER AND HIS CRITIC.

Cowper had sent a small poem to the publishers, when some friendly critic took the liberty to alter a line in the poem, to make it smoother, supposing, of course, he had made the line much better because it was smoother, and that Cowper would be grateful for such a favor; but Cowper did not think "oily smoothness" the only merit of poetry, and so was quite indignant at the liberty taken with his poem.

"I did not write the line," says he, "that has been tampered with hastily or without due attention to the construction of it; and what appeared to me its only merit is, in its present state, entirely annihilated."

"I know that the ears of modern verse-makers are delicate to an excess, and their readers are troubled with the same squeamishness as themselves; so that if a line does not run as smooth as quicksilver, they are offended. A critic of the present day serves a poem as a cook serves a dead turkey, when she fastens the legs of it to a post and draws out all its sinews. For this we may thank Pope; but give me a manly, rough line, with a deal of meaning in it, rather than a whole poem of music periods, that have nothing but their oily smoothness to recommend them."

"In a much longer poem which I have just finished, there are many lines which an ear so nice as the gentleman's who made the above-mentioned alteration would undoubtedly condemn; and yet (if I may be allowed the expression) they cannot be made smoother without being made the worse for it. There is a roughness on a plum which nobody that understands fruit would rub off, though the plum would be much more polished without it."

But lest I tire you, I will only add, that I wish you to guard me for the future from all such meddling, assuring you that I always write as smoothly as I can, but that I never did, never will, sacrifice the spirit or sense of a passage to the sound of it."

545. A GARDENER'S CRITICISM.

When the first edition of the Seasons came out, the poet sent a copy, handsomely bound, to Sir Gilbert Elliott, of Minto, afterwards lord justice clerk, who had shown him great kindness. Sir Gilbert showed the book to his gardener, a relation of Thomson, who took it into his hands, and turning it over and over, and gazing on it with admiration, Sir Gilbert said to him, "Well, David, what do you think of James Thomson now? There's a book will make him famous all the world over, and immortalize his name." David, looking now at Sir Gilbert, then at the book, said, "In truth, sir, it is a grand book! I did na' think the lad had ingenuity enow to ha' done sic a neat piece of handicraft."

546. BURNS CRITICIZED BY A HOUSEKEEPER.

The early patroness of Burns, Mrs. Dunlop, of Dunlop, had an old housekeeper, a sort of privileged person, who had certain aristocratic notions of the family dignity, that made her utterly astonished at the attentions that were paid by her mistress to a man in such low worldly estate as the rustic poet. In order to overcome her prejudice and surprise, her mistress persuaded her to peruse a MS. copy of the Cotter's Saturday Night, which the poet had just then written. When Mrs. Dunlop inquired her opinion of the poem, she replied, with a quaint indifference, "Aweel, madam, that's vera weel." "Is that all you have to say in its favor?" asked the mistress. "Deed, madam," she returned, "the like o' you quality may see a vast int'; but I was aye used to the like o' all that the poet has written about in my ain father's house, and atweel I dinna ken how he could ha' described it ony other gate." When Burns heard of the old woman's criticism, he remarked that it was one of the highest compliments he had ever received.

§ 59. KEENNESS, HUMOR, AND WIT IN CRITICIZING.

547. THOMAS MORE'S ADVICE TO AN AUTHOR.

An acquaintance of Sir Thomas More, having taken great pains in writing a book, which he intended to publish, brought it to Sir Thomas for his opinion. Sir Thomas, having looked it over, and finding it a foolish, trifling performance, told the writer, with a grave face, that it would be worth more if it was in verse. The man, upon this, took it home, and set about turning it into verse. When he had finished it, he carried it again to Sir Thomas, who, having looked it over, said to him, "Ay, marry, it is now something; it is now rhyme, but before it was neither rhyme nor reason."

548. JOHNSON AND THE BUTCHER.

An eminent carcass butcher, as meagre in his person as he was in his understanding, being one day in a bookseller's shop, took up a volume of Churchill's poems, and by way of showing his taste, repeated the following line:—

"Who rules o'er freemen should himself be free."

Then turning to Dr. Johnson, —

"What think you of that, sir?" said he.

"Rank nonsense," replied the other. "It is an assertion without a proof; and you might, with as much propriety, say, —

"Who slays fat oxen should himself be fat."

549. FIRST NUMBER OF THE DIAL.

The editor of the Knickerbocker thus criticizes the first number of the "Dial," a review started in Boston in 1840, characterized, at first certainly, by so much "literary euphuism," or "the unutterable perfection of human utterance:"—

"We may infer, from the editor's clear and comprehensive definition of true criticism, that in that department the work will be characterized by 'a oneness, a universal dovetailedness, a light and a shade, that cannot fail to be sufficiently marked. 'All criticism,' say the editors, 'should be poetic, unpredictable, superseding all foregone thoughts, and making a new light on the whole world; its brow is not wrinkled with circumspection,' &c., &c. In consonance, we may presume, with these 'principles' we have, in 'Notes from the Journal of a Scholar,' among other critical remarks upon Shakespeare, the following, which certainly 'supersede all foregone thoughts' on the same general theme: 'His genius was omnific and all-sympathizing. The message he was sent to do he delivered, unembarrassed, unimplicated. He gave voice to the finest, curiousest, boldest speculations. Hamlet and Othello he counted not his creatures, but self-subsistent; too high born to be property; if they lived, he lived.' &c. The subjoined characteristic paragraph is 'level to the meanest capacity;' in fact, nothing could be flatter: 'The popular genesis is historical. It is written to sense, not to the soul. Two principles, diverse and alien, interchange the Godhead and sway the world by turns. God is dual; spirit is derivative. Identity halts in diversity; unity is actual merely. The poles of things are not integrated; creation is globed and orb'd. Yet, in the true genesis, nature is globed in the material, souls orb'd in the spiritual firmament. Love globes, wisdom orbs, all things. As magnet the steel, so spirit attracts matter, which trembles to traverse the poles of diversity, and rest in the bosom of unity. All genesis is of love: wisdom is her form, beauty her costume.' 'Granting,' says a brother journalist, 'that the popular Genesis is historical, may we not ask the author of these comprehensible sentences what he thinks of the Exodus of the Egyptians in days of yore? Were 'the poles of things' integrated then, or was unity actual merely?

"What time Dan Abraham left the Chaldean land,
And pastured on from verdant stage to stage?"

And what was the general effect of it on the growth of sheep? — and collaterally, upon the price of putty? These are points which the writer should settle at once. They have a 'dual' interest; and if he can 'orb' out any thing 'right nice' on the subject, he will oblige the universe particularly. Let him help the Dial to show Europe and America what's o'clock, as soon as he can.—Quære. Is not the Dial dual? There are good thoughts in several of the Dial papers, but they are smothered in 'words, words.' This school of literary euphuists cannot last; the imitative pupils, especially, are destined to a speedy dissolution. 'If your meats are good, what is the use of 'disguising them?'' said a plain-spoken Yankee to a boasting chef de cuisine, at Paris. 'You might serve up the leg of a monkey, or the head of your grandfather, and it would pass, perhaps, for whatever you might please to call it, when covered up with your contraptions. For my part, I should like to know what I eat.' There is a moral in this. 'Four pails of water to a turnip' may make an authentic potage à la mode de Paris; but a kindred proportion of mind to a literary 'turnip head' would scarcely edify the public, or improve American letters."

550. ROBERT HALL'S IDEA OF KIPPIS.

Dr. Gregory asked this eminent man to lend him Dr. Kippis's edition of Doddridge's Pneumatology, which contains many references to authors who have treated on the topics introduced by Dr. Doddridge, which were not originally included. Mr. Hall replied that he did not possess Dr. K.'s edition, in a tone which showed that he did not highly regard his authority. Dr. Gregory asked, "Was not Dr. Kippis a clever man?" Mr. H. replied, "He might be a very clever man by nature, for aught I know, but he laid so many books upon his head, that his brains could not move."

551. BONS-MOTS OF A BROTHER OF T. CAMPBELL.

While Mr. Thomas Campbell was prosecuting his studies at the University of Glasgow, he occupied the same apartments with an elder brother, who, though no poet himself, was an admirable critic, and possessed a species of dry, sarcastic humor, peculiarly his own. Mr. Campbell had descended to the breakfast-room one morning, leaving the poet to follow at his leisure. After waiting some time, he commenced his meal in solitude, and had nearly finished, when his brother entered with a copy of verses in his hand, which he laid on the table as an excuse for the delay, at the same time requesting Mr. Campbell's opinion of their merit. The reply was quite characteristic: "Your lines are admirable, Tom, my boy; but they want fire;" and, suiting the action to the word, the merciless critic committed the paper to the flames.

§ 60. UNLUCKY AND AMUSING MISTAKES OF CRITICS.

552. A KING'S POETRY.

Messieurs de Saint Agneau and Dangeau persuaded Louis XIV. that he could write verses as well as another. The king made the experiment, and composed a madrigal, which he himself did not think very good. One morning he said to the Marshal de Gramont, "Read this, marshal, and tell me if ever you saw any thing so bad. Finding I have lately addicted myself to poetry, they bring me any trash." The marshal, having read, answered, "Your majesty is a most excellent judge in all matters of taste, for I think I never read any thing so stupid or so ridiculous." The king laughed. "Do you not think he must be a very silly fellow who composed it?" "It is not possible," continued Gramont, "to call him any thing less." "I am delighted," said the king, "to hear you speak your sentiments so frankly, for I wrote it myself." Every body present laughed at the marshal's confusion, and it certainly was as malicious a trick as could possibly be played on an old courtier.

553. THE CONNOISSEUR TAKEN IN.

One day, at an exhibition in Brussels, there was a gentleman, very finely dressed, who seemed uncommonly attentive to every picture, and condemned, like a modern critic, ad libitum. Coming, at last, over against a high-finished piece of fruit and flowers, with insects placed upon some of the leaves, he lifted up his right hand, and applied his eye glass, which was set in silver, and curiously chased round the rim; on the little finger of the other hand, which held the catalogue, he had an antique, set round with rich brilliants. After he had pored over the picture for some time, he exclaimed,—

"O, horribly handled! The coloring is execrable. Was this thing done for a fly? Never was any thing half so wretched—a fly! nothing was ever more out of nature!"

This speech brought a group of listeners about him, when he pointed to that part of the picture where the insect was executed in so abominable a manner; on the approach of his finger, the ill-done reptile flew away; for it happened to be a real fly.

554. LA MOTHE'S FABLES.

When the Fables of De la Mothe first appeared, it was the fashion to speak very unfavorably of them. At a supper given by the Prince of Vendome, the Abbé Chaulien, the Bishop of Lucon, the Abbé Cointin, and other highly reputed critics were present, and they were all very merry at the expense of De la Mothe, and oppressed the poor author with their censures. Voltaire, who related the anecdote, was one of the party. "Gentlemen," said he, with an air of gravity, "you are all perfectly right; you judge according to the rules of correct criticism, and of course are sensible what an infinite difference there is between the style of De la Mothe and that of La Fontaine. Après, have you seen the last edition of the Fables of that incomparable writer?" "No," said they. "Are you not," continued Voltaire, "acquainted with that most beautiful of all the fables of Fontaine, lately discovered among the papers of the Duchess of Bouillon?" He read the fable to them. They heard him with looks of delight, and expressed their praise of it in the most rapturous terms. "This is nature itself. What exquisite simplicity! What captivating grace!" "Gentlemen," said Voltaire, with a triumphant sneer, "let me undeceive you: the fable you thus extol was not written by Fontaine, but by De la Mothe."

555. POPE AND CIBBER.

The mortifying dilemma in which Pope's malignant hostility to Colley Cibber placed him is not, perhaps, generally known. In the continued warfare of these distinguished writers, the laureate's imperturbable good humor was an overmatch for the peevishness and hatred of Pope, which led him, on one occasion, very unwittingly, to pay his adversary the highest possible compliment, and at the same time to treat with rudeness and contempt the person for whom, through life, he held respect and almost reverence. When the admirable comedy of the Provoked Husband was produced, as the joint effort of Sir John Vanbrugh and Colley Cibber, the distinctive claims of each author could only be guessed at; and the high-life scenes, being quite in the style in which Sir John had greatly distinguished himself previously, were generally attributed to him. Pope felt wholly satisfied of the author's share, and resolved to have a hit at his old foe. In a very spirited article, he analyzed the play at great length, complimenting Sir John highly upon the elegance and perfection he had given to the scenes of Lord and Lady Townly—the fable, the dialogue, and, above all, the moral was perfect. He then proceeded to mangle and dissect the other portions of the play, which he believed to be Cibber's share, and were asserted to be made up of vulgarity, dullness, ineffective satire on his betters, and evidently the work of one whose pretensions to anything beyond coarse farce were not to be tolerated. The incomparable humor of Sir Francis, my lady, John Moody, and the cubs of children, was pronounced a disgrace to the stage, and a most unfit adjunct to the Townly and high-comedy scenes.

We may well conceive the horror and mortification of the critic, when the twin authors avowed their separate claims, and the reviled and insulted portion was claimed by Sir John, who relinquished to the hated laureate the share unconsciously eulogized by the candid critic. Cibber made a good use of the advantage given to him, on all occasions, to the great vexation of Pope.

556. COOKE AND HIS ADMIRER

G. F. Cooke's impatience of small and verbal criticism is well known. During his first visit to Philadelphia, many of his admirers were desirous of ascertaining how far cultivation and study had contributed towards forming so consummate an artist, and various efforts were made, as the phrase is, to draw him out. On one occasion, a gentleman, desirous of evincing an extreme admiration of his tasteful reading, as well as admirable acting, was instancing a new meaning he had lately observed, in some English critical notice, where Cooke had been extravagantly lauded for a new reading, which, as it turned out, he had never heard of. In the passage, "Many a time and oft, on the Rialto," &c., he was said to have elucidated the passage wonderfully, by dividing the sentence thus: "Signior Antonio, many a time, — And oft on the Rialto," the most public place in Venice, thus rendering the insults inflicted by the merchant more conspicuously cruel, from the number of his mercantile friends being by to witness it. Cooke scarcely heard his panegyrist out, when, with the most passionate expression of voice and manner, he roared out, "Sar! Sar!" (his usual pronunciation when excited,) there is not one word of truth in this statement, which, thank Heaven, I never saw or heard of before. So far from having uttered this silly and unmeaning mutilation of the plain meaning of Shakspeare, had I met with the remark at the time, I think I should have been tempted to prosecute the slanderer for a libel!"

557. ACUTE CRITICISM.

Three Roxburghshire lairds. Mr. Kerr, of Abbotrule, Mr. E—t, of H—d, and Mr. K—r, of C—o, were officers in one fencible regiment, which was quartered in a town in Ireland during the time of the rebellion of 1798. It was the age before intellect began its march, when all men were not bound to be familiar with literary matters, as in later times. Mr. Kerr was consulted by his two companions, whose capacities, he was very well aware, were not over brilliant, as to the best manner of beguiling the time while the regiment was lying inactive, and recommended the Vicar of Wakefield to them, as a book from the perusal of which they were sure to derive the desired amusement: it was principally, however, with a view to his own amusement, that he engaged them in this method of killing their tedious leisure hours. The two students set to work on Goldsmith's fascinating novel without loss of time, and, living together, they resolved also to read together; upon the same principle, it is to be presumed, that two travellers on one road join company, in order to lighten the way. Mr. Kerr failed not to call regularly every forenoon, to see what progress they made, and always found the Vicar of Wakefield lying on the table, with a mark at the place where they had left off. This mark he every day put back to very nearly the same place where it had been the day before; so that the two intelligent gentlemen, though they applied assiduously, could hardly make their way through the volume at all. At length, he did permit them to finish it, and asked, when it was done, how they liked it. "Why," said one of them, very simply, "it's a nice enough kind of book; but don't you think there is a great deal of sameness in it?"

558. CORNEILLE'S ADVICE TO RACINE.

When Racine consulted Corneille about his tragedy of Alexandre, Corneille advised him to abandon tragedy, telling him that he was destitute of talent for this sort of writing. Fontenelle gave the same advice to Voltaire, after his tragedy of Brutus. So great may be the errors of great critics.

559. SIR JOHN HILL'S CRITIQUE ON AN ACTRESS.

Doctor, afterwards Sir John Hill, author of some farces, and a paper called the Spectator, went into the greenroom of Covent Garden Theatre, and addressing himself to Mrs. Woffington, of celebrated memory, and the first of actresses, he questioned her whether or no she had seen the Spectator of that day; to which she answered in the negative. The doctor replied, "Because, if you had, you would have seen my opinion of your performance last night, in the character of Calista." "I am much obliged to you, sir," replied the lady, "for your kind intentions towards me; but, unfortunately, the play of that evening was obliged to be changed to the Journey to London, in which I played the part of Lady Townley."

§ 61. CRITICS INFLUENCED BY EGOTISM, ENVY, OR ILL NATURE.

560. IMPERIAL CRITIC.

The Emperor Adrian, who, not content with being the first in power, was ambitious to be the first in letters, once corrected Favorinus for employing an improper word. He submitted with patience, though he was convinced that he had used the proper word. When his friends objected to his compliance, he answered, "Shall not I easily suffer him to be the most learned of all men, who has thirty legions at his command?"

561. CORNEILLE'S MELITE.

Corneille, having finished his studies, devoted himself to the bar; but this was not the stage on which his abilities were to be displayed. He followed the occupation of a lawyer for some time, without taste and without success. A trifling circumstance discovered to the world and to himself a different genius. A young man, who was in love with a girl of the same town, having solicited him to be his companion in one of those secret visits which he paid to the lady, it happened that the stranger pleased infinitely more than his introducer. The pleasure arising from this adventure excited in Corneille a talent which had hitherto been unknown to him, and he attempted, as if it were by inspiration, dramatic poetry. On this little subject, he wrote his comedy of Melite, in 1625. At that moment the French drama was at a low ebb: the most favorable ideas were formed of our juvenile poet, and comedy, it was expected, would now reach its perfection. After the tumult of approbation had ceased, the critics thought that Melite was too simple and barren of incident. Angered by this criticism, our poet wrote his Clitandre, and in that piece has scattered incidents and adventures with such a licentious profusion, that the critics say, he wrote it rather to expose the public taste than to accommodate himself to it. In this piece the persons combat on the theatre: there are murders and assassinations; heroines fight; officers appear in search of murderers; and women are disguised as men. There is matter sufficient for a romance of ten volumes. "And yet," says a French critic, "nothing can be more cold and tiresome."

562. DR. KENRICK AS CRITIC.

The caustic Dr. Kenrick was once, during several years, in his London Review, one of the great disturbers of literary repose. The turn of his criticism, the airiness or the asperity of his sarcasm, the arrogance with which he treated some great authors, would prove very amusing, and serve to display a certain talent of criticism. He was a man of talent, and could make his own malignity look like wit, and turn the wit of others into absurdity, by placing it topsy-turvy; as thus, when he attacked the Traveller of Goldsmith, which he called "a flimsy poem," he discussed the subject as a grave political pamphlet, condemning the whole system, as raised on false principles. The Deserted Village was sneeringly pronounced to be "pretty;" but then it had "neither fancy, dignity, genius, nor fire." When he reviewed Johnson's Tour to the Hebrides, he decreed that the whole book was written "by one who had seen but little," and, therefore, could not be very interesting. His virulent attack on Johnson's Shakspeare may be preserved for its total want of literary decency; and his Love in the Suds, a Town Eclogue, where he has placed Garrick with an infamous character, may be useful to show how far witty malignity will advance in the violation of moral decency. He libelled all the genius of the age, and was proud of doing it. In one of his own publications he quotes, with great self-complacency, the following lines on himself:—

"The wits who drink water and suck sugar-candy
Impute the strong spirit of Kenrick to brandy.
They are not so much out; the matter in short is,
He sips aqua-vita and spits aqua-fortis."

Johnson and Akenside preserved a stern silence; but poor Goldsmith, the child of nature, could not resist attempting to execute martial law, by caning the critic; for which being blamed, he published a defence of himself in the papers.

563. JOHNSON, MRS. MONTAGUE, AND OTHERS.

"Johnson's harsh censure of Mrs. Montague's Essay on Shakspeare," says Dr. Beattie, "does not surprise me; for I have heard him speak contemptuously of it. It is, for all that, one of the best, most original, and most elegant pieces of criticism in our language, or in any other. Johnson had many of the talents of a critic; but his want of temper, his violent prejudices, and something, I am afraid, of an envious turn of mind, often made him an unfair one. Mrs. Montague was very kind to him; but Mrs. Montague has more wit than any body; and Johnson could not bear that any person should be thought to have wit but himself. Even Lord Chesterfield, and, what is more strange, even Mr. Burke, he would not allow to have wit. He preferred Smollett to Fielding. He would not grant that Armstrong's poem of Health, or the tragedy of Douglas, had any merit. He told me that he never read Milton through till he was obliged to do it, in order to gather words for his dictionary. He spoke very peevishly of the Masque of Comus; and when I urged that there was a great deal of exquisite poetry in it, 'Yes,' said he, 'but it is like gold hid under a rock;' to which I made no reply; for, indeed, I did not well understand it."

564. ADDISON AND BLANK VERSE.

Addison was not a good-natured man, and was very jealous of rivals. Being one evening in company with Philips, and the poems of Blenheim and the Campaign being talked of, he made it his whole business to run down blank verse. Philips never spoke till between eleven and twelve o'clock, nor even then would he do it in his defence. It was at Jacob Tonson's; and a gentleman in the company ended the dispute by asking Jacob what poem he ever got the most by. Jacob immediately named Milton's Paradise Lost.

565. THE EDITOR CRITIC OF THE AMERICAN QUARTERLY REVIEW.

When the American Quarterly Review, of Philadelphia, was in its maturity, the reputation of Lord Byron was at its height. They who once blamed had become eulogists; the best intelligences of both hemispheres were warmed by his genius, and vocal in his praise. But the profound reviewer, who managed the poetical department, cared for none of these things. He expressed great commiseration for the noble poet. He speaks of him in his work as a man "whose heavy volumes of stanzas have pestered the world; a mere titled rhymester; the author of a mass of hobbling, teeth-grinding poetry; the major portions of whose writings possess not the smallest particle of the soul of poetry;" and after an assortment of criticisms quite equal to the foregoing, he lumps the merits of Byron in the following summary passage: "That in the multiplicity of his lordship's writings we should, by dint of industrious research, discover some easy-flowing passages and brilliant ideas, is not much to his credit, for we can find the same things in the dull heroics of Sir Richard Blackmore." Finally, Byron is advised by our Aristarchus, in 1824, to quit poetry, wherein he is so deficient, and turn his attention to prose, in which he might hope for decent success.

Nothing seems to have yielded this critic more unequalled delight than the death of Lord Byron. It gave a clearer field for his publications; it "left the world for him to bustle in." His ecstasies on hearing of that sad event were irrepressible. He came forth with a Te Deum in his Review, from which we make a few extracts. "Woe, now," saith he, "to these wittings,—the admirers of Byron,—who have neither ears to discover harmony, nor skill to count numbers; who mistake rhymes for wit: the great Dagon of their idolatry is no more! Well may they raise the ul-ul-loo; he who bullied the crowd into the reading of bad English, who inflicted upon men of good taste the penance of perusing hobbling numbers and false rhymes, has withdrawn from the scene of his exploits! Bellow forth, ye rugged verse-lovers, till ye split your lungs with lamentations! Stiff, unwieldy couplets, or barbarous Spenserians, made the vehicles of unnatural quaintness or affected originality of ideas, have no longer a sprig of nobility to dignify them, or give them attraction to the unreflecting multitude."

Our reviewer's opinions of Sir Walter Scott—a gentleman of Abbotsford, North Britain, who wrote some novels and poetry—are kindred with those he entertained of Lord Byron. He speaks of him as "an unknown Scotchman;" and of certain Waverley Novels—that received by far the most praise on their appearance, and continue to be cherished with fond admiration by every reader of taste—as "slovenly and insipid productions, abounding with affected sentimentality, blackguards, and scoundrels, common as thistles in a Scotch glen, with sheepish heroes, footballs to every one that might choose to kick them." These "blundering works," he condemns in toto; calls "disgraceful literary manufactures, commonplace, and stupidly constructed." In conclusion, he gave it as his candid opinion, that "the sooner Sir Walter Scott ceased to write, the better for himself and the public. This reader, was when the author of Waverley was covered with renown, and after he had produced some of his most immortal productions.

He speaks of Geoffrey Crayon, our Washington Irving, as a scribbler of "skip-along, trim the hop, popinjay prose; whose Sketch Book abounds with heavy, disagreeable matter, betraying throughout little merit but imitation." Those portions which the world has decided to be the best and most graphic are pronounced "absolutely silly, fit only for the pages of twopenny primers, to amuse children. What information do they convey? What impression do they make?" and adds, "We cannot see their value." He confesses that they are popular and successful; but he imputes the cause to the bribery and corruption of the Edinburgh and London reviewers, by the booksellers, to help Irving along.

Next to Washington Irving, in the condemnatory estimation of our critic, comes James Fennimore Cooper, who seems a peculiarly obnoxious culprit in the view of his judge. Fearful that Cooper would supplant some of his own sublime novels, then in process of manufacture, he pounced upon his rival right greedily. He condemned the Pioneers at once, by calling it "unwieldy, slovenly, ungrammatical, and insufferable;" and "as a story, entirely destitute of interest." The Pilot suffered very nearly the same fate. These works, however, yet survive, and the reputation of the author has recovered in a measure from the cruel and awful blow thus bestowed upon its integrity. The popular poets of the Union did not escape the visitations of our reviewer. He finished Halleck in a few words, by pronouncing him an inveterate doggerelist; "a man capable of throwing the most common and contemptible ideas into metre." Percival suffers in the same pillory. So great is the furor of the critic in relation to this gentleman, that he delivers himself in verse; but as it is profane, the reader will excuse its quotation.

566. OPERA CRITIC.

At the opera, a lady was very much disturbed with the noisy talk of an illiterate critic, and at last observed to him with some pique, that it was disagreeable to her. "Well," said he, "you need not eat one up for a thing of so little account." "You need not fear that," said the lady, "as I am a Jewess, and do not eat pork."

567. DISHONEST CRITICS.

Some years since, an elaborate essay appeared upon the merits and blemishes of Mrs. Centlivier's Busybody. Many of the strictures were marked by considerable dramatic knowledge and good taste; then followed some rather severe censures upon the principal male performers, and a furious attack upon Mrs. Marshall, who acted Miranda extremely well, and was a general favorite. She was assailed as wanting beauty of face, and elegance of person and manners; in short, every requisite for the character — all of which, it was said, were possessed by Mrs. Wood, in her late representation of the part. The manager was very sharply handled for having removed the latter lady from the part, and substituted so inadequate a representative. It so fell out that Mrs. W. never in her life had appeared in the character, and Mrs. Marshall had been its invariable representative. This was respectfully stated and proved to the editor, who was ungenerous and unjust enough to refuse all correction of the misstatement. One of the ablest written critiques ever published in Philadelphia, upon the play of Richard III., contained the bitterest condemnation of the performer, who actually played Buckingham, for his execrably dull performance and combat as Richmond. The same writer, not a week after, occu-in Hamlet, while he was confined to his bed, and the part read by another person. No apology or explanation, in either of these cases, was ever offered. Can we wonder, then, that both audience and actors treat critical notices of the drama with indifference and suspicion?

568. DISAPPOINTED AUTHOR.

A disappointed author, indulging in a vein of abuse against a successful rival, exclaimed, "He is, without exception, the most superficial, self-sufficient, ignorant, shallow creature that ever made any pretensions to literature." "Gently, my dear sir," interrupted a gentleman; "you quite forget yourself."

§ 62. REMARKABLE CRITICISMS BY NOTED MEN.

569. RACINE'S JUDGMENT.

Louis XIV. candidly confessed his ignorance upon literary subjects. He one day asked Racine what French writer had done most honor to his reign.

Racine replied, "Molière, sire."

"I did not think so," said Louis; "but you are a much better judge of his merits than I am."

570. JOHNSON AND FREDERIC THE GREAT.

Sir Thomas Robinson, sitting with Johnson, said that the King of Prussia valued himself upon three things — upon being a hero, a musician, and an author. "Pretty well, sir," said Johnson, "for one man. As to his being an author, I have not looked at his poetry; but his prose is poor stuff. He writes just as you may suppose Voltaire's footboy to do, who had been his amanuensis. He has such parts as the valet might have, and about as much of the coloring of the style as might be got by transcribing his works."

When Boswell was at Ferney, he repeated this to Voltaire, in order to reconcile him somewhat to Johnson, whom he, in affecting the English mode of expression, had previously characterized as "a superstitious dog;" but after hearing such a criticism on Frederic the Great, with whom he was then on bad terms, he exclaimed, "An honest fellow!"

571. DR. CHALMERS — BUTLER'S ANALOGY.

In the memoir of Dr. Chalmers, inserted in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, it is said that on one occasion, when some person present was animadverting upon the wealth of the church of England, and gave as an example of its over-abundance the revenues of the see of Durham, the doctor exclaimed with characteristic eagerness, —

"Sir, if all that has been received for the bishopric of Durham, since the foundation of the see, were set down as payment for Butler's Analogy, I should esteem it as a cheap purchase."

§ 63. CRITICS AND AUTHORS IN CONFLICT.

572. BAYLE AND PERE MAIMBOURG.

Bayle's Critique générale de l'Histoire du Calvinisme, par le Père Maimbourg, had more pleasantry than bitterness, except to the palate of the vindictive father, who was of too hot a constitution to relish the delicacy of our author's wit. Maimbourg stirred up all the intrigues he could rouse to get the Critique burnt by the hangman at Paris. The lieutenant of the police, De la Reynie, who was among the many who did not dislike to see the father corrected by Bayle, delayed this execution from time to time, till there came a final order. This lieutenant of the police was a shrewd fellow, and wishing to put an odium on the bigoted Maimbourg, allowed the irascible father to write the proclamation himself with all the violence of an enraged author. It is a curious specimen of one who evidently wished to burn his brother with his book. In this curious proclamation, which has been preserved as a literary curiosity, Bayle's Critique is declared to be defamatory and calumnious, abounding with seditious forgeries, pernicious to all good subjects, and therefore is condemned to be torn to pieces, and burnt at the Place de Grève. All printers and booksellers are forbidden to print, or to sell, or disperse the said abominable book, under pain of death; and all other persons, of what quality or condition soever, are to undergo the penalty of exemplary punishment. De la Reynie must have smiled on submissively receiving this effusion from our enraged author; and to punish Maimbourg in the only way he could contrive, and to do at the same time the greatest kindness to Bayle, whom he admired, he dispersed three thousand copies of this proclamation to be posted up through Paris. The alarm and the curiosity were simultaneous; but the latter prevailed. Every book collector hastened to procure a copy so terribly denounced, and at the same time so amusing. The author of the Livres condamnés au feu might have inserted this anecdote in his collection. It may be worth adding, that Maimbourg always affected to say that he had never read Bayle's work; but he afterwards confessed to Menage, that he could not help valuing a book of cious to all good subjects, and therefore is condemned to be torn to pieces, and burnt at the Place de Grève. All printers and booksellers are forbidden to print, or to sell, or disperse the said abominable book, under pain of death; and all other persons, of what quality or condition soever, are to undergo the penalty of exemplary punishment. De la Reynie must have smiled on submissively receiving this effusion from our enraged author; and to punish Maimbourg in the only way he could contrive, and to do at the same time the greatest kindness to Bayle, whom he admired, he dispersed three thousand copies of this proclamation to be posted up through Paris. The alarm and the curiosity were simultaneous; but the latter prevailed. Every book collector hastened to procure a copy so terribly denounced, and at the same time so amusing. The author of the Livres condamnés au feu might have inserted this anecdote in his collection. It may be worth adding, that Maimbourg always affected to say that he had never read Bayle's work; but he afterwards confessed to Menage, that he could not help valuing a book of such curiosity. Jurieu was so jealous of its success, that Beauval attributes his personal hatred of Bayle to our young philosopher overshadowing that veteran.

573. SOUTHEY AND THE IRISHMAN.

Robert Southey.

"Mr. Southey," says Cottle, "mentioned to me, the last time I saw him, the jeopardy in which he had recently been placed through his 'killing off;' and from which danger he was alone saved by his anonymous garb. He said he had found it necessary, in reviewing a book written by a native of the Emerald Isle, to treat it with rather unwonted severity, such as it richly deserved. A few days after the critique had appeared, he happened to call on a literary friend, in one of the inns of court. They were conversing on this work, and the incompetence of the writer, when the author, a gigantic Irishman, entered the room, in a great rage, and vowing vengeance against the remorseless critic. Standing very near Mr. Southey, he raised his huge fist, and exclaimed, 'And if I knew who it was, I'd bate him!' Mr. S. observed a very profound silence, and, not liking the vicinity of a volcano, quietly retired, reserving his laugh for a less hazardous occasion."

574. CRITICIZED POET.

An indifferent poet, who had been severely handled by the critics, yet continued to go on publishing his crudities, said one day to an acquaintance, that he had found out a way to be revenged of his reviewers, and that was by laughing at them. "Do you so?" said the other; "then let me tell you, you lead the merriest life of any man in Christendom."

575. THE AUTHOR AND THE REVIEW.

An author, whose works had been severely criticized in one of the reviews, assured a friend that he wished, of all things, to write down the review. "Then write in it," said his friend.

576. PHÆDRUS.

There is sense and infinite humor in the mode which Phædrus adopted to answer the cavillers of his age. When he first published his Fables, the taste for conciseness and simplicity was so much on the decline that they were both objected to him as faults. He used his critics as they deserved. To those who objected against the conciseness of his style, he tells a long, tedious story, (Lib. iii. Fab. 10, ver. 53.) and treats those who condemn the simplicity of his style with a run of bombast verses, that have a great many noisy, elevated words in them, without any sense at the bottom. (Lib. iv. Fab. 6.)

577. DENNIS AND POPE.

Pope was pursued through life by the insatiable vengeance of Dennis. The young poet, who had got introduced to him among his first literary acquaintances, could not fail, when the occasion presented itself, of ridiculing this uncouth son of Aristotle. The blow was given in the character of Appius, in the Art of Criticism; and it is known that Appius was instantly recognized by the fierce shriek of the agonized critic himself. From that moment, Dennis resolved to write down every work of Pope's. How dangerous to offend certain tempers verging on madness! Dennis, too, called on every one to join him in the common cause; and once he retaliated on Pope in his own way. Accused by Pope of being the writer of an account of himself, in Jacob's Lives of the Poets, Dennis procured a letter from Jacob, which he published, and in which it appears that Pope's own character, in this collection, if not written by him, was by him very carefully corrected on the proof-sheet; so that he stood in the same ridiculous attitude into which he had thrown Dennis, as his own trumpeter. Dennis, whose brutal energy remained unsubdued, was a rhinoceros of a critic, shelled up against the shafts of wit. This monster of criticism awed the poet; and Dennis proved to be a Python, whom the golden shaft of Apollo could not pierce.

578. LIFE AND CHARACTER OF DENNIS.

Dennis, a contemporary of Pope, attained to the ambiguous honor of being distinguished as "the Critic." In his own day, party, for some time, kept him alive; the art of criticism was a novelty at that period of our literature. He flattered some great men, and he abused three of the greatest. This was one mode of securing popularity; because, by this contrivance, he divided the town into two parties. And the irascibility and satire of Pope and Swift were not less serviceable to him than the partial panegyrics of Dryden and Congreve. Steele, describing him, says, —

"His motion is quick and sudden; turning on all sides, with a suspicion of every object, as if he had done or feared some extraordinary mischief. You see wickedness in his meaning, but folly of countenance that betrays him to be unfit for the execution of it. He has the face and surliness of a mastiff, which has often saved him from being treated like a cur, till some, more sagacious than ordinary, found his nature, and used him accordingly. Unhappy being! terrible without, fearful within! Not a wolf in sheep's clothing, but a sheep in a wolf's."

Even in his old age, his native brutality never forsook him. Thomson and Pope charitably supported the veteran Zoius at a benefit play; and Savage, who had nothing but a verse to give, returned them very poetical thanks in the name of Dennis. He was then blind and old; but his critical ferocity had no old age. His surliness overcame every grateful sense, and he swore, as usual, "They could be no one's but that fool, Savage's!" an evidence of his sagacity and brutality.

There is an epigram on Dennis, by Savage, which Johnson has preserved in his Life; and a very correct likeness, although Johnson censures Savage for writing an epigram on Dennis, while he was living in great familiarity with the critic. Perhaps that was the happiest moment to write the epigram. The anecdote in the text doubtless prompted "the fool" to take this fair revenge and just chastisement. Savage has brought out the features strongly in these touches:—

"Say, what revenge on Dennis can be had,
Too full for laughter, for reply too mad?
On one so poor you cannot take the law;
On one so old your sword you scorn to draw.
Uncaged, then, let the harmless monster rage,
Secure in dulness, madness, want, and age!"

§ 64. CRITICS TURNING AUTHORS.

579. CHAPELAIN'S PUCELLE.

Chapelain's unfortunate epic has rendered him notorious. He had gained, and not undeservedly, great reputation for his critical powers. After a retention of above thirty years, his Pucelle appeared. He immediately became the butt of every unfledged wit, and his former works were eternally condemned; inasmuch that when Camusat published, after the death of our author, a little volume of extracts from his manuscript letters, it is curious to observe the awkward situation in which he finds himself. In his preface, he seems afraid that the very name of Chapelain, will be sufficient to repel the reader.

Camusat observes of Chapelain, that "he found flatterers who assured him his Pucelle ranked above the Æneid; and this Chapelain but feebly denied. However this may be, it would be difficult to make the bad taste which reigns throughout this poem agree with that sound and exact criticism with which he decided on the works of others. So true is it that genius is very superior to a justness of mind which is sufficient to judge and to advise others." Chapelain was ordered to draw up a critical list of the chief living authors and men of letters in France for the king. 'It is extremely impartial, and performed with an analytical skill of their literary characters which could not have been surpassed by an Aristotle or a Boileau.

580. ABBÉ D'AUBIGNAC.

Boileau opens his Art of Poetry by a precept which, though it be common, is always important. This critical poet declares that "it is in vain a daring author thinks of attaining to the height of Parnassus, if he does not feel the secret influence of heaven, and if his natal star has not formed him to be a poet." This observation he founded on the character of the Abbé d'Aubignac, who had excellently written on the economy of dramatic composition. His Pratique du Théâtre gained him an extensive reputation. When he produced a tragedy, the world expected a finished piece. It was acted and reprobated. The author, however, did not acutely feel its bad reception. He every where boasted that he, of all the dramatists, had most scrupulously observed the rules of Aristotle. The Prince de Guéné, famous for his repartees, sarcastically observed, "I do not quarrel with the Abbé d'Aubignac for having so closely followed the precepts of Aristotle; but I cannot pardon the precepts of Aristotle that occasioned the Abbé d'Aubignac to write so wretched a tragedy."

§ 65. EFFECTS OF SEVERITY IN CRITICISM.

581. L'ETOILLE AND THE YOUNG BARD.

Pelisson has recorded, in his History of the French Academy, a literary anecdote, which forcibly shows the danger of caustic criticism. A young man, from a remote province, went to Paris with a play which he considered as a masterpiece. M. L'Etoile was more than just in his merciless criticism. He showed the youthful bard a thousand glaring defects in his chef d'œuvre. The humbled country author burnt his tragedy, returned home, took to his chamber, and died of vexation and grief.

582. SUFFERINGS OF MARSHAM, POPE, AND OTHERS.

Sir John Marsham, having published the first part of his Chronology, suffered so much chagrin at the endless controversies which it raised, (and some of his critics went so far as to affirm it was designed to be detrimental to revelation,) that he burnt the second part, which was ready for the press.

Pope was observed to writhe with anguish in his chair, on hearing mentioned the letter of Cibber, with other temporary attacks; and it is said of Montesquieu, that he was so much affected by the criticisms, true and false, which he daily experienced, that they contributed to hasten his death.

Ritson's extreme irritability closed in lunacy, while his ignorant reviewers, in the shape of assassins, were haunting his death bed. In the preface to his Metrical Romances, he says, "Brought to an end in ill health and low spirits—certain to be insulted by a base and prostitute gang of lurking assassins, who stab in the dark, and whose poisoned he has already experienced."

of Amwell, never recovered from a Indicrous criticism which had been written by a physician who never pretended to poetical taste.

583. BISHOP NEWTON AND HAWKESWORTH.

So sensible was even the calm Bishop Newton to critical attacks, that Whiston tells us he lost his favor, which he had enjoyed for twenty years, for contradicting Newton in his old age; for no man was of "a more fearful temper." Whiston declares that he would not have thought proper to have published his work against Newton's Chronology in his lifetime, "because I knew his temper so well, that I should have expected it would have killed him; as Dr. Bentley, Bishop Stillingfleet's chaplain, told me that he believed Mr. Locke's thorough confutation of the bishop's metaphysics about the Trinity hastened his end." Dr. Hawkesworth died of criticism. Singing birds cannot live in a storm.

584. RACINE CRITICIZED.

Racine encountered much criticism, which rendered him very unhappy. He told his son, in after years, that he suffered far more pain from the faults found with his productions than he ever experienced pleasure from their success. His avowal at once displays the innate weakness of the man.

§ 66. PREPOSTEROUS, RUDE, OR ILL-JUDGED CRITICISM.

585. CORNEILLE'S POLYEUCTE.

The Polyeucte of Corneille, which is now accounted to be his masterpiece, when he read it to the literary assembly held at the Hotel de Rambouillet, was not approved. Voiture came the next day, and, in gentle terms, acquainted him with the unfavorable opinion of the critics. Such ill judges were then the most fashionable wits of France.

586. JOHNSON AND THE POETESS.

"When last in Lichfield," says Anna Seward, "Johnson told me that a lady in London once sent him a poem which she had written, and afterwards desired to know his opinion of it. 'Madam, I have not cut the leaves. I did not even peep between them.' He met her again in company, and she again asked him after the 'trash.' He made no reply, and began talking to another person. The next time they met, she asked him if he had yet read her poem. He answered, 'No, madam, nor ever intend to!' Shocked at the unfeeling rudeness he thus recorded of himself, I replied, that I was surprised any person should obtrude their writings upon his attention; adding, that if I could write as well as Milton or Gray, I should think the best fate to be desired for my compositions was exemption from his notice. I expected a sharp sarcasm in return, but he only rolled his large head in silence.

"Johnson told me once, he 'would hang a dog that read the Lycidas of Milton twice.' 'What, then,' replied I, 'must become of me, who can say it by heart, and who often repeat it to myself with a delight which grows by what it feeds upon?' 'Die!' returned the growler, 'in a surfeit of bad taste.' Thus it was that the wit and aweless impoliteness of the stupendous creature bore down by storm every barrier which reason attempted to rear against his injustice."

587. DAVIES ON POPE.

The celebrated Myles Davies, in his Icon Libellorum, or a Critical History of Pamphlets, has a strange medley of remarks in reference to Pope, the poet, which we copy for the amusement of our readers.

"Another class of pamphlets, written by Roman Catholics, is that of poems, written chiefly by A Pope, himself a gentleman of that name. He passed always amongst most of his acquaintance for what is commonly called a whig; for it seems the Romish politicians are divided, as well as Popish missionaries. However, one Esdras, an apothecary, as he qualifies himself, has published a piping-hot pamphlet against Mr. Pope's Rape of the Lock, which he entitles, a Key to the Lock, wherewith he pretends to unlock nothing less than a plot carried on by Mr. Pope, in that poem, against the last and this present ministry and government."

588. LORD HOLLAND.

The Vicar of Wakefield remained unnoticed, and was attacked by the reviews, until Lord Holland, who had been ill, sent to his bookseller for some amusing book. This was sent, and he was so pleased that he spoke of it in the highest terms to a large company who dined with him a few days after. The consequence was, that the whole impression was sold off in a few days.

589. COLMAN'S INKLE AND YARICO.

When Colman read his admirable opera of Inkle and Yarico to Dr. Moseley, the doctor made no remark during the progress of the piece; and, when it was concluded, he was asked what he thought of it. "It won't do," said the doctor; "stuff, nonsense!" Every body else having been delighted with it, this decided disapprobation puzzled the circle. He was asked why. "I'll tell you why," answered the critic. "You say, in the finale, —

'Now let us dance and sing,
While all Barbadoes' bells shall ring.'

It won't do — there is but one bell in the whole island."

590. STUART AND THE DISSATISFIED HUSBAND.

A gentleman who had married a wealthy, but rather homely-looking lady, presented himself with his bride to Stuart, requesting the gifted artist to paint the portraits of both. Stuart undertook the task; but when it was finished, the gentleman found considerable fault with the likeness of his wife. The truth was, it was too perfect a copy of the original; the deficiency of beauty in her face he had got over by the help of her wealth, but it ill comported with his fancy to have the deficiency so fully revealed on canvas. This was not said; but Stuart understood the difficulty, and with forbearance quite different from his earlier years, he promised to make an effort to improve the picture. The gentleman called to see it subsequently, but still he hesitated some dissatisfaction. Stuart, no longer able to endure the man's treatment, rose, and, pacing up and down in his studio in anger and vexation, broke out into a soliloquy: "What a miserable life the artist's is! Worried to death with the absurd demands and cavils of his patrons! Here a man brings me a potato, and expects me to make a peach of it!"

§ 67. MISCELLANEOUS.

591. EDITORS AND ACTORS.

"My brother John," says Leigh Hunt, "at the beginning of the year 1805, set up a paper, called the News, and I went to live with him in Brydges Street, and write the theatricals in it.

"It was the custom, at that time, for editors of papers to be intimate with actors and dramatists. They were often proprietors, as well as editors; and, in that case, it was not expected that they should escape the usual intercourse, or wish to do so. It was thought a feather in the cap of all parties; and with their feathers they tickled one another. The newspaper man had consequence in the green-room, and plenty of tickets for his friends; and he dined at amusing tables. The dramatist secured a good-natured critique in his journal, sometimes got it written himself, or, according to Mr. Reynolds, was even himself the author of it. The actor, if he was of any eminence, stood upon the same ground of reciprocity; and not to know a pretty actress would have been a want of the knowing in general. Upon new performers, and upon writers not yet introduced, a journalist was more impartial; and sometimes, where the proprietor was in one interest more than another, or for some personal reason grew offended with an actor, or set of actors, a criticism would occasionally be hostile, and even severe. An editor, too, would now and then suggest to his employer the policy of exercising a freer authority, and obtain influence enough with him to show symptoms of it. I believe Bell's editor, who was more clever, was also more impartial than most critics; though the publisher of the British Theatre, and patron of the Della Cruscans, must have been hampered with literary intimacies. The best chance for an editor, who wished to have any thing like an opinion of his own, was the appearance of a rival newspaper with a strong theatrical connection. Influence was here threatened with diminution. It was to be held up on other grounds; and the critic was permitted to find out that a bad play was not good, or an actress's petticoat of the lawful dimensions.

"Puffing and plenty of tickets were, however, the system of the day.

"It was an interchange of amenities over the dinner-table; a flattery of power on the one side, and puns on the other; and what the public took for a criticism on a play, was a draft upon the box-office, or reminiscences of last Thursday's salmon and lobster-sauce. The custom was, to write as short and as favorable a paragraph on the new piece as could be; to say that Bannister was 'excellent,' and Mrs. Jordan 'charming;' to notice the 'crowded house,' or invent it if necessary; and to conclude by observing, that 'the whole went off with éclat.' For the rest, it was a critical religion in those times to admire Mr. Kemble; and at the period in question Master Betty had appeared, and been hugged to the hearts of the town as the young Roscus."

592. THE HATTER'S SIGN.

A journeyman hatter, a companion of Dr. Franklin, on commencing business for himself, was anxious to get a handsome sign-board, with a proper inscription. This he composed himself, as follows: "John Thompson, hatter, makes and sells hats for ready money," with the figure of a hat subjoined. But he thought he would submit it to his friends for their amendments. The first he showed it to thought the word hatter tautologous, because followed by the words "makes hats," which showed he was a hatter. It was struck out. The next observed, that the word "makes" might as well be omitted, because his customers would not care who made the hats; if good, and to their mind, they would buy, by whomsoever made. He struck that out also. A third said, he thought the words "for ready money" were useless; as it was not the custom of the place to sell on credit, every one who purchased expected to pay. These, too, were parted with, and the inscription then stood, "John Thompson sells hats." "Sells hats!" says his next friend; "why, who expects you to give them away? What, then, is the use of the word?" It was struck out, and hats was all that remained attached to the name of John Thompson. Even this inscription, brief as it was, was reduced ultimately to "John Thompson," with the figure of a hat subjoined.

593. CANON OF CRITICISM.

The Cardinal de Retz asked Menage one day to give him some idea of poetry, that he might be able to form a sort of judgment of the mass that was brought to him. "Sir," said Menage, "this is a matter that would occupy more time than you could spare; but I'll tell you what you may do: whenever they read any of your poems to you, say at a venture, 'That's very bad!'—you'll seldom be wrong."

594. A MATHEMATICIAN'S CRITICISM.

A dramatic writer, whose last play had been a good deal applauded, was informed that on a particular night a great philosopher and mathematician was to be present at his performance. "This," said the author, "is the man for me: I shall long to hear what he says of my play—the opinion of such a judge will be really worth having." The mathematician took his seat in the centre of the pit; and when the performance was over, the author was most anxious to have his opinion of the piece. "I find," said the philosopher, "that Siddons has pronounced 3284, Kemble 2864 words," &c.; and this was the sole reply the mortified dramatist could obtain.

595. SHERIDAN'S FORMULA.

Sheridan had a very convenient formula for getting rid of all the new publications that were constantly sent him: "Dear sir, I have received your exquisite work, and I have no doubt I shall be highly delighted after I have read it."

596. A DINNER WITH SCOTT AND JEFFREY.

"There were only a few people besides the two lions, and assuredly I have seldom passed a more agreeable day. A thousand subjects of literature, antiquities, and manners were started; and I was much struck, as you may well suppose, by the extent, correctness, discrimination, and accuracy of Jeffrey's information; equally so with his taste, acuteness, and wit in dissecting every book, author, and story that came in our way. Nothing could surpass the variety of his knowledge, but the easy rapidity of his manner of producing it. He was then in his meridian. Scott delighted to draw him out—delighted also to talk himself, and displayed, I think, even a larger range of anecdote and illustration; remembering every thing, whether true or false, that was characteristic or impressive—every thing that was good, or lovely, or lively. It struck me that there was this great difference: Jeffrey, for the most part, entertained us, when books were under discussion, with the detection of faults, blunders, absurdities, or plagiarisms. Scott took up the matter where he left it, recalled some compensating beauty or excellence for which no credit had been allowed, and by the recitation, perhaps, of one fine stanza, set the poor victim on his legs again."

597. DYING GRAMMARIAN.

Père Bouhours was a French grammarian, who had been justly accused of paying too scrupulous an attention to the minutiae of letters. He was more solicitous of his words than his thoughts. It is said, that when he was dying, he called out to his friends, (a correct grammarian to the last,) "Je vas, ou je vais mourir; l'un ou l'autre se dit!"

598. DYING CRITICISM OF MALHERBE.

When Malherbe was dying, he reprimanded his nurse for making use of a solecism in her language! And when his confessor represented to him the felicities of a future state in low and trite expressions, the dying critic interrupted him: "Hold your tongue," he said, "your wretched style only makes me out of conceit with them!"

§ 68. DEATH OF NOTED GENIUSES.

599. HERDER, WALTER, TASSO, AND OTHERS.

Herder closed his career writing an ode to the Deity, his pen on the last line. Walter died repeating some lines of Virgil. Tasso's last request of Cardinal Cynthia was indicative of the gloom which haunted him through life. He had one favor, he said, to request of him, which was, that he would collect his works and commit them to the flames, especially his Jerusalem Delivered. Liebnitz was found dead in his chamber with a book in his hand. Clarendon's pen dropped from his fingers when he was seized with the palsy, which terminated his life. Wicherley, when dying, had his young wife brought to his bedside, and having taken her hand, in a very solemn manner said he had but one request to make of her, and that was, that she would never marry an old man again.

600. CHAUCER, PETRARCH, QUIN, ROUSSEAU, AND OTHERS.

Sir Thomas More remarked to the executioner, by whose hands he was to perish, that the scaffold was extremely weak. "I pray you see me up safe," said he, "and for my coming down let me shift for myself."

Chaucer breathed his last while composing a ballad. His last production is called, A Ballad made by Geoffrey Chaucer, on his Death-bed, lying in great Pain.

"I could wish this tragic scene were over," said

Quin, the actor; "but I hope to go through it with becoming dignity."

Petrarch was found dead in his library, leaning on a book.

Rousseau, when dying, ordered his attendants to remove him and place him before the window, that he might look upon his garden and gladden his eyes with the sight of nature. How ardent an admirer he was of nature is poetically told in Zimmerman's Solitude.

Pope tells us he found Sir Godfrey Kneller (when he visited him a few days prior to his end) sitting up and forming plans for his own monument. His vanity was conspicuous even in death!

Warren has remarked, that Chesterfield's good breeding only left him with death. "Give Drysdale a chair," said he to his valet, when that person was announced.

Bayle, when dying, pointed to the place where his proof-sheet was deposited.

Bede died while in the act of dictating.

Roscommon, when expiring, quoted from his own translations of the Dies Irae.

When the priest whom Alfieri had been prevailed on to see came, he requested him to call to-morrow: "Death; I trust, will tarry four and twenty hours."

601. DEATH OF WILLIAM PITT.

Pitt died at a solitary house on Wimbledon Common. Not far off, by the roadside, stood, and still stands, a small country inn, where the various parties interested in the great statesman's life were accustomed to apply for information, and leave their horses and carriages. On the morning of the 23d of January, 1806, an individual having called at the inn, and not being able to obtain a satisfactory reply to his inquiries, proceeded to the house of Pitt. He knocked, but no servant appeared; he opened the door and entered, he found no one in attendance; he proceeded from room to room, and at length entered the sick chamber, where, on a bed, in silence and in perfect solitude, he found, to his unspeakable surprise, the dead body of that great statesman who had so lately wielded the power of England, and influenced, if he did not control, the destinies of the world. We doubt whether any much more awful example of the lot of mortality has ever been witnessed.

602. THE RULING PASSION STRONG IN DEATH.

Alonzo Cano, a Spanish artist, may be literally said to have felt the ruling passion strong in death; for, when the priest who attended him presented the crucifix, he turned his eyes away, and refused to look at it, because the sculpture was so badly executed, but asked for a plain cross, which being brought to him, he devoutly embraced it and expired.

603. LAST MOMENTS OF COPERNICUS

Copernicus, says Everett, after harboring in his bosom for long, long years that pernicious heresy, — the solar system, — died on the day of the appearance of his book from the press. The closing scene of his life, with a little help from the imagination, would furnish a noble subject for an artist. For thirty-five years he has revolved and matured in his mind his system of the heavens. A natural mildness of disposition, bordering on timidity, a reluctance to encounter controversy, and a dread of persecution, have led him to withhold his work from the press, and to make known his system but to a few confidential friends and disciples. At length he draws near his end; he is seventy-three years of age, and he yields his work on the "revolutions of the heavenly orbs" to his friends for publication. The day at last has come on which it is to be ushered into the world. It is the 24th of May, 1543. On that day, — the effect, no doubt, of the intense excitement of his mind operating upon an exhausted frame, — an effusion of blood brings him to the gates of the grave. His last hour is come; he lies stretched upon the couch from which he will never rise, in his apartment at the Canonry at Frauenberg, in East Prussia. The beams of the setting sun glance through the Gothic windows of his chamber; near his bedside is the armillary sphere, which he has contrived to represent his theory of the heavens; his picture painted by himself, the amusement of his earlier years, hangs before him; beneath it his astrolabe and other imperfect astronomical instruments; and around him are gathered his sorrowing disciples. The door of the apartment opens; the eye of the departing sage is turned to see who enters; it is a friend who brings him the first printed copy of his immortal treatise. He knows that in that book he contradicts all that had ever been distinctly taught by former philosophers; he knows that he has rebelled against the sway of Ptolemy, which the scientific world had acknowledged for a thousand years; he knows that the popular mind will be shocked by his innovations; he knows that the attempt will be made to press even religion into the service against him; but he knows that his book is true. He is dying, but he leaves a glorious truth, as his dying bequest, to the world. He bids the friend who has brought it place himself between the window and his bedside, that the sun's rays may fall upon the precious volume and he may behold it once before his eye grows dim. He looks upon it, takes it in his hands, presses it to his breast, and expires. But no, he is not wholly gone. A smile lights up his dying countenance; a beam of returning intelligence kindles in his eye; his lips move; and the friend who leans over him can hear him faintly murmur the beautiful sentiments which the Christian lyrist of a later age has so finely expressed in verse: —

"Ye golden lamps of heaven, farewell, with all your feeble light!
Farewell, thou ever-changing moon, pale empress of the night!
And thou, refulgent orb of day, in brighter flames arrayed,
My soul, which springs beyond thy sphere, no more demands thy aid.
Ye stars are but the shining dust of my divine abode,
The pavement of those heavenly courts, where I shall reign with God."

So died the great Columbus of the heavens.

§ 69. DEDICATIONS.

604. FOUR CURIOUS INCIDENTS.

In the Conversations of Mademoiselle de Scudery, in which much knowledge of the world is displayed, the following passage occurs concerning dedications, which is so curious that no apology is needed for transcribing it: —

"There was a certain writer who had three dedicatory epistles to one book, for three persons very different in rank and merit, with a view of making use of that which could be turned to the best account, and a third person negotiated the matter. As things happened, he dedicated the book to the best bidder, but the worst man. Another, who now rests from his labors, had prepared a dedication, or rather a panegyric; but the subject of it losing his place before the book was printed, it was suppressed.

"It is well known that a certain country author came to Paris, with a very elaborate dedication to Cardinal Richelieu; but finding him dead, on his arrival, he evinced his dexterity by modelling it into a panegyric on the queen, Mary of Austria.

"There was another, who, after highly, and as justly, commending a living person, gave an opposite turn to all he had said, because the individual died before he had rewarded the author in a manner commensurate with his fancied merit.

"Yet I think neither of these came up to the artifice of one Rangouza, who, having printed a collection of letters without paging or order, save the bookbinder's directions so to arrange them that each person to whom a copy of the volume was presented should find his own first, and taking a precedence of others, which could not but be bountifully rewarded, as being a very flattering distinction. These letters were justly termed golden letters, for the author boasted that, one with another, they brought him near thirty pistoles each."

605. BAYLE'S REFUSAL.

A sense of honor induced Bayle to refuse the Duke of Shrewsbury's gift of two hundred guineas for the dedication of his Dictionary. "I have so often ridiculed dedications, that I must not risk any," was the reply of our philosopher.

606. DEDICATIONS TO CARDINAL RICHELIEU.

"Never," says an English writer, "was a gigantic baby of adulation so crammed with the soft pap of dedications as Cardinal Richelieu. French flattery even exceeded itself. Among the vast number of very extraordinary dedications to this man, in which the Divinity itself is disrobed of its attributes to bestow them on this miserable creature of vanity, I suspect that even the following one is not the most blasphemous he received: "Who has seen your face without being seized by those softening terrors which made the prophets shudder when God showed the beams of his glory? But as he whom they dared not approach in the burning bush, and in the noise of thunders, appeared to them sometimes in the freshness of the zephyrs, so the softness of your august countenance dissipates at the same time, and changes into dew, the small vapors which cover its majesty."

One of these herd of dedicators, after the death of Richelieu, suppressed, in a second edition, his hyperbolic panegyric, and, as a punishment he inflicted on himself, dedicated the work to Jesus Christ.

607. ANGELO POLITIAN'S WITTY DEDICATION.

Angelo Politian, an Italian, was one of the most polished writers of the fifteenth century. Baillet has placed him amongst his celebrated children; for he was a writer at twelve years of age. The Muses indeed cherished him in his cradle, and the Graces hung round it their most beautiful wreaths. When he became professor of the Greek language, such were the charms of his lectures, that one Chalcondylas, a native of Greece, saw himself abandoned by his pupils, who resorted to the delightful disquisitions of the elegant Politian. Critics of various nations have acknowledged that his poetical versions have frequently excelled the originals. This happy genius was lodged in a most unhappy form; nor were his morals untainted. It is only in his literary compositions that he appears perfect.

Monnoye, in his edition of the Menagiana, as a specimen of his Epistles, gives a translation of the letter, which serves as prefatory and dedicatory, and has accompanied it by a commentary. The letter is replete with literature, though void of pedantry; a barren subject is embellished by its happy turns. It is addressed to his patron, Monsignor Pietro de Medicis, and was written about a month before the writer's death. Perhaps no author has so admirably defended himself from the incertitude of criticism and the fastidiousness of critics. His wit and his humor are delicate; and few compositions are sprinkled with such Attic salt.

"My Lord: You have frequently urged me to collect my letters, to revise and to publish them in a volume. I have now gathered them, that I might not omit any mark of that obedience which I owe to him on whom I rest all my hopes, and all my prosperity. I have not, however, collected them all, because that would have been a more laborious task than to have gathered the scattered leaves of the Sibyl. It was never, indeed, with an intention of forming my letters into one body that I wrote them, but merely as occasion prompted, and as the subjects presented themselves, without seeking for them. I never retained copies except of a few, which, less fortunate, I think, than the others, were thus favored for the sake of the verses they contained. To form, however, a tolerable volume, I have also inserted some written by others, but only those with which several ingenious scholars favored me, and which, perhaps, may put the reader in good humor with my own.

"There is one thing for which some will be inclined to censure me; the style of my letters is very unequal; and, to confess the truth, I did not find myself always in the same humor, and the same modes of expression were not adapted to every person and every topic. They will not fail then to observe, when they read such a diversity of letters,—I mean if they do read them,—that I have composed, not epistles, but, once more, miscellanies.

"I hope, my lord, notwithstanding this, that amongst such a variety of opinions, of those who write letters, and of those who give precepts how letters should be written, I shall find some apology. Some, probably, will deny that they are Ciceronian. I can answer such, and not without good authority, that in epistolary composition we must not regard Cicero as a model. Another, perhaps, will say that I imitate Cicero. And him I will answer by observing that I wish nothing better than to be capable of grasping something of this great man, were it but his shadow!

"Another will wish that I had borrowed a little from the manner of Pliny the orator, because his profound sense and accuracy were greatly esteemed. I shall oppose him by expressing my contempt of all the writers of the age of Pliny. If it should be observed that I have imitated the manner of Pliny, I shall then screen myself by what Sidonius Apollinaris, an author who is by no means disreputable, says in commendation of his epistolary style. Do I resemble Symmachus? I shall not be sorry, for they distinguish his openness and conciseness. Am I considered in nowise resembling him? I shall confess that I am not pleased with his dry manner.

"Will my letters be condemned for their length? Plato, Aristotle, Thucydides, and Cicero have all written long ones. Will some of them be criticized for their brevity? I allege in my favor the examples of Dion, Brutus, Apollonius, Philostratus, Marcus Antonius, Alciphron, Julian, Symmachus, and also Lucian, who vulgarly, but falsely, is believed to have been Phalaris.

"I shall be censured for having treated of topics which are not generally considered as proper for epistolary composition. I admit this censure, provided, while I am condemned, Seneca also shares in the condemnation. Another will not allow of a sententious manner in my letters; I will still justify myself by Seneca. Another, on the contrary, desires abrupt, sententious periods; Dionysius shall answer him for me, who maintains that pointed sentences should not be admitted into letters.

"Is my style too perspicuous? It is precisely that which Philostratus admires. Is it obscure? Such is that of Cicero to Atticus. Negligent? An agreeable negligence in letters is more graceful than elaborate ornaments. Labored? Nothing can be more proper, since we send epistles to our friends as a kind of presents. If they display too nice an arrangement, the Halicarnassian shall vindicate me. If there is none, Artemon says there should be none.

"Now, as a good and pure Latinity has its peculiar taste, its manners, and, to express myself thus, its Atticisms, if in this sense a letter shall be found not sufficiently Attic, so much the better; for what was Herod, the sophist, censured? but that, having been born an Athenian, he affected too much to appear one in his language. Should a letter seem too Attical, still better, since it was by discovering Theophrastus, who was no Athenian, that a good old woman of Athens laid hold of a word, and shamed him.

"Shall one letter be found not sufficiently serious? I love to jest. Or is it too grave? I am pleased with gravity. Is another full of figures? Letters being the images of discourse, figures have the effect of graceful action in conversation. Are they deficient in figures? This is just what characterizes a letter, this want of figures! Does it discover the genius of the writer? This frankness is recommended. Does it conceal it? The writer did not think proper to paint himself; and it is one requisite in a letter, that it should be void of ostentation. 'You express yourself,' some one will observe, 'in common terms on common topics, and in new terms on new topics.' The style is thus adapted to the subject. 'No, no,' he will answer; 'it is in common terms you express new ideas, and in new terms common ideas.' Very well! It is because I have not forgotten an ancient Greek precept which expressly recommends this.

"It is thus by attempting to be ambidexterous I try to ward off attacks. My critics will, however, criticize me as they please. It will be sufficient for me, my lord, to be assured of having satisfied you, by my letters, if they are good, or by my obedience, if they are not so."

608. DEDICATIONS ABOUNDING.

There was an Italian physician, who, having written on Hippocrates's Aphorisms, dedicated each book of his Commentaries to one of his friends, and the index to another.

609. PETER MOTTEUX AND PATRON.

The price for the dedication of a play was from five to ten guineas, from the revolution to the time of George I., when it rose to twenty. But sometimes a bargain was to be struck when the author and the play were alike indifferent. Sometimes the party haggled about the price, or the statue, while stepping into his niche, could turn round on the author to assist his invention. A patron of Peter Motteux, dissatisfied with Peter's colder temperament, actually composed the superlative dedication himself, and completed the misery of the apparent author by subscribing it with his name. This circumstance was so notorious at the time, that it occasioned a satirical dialogue between Motteux and his patron, Heveningham. The patron, in his zeal to omit no possible distinction that might attach to him, had given one circumstance which no one but himself could have known.

PATRON. I must confess I was to blame
That one particular to name;
The rest could never have been known,
I made the style so like thy own

POET. I beg your pardon, sir, for that.

PATRON. Why, tell me, what would you be at?
I writ below myself you not!
Avoiding figures, tropes, what not,
For fear I should my fancy raise
Above the level of thy plays!

610. BEZA, TASSO, ARIOSTO, AND DRYDEN.

The ancients dedicated their works to those friends at whose suggestions they had projected their various essays.

Theodore Beza dedicated his Aristotle on Animals to Pope Sixtus IV., and received from his holiness the cost of the binding.

Tasso fared no better in his dedications; and Ariosto, on a similar occasion, received a sarcasm from the Cardinal d'Este, which will last as long as the memory of his poem.

In more modern times, poets seldom bestowed compliments, either in their poems or their dedications, without being well paid for them. In the days of Dryden, the common price for a dedication was from twenty to fifty pounds. Indeed, a larger sum than this has been given upon special occasions; but the compositions were in such cases more than ordinarily loaded with adulation.

611. DEDICATIONS TO THE DAUPHIN.

The virtuous Duke of Montausier, governor of the Dauphin of France, in the reign of Louis XIV., would never suffer his pupil to read the dedications that were addressed to him. One day, however, he discovered him reading one of these epistles in private; but instead of taking it from him, he obliged him to read it aloud, and, stopping him at the end of every phrase, said, "Do you not see, sir, that they are laughing at you with impunity? Can you sincerely believe yourself possessed of all the good qualities ascribed to you? Can you read, without indignation, such gross flattery, which they would not presume to offer, without having the lowest opinion of your understanding?"

612. DEDICATION TO A STATUE.

At a time when the ministers of state were frequently changed in France, a certain author dedicated his piece to the Brazen Horse on the Pont Neuf, "for I am persuaded," said he, "that my patron will long remain in place."

613. DEGGE'S DEDICATION.

An ingenious dedication was contrived by Sir Simon Degge, who dedicated the Parson's Counsellor to Woods, Bishop of Lichfield, with this intention: Degge highly complimented the bishop on having most nobly restored the church, which had been demolished in the civil wars, and was rebuilt, but left unfinished, by Bishop Hacket. At the time he wrote the dedication, Woods had not turned a single stone, and it is said, that, much against his will, he did something from having been so publicly reminded of it by this ironical dedication.

614. FULLER'S CHURCH HISTORY.

Fuller, in his Church History, has, with admirable contrivance, introduced twelve title-pages, besides the general one, and as many particular dedications, and no less than fifty or sixty of those by inscriptions, and which are addressed to his benefactors; a circumstance which Heylin in his severity did not overlook; for "making his work bigger by forty sheets at the least; and he was so ambitious of the number of his patrons, that, having but four leaves at the end of his History, he discovers a particular benefactress to inscribe them to!" This unlucky lady, the patroness of four leaves, Heylin compares to Roscius Regulus, who accepted the consular dignity for that part of the day on which Cæcina, by a decree of the senate, was degraded from it, which occasioned Regulus to be ridiculed by the people all his life after, as the consul of half a day.

615. CASTELL'S POLYGLOT BIBLE.

One of the most singular anecdotes respecting dedications in English bibliography is that of the Polyglot Bible of Dr. Castell. Cromwell, much to his honor, patronized that great labor, and allowed the paper to be imported free of all duties, both of excise and custom. It was published under the protectorate, but many copies had not been disposed of ere Charles II. ascended the throne. Dr. Castell had dedicated the work gratefully to Oliver, by mentioning him with peculiar respect in the preface, but he wavered with Richard Cromwell. At the restoration, he cancelled the two last leaves, and supplied their places with three others, which softened down the republican strains, and blotted Oliver's name out. The differences in what are now called the republican and the loyal copies have amused the curious collectors; and the former, being very scarce, are most sought after. In the loyal copies, the patrons of the work are mentioned, but their titles are essentially changed. Serenissimus, Illustrissimus, and Honoratissimus were epithets that dared not show themselves under the levelling influence of the great republican.

§ 70. DEGREES.

616. REDEEMING TIME.

Dean Swift, when he claimed, at the usual time, the degree of A. B., was so deficient as to obtain it only by special favor, a term used to denote want of merit. Of this disgrace he was so ashamed, that he resolved from that time to study eight hours a day, and continued his industry for seven years, with what improvement is sufficiently known. This part of his history deserves to be remembered; it may afford useful admonition to young men, whose abilities have been made, for a time, useless by their passions or pleasures, and who, having lost one part of life in idleness, are tempted to throw away the remainder in despair.

617. DEGREES GIVEN BY THE UNIVERSITY OF ST. ANDREW.

On Dr. Johnson's visiting the University of St. Andrew, in Scotland, whence academical honors are supposed to have been plentifully obtained, for the purpose of literary as well as medical quackery, without any other proof of ability than that of being able to pay certain fees requisite on the occasion, he is said to have inquired of one of the professors into the state of their funds; and, being informed that they were less affluent than many of their neighbors, "It is no matter," said the doctor; "persevere in your present plan, and you will certainly get rich — by degrees."

618. CLASSICAL ANECDOTE.

A certain pedantic gentleman once presented himself at Cambridge for a doctor's degree, and, as is usual on such occasions, the questioning was commenced in Latin, when the following classical wit was exhibited:—

Questioner. — Quid est creare? (What is it to create?)

Pedant. — Ex nihilo facere. (To make out of nothing.)

Q. — Ergo, te doctorem creamus! (Therefore we make you a doctor!)

§ 71. DESCENDANTS OF LITERARY MEN.

619. LORD BACON.

Lord Bacon, when a child, was sickly, and unable to join in the rough sports suited to boys of robust constitutions. His father was too much occupied with his official duties to do more than kiss him, hear him occasionally recite a little piece he had learned by heart, and give him his blessing. But Lady Bacon, who was not only a tender mother, but a woman of highly-cultivated mind, after the manner of her age, devoted herself assiduously to her youngest child, who, along with his bodily weakness, exhibited, from earliest infancy, the dawning of extraordinary intellect. She and her sisters had received a regular classical education, and had kept up her familiarity with the poets, historians, and philosophers of antiquity. She was likewise well acquainted with modern languages, and with the theology and literature of her own times. She corresponded in Greek with Bishop Jewel respecting the then fashionable controversies, and she translated his Apologia from the Latin so correctly, that neither he nor Archbishop Parker could suggest a single alteration. She also translated, admirably, a volume of sermons on Fate and Free Will from the Italian of Bernardin Ochinus.

Under her care, assisted by a domestic, Francis Bacon continued till he reached his thirteenth year. He took most kindly to his book, and made extraordinary proficiency in the studies prescribed to him. His inquisitiveness and original turn of thinking were at the same time displayed. While still a mere child, he stole away to a vault in St. James's Fields, for the purpose of investigating a singular echo which he had discovered there; and when a little older, he amused himself with very ingenious speculations on the art of legerdemain. He enjoyed, at the same time, the great advantage, on account of his father's station, and his being the nephew of the prime minister, of being early introduced into the highest and most intellectual society, in which he displayed the most extraordinary gravity of deportment, as well as readiness of wit. So much was Queen Elizabeth struck with his manner and his precocity, that she used to amuse herself in conversation with him, and to call him her "young lord keeper." On one occasion, he greatly pleased her by his answer to the common question put to children, how old he was: "Exactly two years younger than your majesty's happy reign."

630. SHAKSPEARE'S DESCENDANTS.

Several of the descendants of Shakspeare's sister Joan, bearing a strong family likeness to the great poet, were in 1822 living in and about Stratford, and chiefly in a state of indigence, little creditable to the worshippers of his genius. The nearest living descendants were the Hartes, of Tewkesbury, the chief of whom, in 1818, was William Shakspeare Harte, a journeyman chairmaker, earning only eighteen shillings per week, with a wife and several children. This poor man was obliged to sell the freehold in Shakspeare's two houses in Stratford, about the year 1805, for which he obtained two hundred pounds, leaving, after a mortgage and the expenses had been paid, but thirty pounds, as the wreck of the fortunes of this neglected family.

631. DESCENDANTS OF ROBERT BURNS.

"For some time," says the London Daily News, "there has been travelling in the interior of the remote Island of Borneo, and sojourning among its rude people of head hunters, a young man of the name of Burns, and this young man is the grandson of Robert Burns and 'bonny Jean.' This adventurous youth has not only been hospitably and kindly treated by the rude Dyaks, but a prince of the Kay-an nation, the most powerful on the island, has given him one of his daughters to wife; so that future biographers of Robert Burns will, in all human likelihood, be able to enumerate among his descendants those also of a Bornean prince. Mr. Burns has discovered mines of antimony, and coal-fields, in Borneo, more extensive than any other in the world out of America. He seems, moreover, to be not only a person of great enterprise, but also a man of intelligence and good education; for he has written and published by far the most authentic account of Borneo which has hitherto been given to the public."

632. FAMILIES OF GIFTED GENIUSES.

A quarterly reviewer, in discussing an objection to the copyright bill of Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, gives some curious particulars of the progeny of literary men. The statements, we imagine, are rather too sweeping. "We are not," says the writer, "going to speculate about the causes of the fact; but a fact it is, that men distinguished for extraordinary intellectual power of any sort rarely leave more than a very brief line of progeny behind them. Men of genius have scarcely ever done so; men of imaginative genius, we might say, almost never. With the one exception of the noble Surrey, we cannot, at this moment, point out a representative in the male line, even so far down as the third generation, of any English poet; and we believe the case is the same in France. The blood of beings of that order can seldom be traced far down, even in the female line. With the exception of Surrey and Spenser, we are not aware of any great English author, of at all remote date, from whose body any living person claims to be descended. There is no real English poet prior to the middle of the eighteenth century; and we believe no great author of any sort, except Clarendon and Shaftesbury, of whose blood we have any inheritance amongst us. Chaucer's only son died childless. Shakspeare's line expired in his daughter's only daughter. None of the other dramatists of that age left any progeny; nor Raleigh, nor Bacon, nor Cowley, nor Butler. The granddaughter of Milton was the last of his blood. Newton, Locke, Pope, Swift, Arbuthnot, Hume, Gibbon, Cowper, Gray, Walpole, Cavendish (and we might greatly extend the list) never married. Neither Bolingbroke, nor Addison, nor Warburton, nor Johnson, nor Burke, transmitted their blood. One of the arguments against a perpetuity in literary property is, that it would be founding another noblesse. Neither jealous aristocracy nor envious Jacobinism need be under such alarm. When a human race has produced its 'bright consummate flower' in this kind, it seems commonly to be near its end."

§ 72. DICTIONARIES AND ENCYCLOPÆDIAS.

633. DR. JOHNSON AND LORD CHESTERFIELD.

When Dr. Johnson first conceived the design of compiling a Dictionary of the English Language, in 1747, he drew up a plan, in a letter to the Earl of Chesterfield. This very letter exhibits a beautiful proof to what a degree of grammatical perfection and classical elegance our language was capable of being brought. The execution of this plan cost him the labor of many years; but when it was published, in 1755, the sanguine expectations of the public were amply justified; and several foreign academies, particularly Della Crusca, honored the author with their approbation. But the excellency of this great work will rise in the estimation of all who are informed, that it was written, as the author declares, "with little assistance of the learned, and without any patronage of the great; not in the soft obscurities of retirement, or under the shelter of academic bowers, but amidst inconveniences and distraction, in sickness and sorrow." Lord Chesterfield, at that time, was universally esteemed the Mæcenas of the age; and it was in that character, no doubt, that Dr. Johnson addressed to him the letter before mentioned. But during the subsequent years of Johnson's labor on the work, while poverty and misfortune pressed heavily upon him, Chesterfield paid him no attention, and afforded him no assistance. When, however, the Dictionary was upon the eve of publication, Lord Chesterfield, who, it is said, had flattered himself with expectations that Johnson would dedicate the work to him, attempted, in a courtly manner, to soothe and insinuate himself with the sage, conscious, as it would seem, of the cold indifference with which, for several years previous, he had treated its learned author, and further attempted to conciliate him by writing two papers in the World, in recommendation of the work. It must be confessed that they contained some studied compliments so finely turned that, if there had been no previous offence, it is probable Johnson would have been highly delighted. Praise, in general, was pleasing to him; but by praise from a man of rank and elegant accomplishments he was peculiarly gratified. This courtly device failed of its effect; and the failure was owing, not only to Chesterfield's past neglect, but to Johnson's being refused admittance, about this time, to the nobleman's mansion — a circumstance which has been attributed to the mistake of the porter. Johnson, who thought that "all was false and hollow," despised the honeyed words, and was ever indignant that Lord Chesterfield should, for a moment, imagine that he could be the dupe of such an artifice. His expression to Boswell concerning Lord Chesterfield, upon this occasion, was, "Sir, after making great professions, he had, for many years, taken no notice of me; but when my Dictionary was coming out, he fell a-scribbling in the World about it; upon which I wrote him a letter, expressed in civil terms, but such as might show him that I did not mind what he said or wrote, and that I had done with him."

Dr. Johnson appeared to have had a remarkable delicacy with respect to the circulation of this letter; for Dr. Douglas, Bishop of Salisbury, informed Boswell, that, having many years ago pressed him to be allowed to read it to the second Lord Hardwicke, who was very desirous to hear it, (promising at the same time that no copy of it should be taken,) Johnson seemed much pleased that it had attracted the attention of a nobleman of such a respectable character, but, after pausing some time, declined to comply with the request, saying, with a smile, "No, sir, I have hurt the dog too much already;" or words to this purpose. Dr. Adams expostulated with Johnson, and suggested, that his not being admitted when he called on him, to which Johnson had alluded in his letter, was probably not to be imputed to Lord Chesterfield; for his lordship had declared to Dodsley, that he "would have turned off the best servant he ever had, if he had known that he denied to him a man who would have been always more than welcome." And in confirmation of this, he insisted on Lord Chesterfield's general affability and easiness of access, especially to literary men. Johnson replied, "Sir, that is not Lord Chesterfield; he is the proudest man this day existing." "No," said Adams, "there is one person, at least, as proud; I think, by your own account, you are the prouder man of the two." "But," said Johnson, "mine was defensive pride." This, as Dr. Adams well observed, was one of those happy turns for which he was so remarkably ready.

Just before the Dictionary was published, Mr. Moore expressed his surprise to the great lexicographer, that he did not intend to dedicate the book to his lordship. Mr. Johnson answered, that he was under no obligation to any great man whatever, and therefore he should not make him his patron." "Pardon me, sir," said Moore, "you are certainly obliged to his lordship for two elegant papers he has written in favor of your performance." "You quite mistake the thing," replied the other. "I confess no obligation; I feel my own dignity, sir. I have made a voyage round the world of the English language; and, while I am coming into port, with a fair wind, on a fair, sunshining day, my Lord Chesterfield sends out two little cockboats to tow me in. I am very sensible of the favor, Mr. Moore, and should be sorry to say an ill-natured thing of that nobleman; but I cannot help thinking he is a lord among wits, and a wit among lords." The severity of this remark seems never to have been forgotten by the earl, who, in one of his letters to his son, thus delineates the doctor: "There is a man, whose moral character, deep learning, and superior parts, I acknowledge, admire, and respect, but whom it is so impossible for me to love, that I am almost in a fever when I am in his company. His figure, without being deformed, seems made to disgrace or ridicule the common structure of the human body: his legs and arms are never in the position which, according to the situation of his body, they ought to be in, but constantly employed in committing acts of hostility upon the graces. He throws any where but down his throat whatever he means to drink, and only mangles what he means to carve. Inattentive to all the regards of social life, he mistimes or misplaces every thing. He disputes with heat, and indiscriminately; mindless of the rank, character, and situation of those with whom he disputes. Absolutely ignorant of the several gradations of familiarity or respect, he is exactly the same to his superiors, his equals, and his inferiors, and therefore, by a necessary consequence, absurd to two of the three. Is it possible to love such a man? No; the utmost I can do for him is to consider him a respectable Hottentot."

624. JOHNSON AND HIS PUBLISHERS.

HOW HIS PLAN CAME TO BE ADDRESSED TO LORD CHESTERFIELD.

The booksellers who contracted with Johnson for the publication of his Dictionary, which he had prepared single and unaided, though in other countries such a work has not been effected but by the coöperating exertions of many, were Mr. Robert Dodsley, Mr. Charles Hitch, Mr. Andrew Millar, the two Messrs. Longman, and the two Messrs. Knapton. The price stipulated was fifteen hundred guineas. The plan was addressed to Philip Dormer, Earl of Chesterfield, then one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, a nobleman who was very ambitious of literary distinction, and who, upon being informed of the design, had expressed himself in terms very favorable to its success.

There is, perhaps, in every thing of any consequence, a secret history, which it would be amusing to know, could we have it authentically communicated. Johnson told Boswell, "Sir, the way in which the plan of my Dictionary came to be inscribed to Lord Chesterfield was this: I had neglected to write it by the time appointed; Dodsley suggested a desire to have it addressed to Lord Chesterfield; I laid hold of this as a pretext for delay, that it might be better done, and let Dodsley have his desire. I said to my friend Dr. Barthurst, 'Now, if any good comes of my addressing the plan to Lord Chesterfield, it will be ascribed to deep policy, when, in fact, it was only a casual excuse for laziness.'"

625. DR. ADAMS'S INTERVIEW WITH JOHNSON.

Dr. Adams found him one day busy at his Dictionary, when the following dialogue ensued:—

Adams.—This is a great work, sir. How are you to get all the etymologies?

Johnson.—Why, sir, here is a shelf with Junius, and Skinner, and others; and there is a Welsh gentleman who has published a collection of Welsh proverbs, who will help me with the Welsh.

Adams.—But, sir, how can you do this in three years?

Johnson.—Sir, I have no doubt that I can do it in three years.

Adams.—But the French Academy, which consists of forty members, took forty years to compile their Dictionary.

Johnson.—Sir, thus it is: this is the proposition. Let me see—forty times forty is sixteen hundred: as three to sixteen hundred, so is the proportion of an Englishman to a Frenchman.

With so much ease and pleasantry could he talk of that prodigious labor which he had undertaken to execute.

626. PREFACE TO JOHNSON'S DICTIONARY.

Horne Tooke, in his Diversions of Purley, after speaking in the most contemptuous terms of Johnson's Dictionary, admits that he never could read the preface to it without being affected even to tears. Such a tribute from such a critic must be rather startling to the nine out of ten who have never heard of such a preface, and to the ninety-nine out of a hundred who have never read it.

627. JOHNSON'S SECOND EDITION.

"Dr. Johnson," says Mrs. Piozzi, "did not really consider his Dictionary as a great performance, and used to say, that he 'might have done it easily in two years, had not his health received several shocks during the time.' When Mr. Thrale, in consequence of this declaration, teased him, in the year 1768, to give a new edition of it, 'because,' said he, 'there are four or five gross faults,' 'Alas! sir,' replied Johnson, 'there are four or five hundred faults, instead of four or five; but you do not consider that it would take me up three whole months' labor, and when the time was expired, the work would not be done.' When the booksellers set him about it, however, some years after, he went cheerfully to the business, said he was well paid, and that they deserved to have it done carefully."

628. JOHNSON'S METHOD OF COMPILING HIS DICTIONARY.

The account of the manner in which Johnson compiled his Dictionary, as given by Mr. Boswell, is confused and erroneous, and, as a moment's reflection will convince every person of judgment, could not be correct; for to write down an alphabetical arrangement of all the words in the English language, and then hunt through the whole compass of English literature for all their different significations, would have taken the whole life of any individual; but Johnson, who, among other peculiarities of his character, excelled most men in contriving the best means to accomplish any end, devised the following mode for completing his Dictionary, as he himself expressly described to the writer of this account, Bishop Percy. He began his task by devoting his first care to the diligent perusal of all such English writers as were most correct in their language, and under every sentence which he meant to quote he drew a line, and noted in the margin the first letter of the word under which it was to occur. He then delivered these books to his clerks, who transcribed each sentence on a separate slip of paper, and arranged the same under the word referred to. By these means he collected the several words and their different significations; and when the whole arrangement was alphabetically formed, he gave the definitions of their meanings, and collected their etymologies from Skinner, Junius, and other writers on the subject. In completing his alphabetical arrangement, he, no doubt, would recur to former dictionaries, to see if any words had escaped him; but this, which Mr. Boswell makes the first step in the business, was in reality the last; and it was doubtless to this happy arrangement that Johnson effected in a few years what employed the foreign academies nearly half a century.

629. JOHNSON'S RAMBLER AND DICTIONARY

During the printing of Johnson's Dictionary, the Ramblers came out periodically; for he could do more than one thing at a time. He declared that he wrote them by way of relief from his application to his Dictionary, and for the reward. He told a friend he had no expectation they would have been so much read and admired. What was amusement to him was instruction to others. Goldsmith declared that a system of morals might be drawn from these essays. This idea has been taken up and executed by a publication in an alphabetical series of moral maxims.

630. JOHNSONIAN WORDS.

"In Kett's Elements of General Knowledge," says a writer, "I read as follows: 'Our literature, indeed, dates a new era from the publication of Johnson's works. Many of his words are rarely to be met with in former writers, and some are purely of his own fabrication. Note 'resuscitation, orbity, volent, fatuity, divaricate, asinine, narcotic, vulnerary, empergumatic, obtund, disruption, seniority, cremation, horticulture, germination, decussation, eximious,' &c. If these words are not peculiarly Johnson's, I know not where they are to be found.'"

"Now, upon turning over Johnson's Dictionary, I find all the above words occur in Pope, Bacon, Wilkins, Milton, Arbuthnot, Grew, Quincy, Wiseman, Harvey, Woodward, Newton, Glanville, and Ray, except horticulture, which may be found in Turner's Husbandry; eximious, in Lodge's Letters, and cremation, for which at present I have no authority. So much for the research of Mr. Kett."

631. GARRET AND COCK-LOFT.

Dr. Johnson, in his Dictionary, defines a garret as "a room on the highest floor of the house," and a cock-loft as "the room over the garret."

632. CURMUDGEON.

Johnson, while composing his Dictionary, sent a note to the Gentleman's Magazine to inquire the etymology of the word curmudgeon. Having obtained the information, he records in his work the obligation to an anonymous letter-writer: "Curmudgeon, a vicious way of pronouncing cœur méchant.* An unknown correspondent." Ash copied the word into his Dictionary in this manner: Curmudgeon. from the French cœur, unknown, and méchant, a correspondent."

633. AN EXAMPLE TO STUDENTS.

We find in the correspondence of the Boston Transcript, for 184-, some very interesting particulars relative to the mode of life of Dr. Charles Anthon. He is, perhaps, the most learned, certainly the most industrious, man in the country. He is an indefatigable student; at his books fourteen hours out of the twenty-four, or writing, writing, writing. He thinks nothing of turning you out four classical books, with copious notes, in a year, and will throw you in a Grammar and a Classical Dictionary. Of course, Master Sophomore, you imagine him a pale, worn, thin, haggard anatomy, looking too fragile to cast a shadow, with spectacles and a scratch. You are mistaken. Dr. Charles Anthon, author and editor of works too numerous to mention, except in the catalogue of the Bodleian Library, is a hale, hearty, thick-set, stout bachelor of forty, or thereabouts, with a frank, cheerful countenance, an unwrinkled brow, and rubicund visage; as if, instead of musty folios, those joyous sisters, air and exercise, had been his lifetime companions.

Of course, likewise, you conjecture that he "wastes the midnight oil." Mistaken again: he is no such prodigal of the great treasure — health. He goes to bed every night at nine o'clock, and rises every morning at two o'clock. Rare sport it must be of a winter's morning, the mercury at zero. Moreover, he lights his own fire. He has two alarm clocks in his dormitory — one set to strike half an hour before the other, so that if the first does not arouse him, the second shall. With his morning lamp "trimmed and burning," he studies and writes, till it "gins to pale its ineffectual fire" before the smiles of Madam Aurora. Nor even then does he rest from his labors, but toils on, with a brief intermission for breakfast, till the ringing of the grammar school bell at nine calls him to the discharge of his professional duties. Behold, ingenious youths of my country, an example worthy of sedulous imitation. You may well exclaim, "It is not to be wondered at, if such are Dr. Anthon's habits, that he can perform so prodigious an amount of work." Therefore sing out with the hospitable Persian, "May he live a thousand years; may his shadows never be less."

634. HENDERSON AND JOHNSON.

A German at Oxford was once much frightened by coming into the room while John Henderson was exercising his mimicry; for, as he protested, he thought himself talking at a distance. No person needed to have gone out of Henderson's company to have heard and almost seen Dr. Johnson. During one of the doctor's annual visits to Oxford, Henderson and he one evening, for several hours, amused those around them by conversing expressly in hard words. It was generally admitted that John Henderson discovered the greater talent at this verbal forgery. And to meet the doctor on his own ground was indeed a presumptuous thing. Their conversations in Latin, often extending through a whole evening, were deemed splendid, as they were classically chaste. Dr. Adams, it was said, was the only man in Oxford who approximated towards an equality with John Henderson in Latin colloquism.

635. JOHNSON'S MISTAKE.

In allusion to a passage in Johnson's Dictionary, which states that h seldom, perhaps never, begins any but the first syllable, Wilkes observed, that "the doctor must be a man of quick apprehension, and a most comprehensive genius."

636. SINGULAR PERSISTENCE.

The intensity of application with which the mind follows whatever it lays hold upon in literary pursuits is exemplified in the case of Robert Ainsworth, a celebrated writer and antiquarian of the seventeenth century. He had been for years engaged upon a voluminous Dictionary of the Latin language, and we are told that he gave so little of his society to his wife while thus employed, that, before he had quite completed it, she committed the whole work to the flames. Instead of abandoning himself to despair, Ainsworth immediately set himself to work to rewrite it; which he finally accomplished with incredible labor.

637. LITTLETON'S DICTIONARY.

When Littleton was compiling his Latin Dictionary, he employed an amanuensis. One day he announced the word concurro to the ready scribe, who, thinking he could translate it himself, said, "Concur, I suppose;" to which the doctor peevishly replied, "Con-cur! con-dog!" The secretary, whose business it was to write down whatever his master dictated, did his duty. Condog was inserted, and actually printed, as one interpretation of concurro, in the edition of 1678; though it was corrected in all subsequent ones.

638. LEMAN'S DEFINITIONS.

Dr. Parr, being asked who was his immediate predecessor in the mastership of the free school at

* Bad heart.

Norwich, replied, "It was Barnabas Leman, an honest man, but without learning, and very tyrannical in his discipline. This man had the impudence to publish, by a half-guinea subscription, what he called an English Derivative Dictionary, in quarto. He pretended to find a derivation for every word in Saxon, German, Dutch, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. No matter what the word was, whether foreign or vernacular, he undertook to find its etymology. Coming to 'pig's pettytoes,' (a Norfolk way of dressing the feet of sucking pigs,) he was a little puzzled, but it did not stop him; so he wrote, as it now stands in the book, 'Pig's pettytoes—a dish of which the author of this Dictionary is extremely fond.'"

639. PATHOLOGY.

There once resided in an Ayrshire village (England) a man who, like Leman, proposed to write an Etymological Dictionary of the English language. Being asked what he understood the word pathology to mean, he answered, with great readiness and confidence, "Why, the art of road-making, to be sure."

640. COTGRAVE

Randle Cotgrave was the curious collector of the most copious Dictionary of old French and old English words and phrases. The work is the only treasury of our genuine idiom.

After years of toil on his work, we hear the melancholy man exclaiming, "In this gloom of solitude I have protracted my work till those whom I wished to please have sunk into the grave, and success and miscarriage are empty sounds." But, if it be applauded, that praise has come too late for him whose literary labor has stolen away his sight. Cotgrave had grown blind over his Dictionary, and was doubtful whether this work of his laborious days and nightly vigils was not a superfluous labor, and nothing, after all, but a "poor bundle of words." The reader may listen to the gray-headed martyr, addressing his patron, Lord Burghley:—

"I present to your lordship an account of the expense of many hours, which, in your service, and to mine own benefit, might have been otherwise employed. My desires have aimed at more substantial marks; but mine eyes failed them, and forced me to spend out their vigor in this bundle of words, which may be unworthy of your lordship's great patience, and, perhaps, ill-suited to the expectations of others."

641. LIBERTY.

In an old French dictionary, liberty is described to be a word of three syllables. The lexicographer does not venture further.

642. PASSOW'S GREEK DICTIONARY.

Passow, the philologist, was the author of a Greek Dictionary, begun in 1819 and completed in 1824. Passow's Dictionary was regarded in its time as "one of the best for daily use, accurate, trustworthy, and complete for the learner's purpose."

Of the distinguishing peculiarities of the work were the following, as claimed by Passow: A more careful explanation of the prepositions, particles, and conjunctions; the designation of the quantity of syllables, which before his time had been wholly neglected; and a warning exposure of such forms of words as had been coined at random by ancient and modern corruptors of language.

Passow, speaking of his immense and indefatigable exertions, tells us that the "rich and infinitely various and constantly new exercises of mind, which this branch of philosophical studies offered, was an abundant recompense for all his labors," and that these labors, which he found absolutely necessary in prosecuting his work, were as numerous and difficult as any described in the complaints of those who had engaged in similar pursuits.

The circumstances which led Passow to devote himself to the composition of his Greek Dictionary are thus curiously detailed in Passow's letter to Voss, from Weimar, in 1810: "I have just got through with a trifling affair in Latin. Some time ago, Beck, of Leipsic, requested me to contribute an article to the volume of his Transactions of the Leipsic Philological Society, which will come out at the Easter fair. While I was hesitating as to what I should send him, it occurred to me, that ever since I came here, about three years ago, I had been interlining my copy of Schneider's Lexicon with words and significations which were here and there wanting, corrections, idioms, and the like. As Ahlwardt had written a Programme, entitled a Supplement to Schneider's Lexicon, I resolved to examine and see whether I had collected any materials of importance, and, to my surprise, I found, under the letter alpha alone, about one hundred words which were entirely wanting in Schneider. They were mostly from good writers, such as Homer, Hesiod, Pindar, Æschylus, Herodotus, Sophocles, Aristophanes, Thucydides, and Demosthenes; some of them were from Nonnus, Julius Pollux, Tryphiodorus, Athenæus, Stobæus, the Anothology, &c. All these had been noted down, and justified by references to the passages in which they were found. I therefore collected together all the notes on new words and forms, about three hundred and fifty in number, which I found on the first hundred pages of my Schneider, demonstrated the nonentity of some words received in good faith by him, removed the doubts which he had cast upon others, and sent off my package to Beck; in which I have given evidence, that if I should continue to read the Greek authors twenty years longer,—in other words, if I should live so long,—I should be able to prepare a better lexicon than Schneider's. Still, I thankfully acknowledge his merits, though his hasty, defective, and unphilosophical manner of execution has, by a long use of his work, been rendered too obvious to me. Either in the second volume of these Transactions, or in a Programme at this gymnasium, I intend to prepare a dissertation De Vitiis Lexicorum Græcorum. I shall prosecute my lexicographical studies without interruption, particularly with reference to completeness of the forms and significations of words; the philosophical development of the latter—a point to which Schneider appears not to have devoted a thought; to etymology; to prosody, and finally to the age of each word, so far as it can now be demonstrated. Whether I shall ever live to see this infinite number of details reduced to a perfect system must be left to the decision of Providence. If one should allow himself to be discouraged by such uncertainties, nothing great or noble would ever be accomplished. I present myself to you, therefore, as a future lexicographer; and my work shall be no mere manual, but a great critical work, or nothing."

642. CASTELL'S LEXICON.

Dr. Edmund Castell spent a great part of his life in compiling his Lexicon Heptaglotton, on which he bestowed incredible pains, and expended on it no less than 12,000*l.*, and broke his constitution, and exhausted his fortune. At length it was printed, but the copies remained unsold on his hands. He exhibits a curious picture of literary labor in his preface: "As for myself, I have been unceasingly occupied for such a number of years in this mass," — Molendino he calls them, — "that that day seemed, as it were, a holiday in which I have not labored so much as sixteen or eighteen hours in these enlarging lexicons and Polyglot Bibles."

644. THE DISTRESSED LEXICOGRAPHER.

Napoleon reigned as emperor in France. The learned and modest lexicographer Boiste had just put the finishing stroke to his Dictionary. He had arrived at the point of time so happy for an author — he had just corrected the last proof-sheet, and sent it to his publisher. Sweet was his sleep, with brilliant dreams of future fame! The next day the book that would give him name and wealth was to see the light. He awoke to find his bed surrounded by gensdarmes, (soldiers.)

"Gentlemen, you have certainly made some mistake. I am Monsieur Boiste, grammarian to the emperor."

"The very man," answered the laconic brigadier. "It is all right; here is the order for the arrest of Boiste, grammarian!"

The argument was conclusive; there was no appeal; go with them he must; and soon the vehicle stopped before the Fort of Vincennes.

Once arrived at the prison, poor Boiste had some hope that the obstinate silence hitherto maintained would cease. He humbly supplicated to be told the cause of the arrest, protesting his innocence and devoted allegiance. The official, through some little feeling of respect for an old man, deigned to open the order for arrest; and after reading it, coolly answered, "To secure the public safety."

Poor Boiste was then sent off to a room, the iron bars of its windows securing to him three months' leisure to torture his brain in the endeavor to discover how he, who had spent his whole life arranging words under their different heads, from A to Z, could have compromised the public safety. He said to himself, with all the tranquillity of an untroubled conscience, "It cannot be for my book that I am arrested, since it has been examined three times over, corrected, and considerably diminished, by both the heads and the subordinates in the office of the imperial censorship."

Boiste did not content himself with lamentations; he made strong appeals by memorials addressed to all the influential persons of his acquaintance, always ending with this most logical conclusion: "I have done nothing; but only tell me what I have done, that I may justify myself?"

But unhappily, not one of his letters was answered. At length, one appeal from the unlucky prisoner fell into the hands of Fontanes, the head of the university, who knew and esteemed the poor grammarian; and, fully persuaded of the innocence of a man whose whole life had been devoted to his Dictionary, he hastened to mention him to the emperor, who, happening to be in a favorable mood that day, smiled at the artless epistle; and viewing the matter in the same light with Fontanes, sent for the Duke of Otranto. Fouché was as ignorant as they were of the ground of arrest, and was quite surprised; he had probably signed the order without reading it, and he, in his turn, summoned the prefect. The prefect could give no explanation, and sent for his deputy, who, after two days of research, at last found the fatal document. It was taken to the Tuilleries, and there it was found that it was made out upon the denunciation of the censor, who had actually charged Boiste with having spoken of Bonaparte as a spoliator. "How? — when? — where?" This the denunciation did not mention. The censor was ordered to make his appearance; but he was about a hundred leagues off, on a tour of inspection, exercising his vigilant superintendence of the provincial press.

"Let Boiste himself be examined," was Napoleon's next order; "for, besides that I believe him incapable of such an act, it really would not be common sense in a dictionary."

The next day, Boiste was once more permitted to see the sun, and was carried to the cabinet of the Duke of Otranto, where Fontanes was already in attendance.

"Sir," said Fouché, "you are accused of a libel against the august prince who reigns over this mighty empire."

"A libel! I, my lord? Surely you cannot believe it? A libel comes from libellus, a little book. Ask that gentleman, sir, at the head of our university. I know too well the meaning, the force of words, to —"

"Nevertheless," added Fontanes, showing him the information, but keeping his finger over the signature, "read this."

Boiste cast his eye rapidly along the paper.

"Well!" cried Fouché, seeing the quiet countenance unchanged.

"Is that all?" said Boiste.

"All! and is it not quite enough? I hope, for your sake, it is a mistake."

"Not at all; it is the truth."

"The truth!"

"Unquestionably; it was all to do honor to our emperor."

"To do honor to him!"

"Yes; to show that he was as great a linguist as he is a hero."

"Come, sir," said Fouché, impatiently; "it is quite time to put an end to such foolery. This is no jesting matter."

"God forbid that I should make a jest of it; I would not take such a liberty in your excellency's presence."

"Be good enough to give some explanation, then."

"Nothing more easy;" and taking a copy of his Dictionary, which lay on the table, he opened it at the word "spoliator," and pointed to two words in the following order: "Spoliator, Bonaparte."

The two functionaries indignantly exclaimed, "And what could have tempted you to such an audacious libel?"

"I was but giving his majesty the credit due to him. I put his name after the word 'spoliator,' as the authority for the word; he, when General Bonaparte, having been the first to make use of the expression in the tribune. It is a coinage of his own, and not known in the French language till he used it."

Fouché and Fontanes turned upon each other a bewildered look. Boiste was set at liberty; but it cost him the expense of the sheets that replaced the seditious page through the whole edition. And Boiste thought himself happy to get off so cheaply, now that he began to perceive that his tribute to the emperor's coinage was considered so equivocal a compliment.

645. VOLTAIRE AND HIS SECRETARY.

Voltaire, when on his estate of Ferney, was fond of assuming the air of nobility, and displayed a most philosophical hatred of poachers. One of the poor fellows was caught and brought before him. Voltaire determined to try him in form of law, and took his seat as judge, directing his secretary to act as counsel for the prisoner. The advocate made a long speech in his favor, and suddenly stopped short. "Why do you hesitate?" asked Voltaire. "I wish to read a passage from a volume in your library." He procured the book, and kept turning over the leaves, for some time, without saying a word. Voltaire became impatient, and asked him what book he was looking at. "It is your Philosophical Dictionary," was the answer. "Well." "I have been looking for the word 'humanity,' and I see you have omitted it." Voltaire thought the argument so forcible, that the culprit was set free at once.

646. DICTIONARY OF TREVOUX.

The Dictionary of Trevoux derives its name from Trevoux, in France, which first came to be distinguished as a literary town from the Duc du Maine, as prince sovereign of Dombes, transferring to this little town of Trevoux not only his parliament and other public institutions, but also establishing a magnificent printing house, in the beginning of the last century. All the literati of France may be said to have been engaged in perfecting this work, during a century. In this manner, from the humble beginnings of three volumes, in which the plagiarist much more than the contributor was visible, eight large folios were at length built up with more durable materials, and which claim the attention and the gratitude of the student.

The work, it appears, interested the government itself, as a national concern, from the tenor of the following anecdotes:—

Most of the minor contributors to this great collection were satisfied to remain anonymous; but, as might be expected among such a number, sometimes a contributor was anxious to be known to his circle, and did not like this penitential abstinence of fame. An anecdote recorded of this class will amuse. A Monsieur Lantour du Chatel, avocat au parlement de Normandie, voluntarily devoted his studious hours to improve this work, and furnished near three thousand articles to the supplement of the edition of 1752. This ardent scholar had had a lively quarrel, thirty years before, with the first authors of the Dictionary. He had sent them one thousand three hundred articles, on condition that the donor should be handsomely thanked in the preface of the new edition, and further receive a copy en grand papier. They were accepted. The conductors of the new edition, in 1721, forgot all the promises—nor thanks, nor copy! Our learned avocat, who was a little irritable, as his nephew, who wrote his life, acknowledges, as soon as the great work appeared, astonished, like Dennis, that "they were rattling his own thunder," without saying a word, quits his country town, and ventures, half dead with sickness and indignation, on an expedition to Paris, to make his complaint to the chancellor; and the work was deemed of that importance in the eye of government, and so zealous a contributor was considered to have such an honorable claim, that the chancellor ordered, first, that a copy on large paper should be immediately delivered to Monsieur Lantour, richly bound, and free of carriage; and secondly, as a reparation of the unperformed promise, and an acknowledgment of gratitude, the omission of thanks should be inserted and explained in the three great literary journals of France; a curious instance, among others, of the French government's often mediating, when difficulties occurred in great literary undertakings, and considering not lightly the claims and the honor of men of letters.

647. THE BIBLIOTHECA BRITANNICA.

The history of the Bibliotheca Britannica of Dr. Watt may serve as a mortifying example of the length of labor and the brevity of life. To this gigantic work the patient zeal of the writer had devoted twenty years. He had just arrived at the point of publication, when death folded down his last page. The son, who, during the last four years, had toiled under the direction of his father, was chosen to occupy his place. The work was in the progress of publication, when the son died; and strangers now reap the fruits of their combined labors.

648. JAMES TYTLER.

James Tytler was a man of extraordinary genius and extensive learning, but whose life is a melancholy instance of talents misapplied. A large portion of that additional matter, by which the Encyclopædia Britannica was extended from three to ten volumes, was the production of Tytler. The payment of this labor is said to have been very small, inasmuch that the poor author could not support his family in a style superior to that of a common laborer. At one time, during the progress of the work, he lived at the village of Duddington, in the house of a washerwoman, whose tub, inverted, formed the only desk he could command; and one of his children was frequently despatched with a parcel of copy, upon the proceeds of which depended the next meal of the family.

It is curious to reflect that the booksellers' proceeds from the work, which included so much of the poor man's labors, were, in the next ensuing edition, no less than £42,000. A man who has so little sense of natural dignity as to besot his senses by liquor, and who can so readily make his intellect subservient to the purposes of those who wish to employ his powers, can scarcely expect to be otherwise than poor; while his very poverty tends, by inducing dependence, to prevent him from gaining the proper reward of his labor.

649. NOAH WEBSTER AND HIS DICTIONARY.

Noah Webster, LL. D., the author of the American Spelling-book and of the American Dictionary of the English Language,—the former of which has been sold, before and since his death, to the extent of fifteen million copies, and the latter of which deserves to be vastly more popular than even the Spelling-book, — was, in many respects, a self-made or self-educated man. True, he had a course of instruction which prepared him, to some extent, at least, for the practice of the law, but not to write the American Spelling-book and Dictionary.

When Dr. Webster graduated, in 1778, his father, distressed like most men by the revolution, in which, by the way, both his son and himself had served, only gave him an eight dollar bill of continental money, worth, at that time, but one eighth of its nominal value, and bade him henceforth seek his support from his own exertions. With this one dollar in his pocket, he therefore went forth into the world; not as the world now is, but as it was in 1778.

His first effort was at school-keeping, especially winters. He was admitted to practise law in 1781, but did not immediately pursue his profession. In 1782, he taught a classical school in Goshen, in the State of New York.

It was this teaching school that began the work of his education for the great profession in which he afterwards so successfully labored. In 1783, he sent forth to the world his First, Second, and Third Parts, as they have usually been called; the first of which, as is well known, was his American Spelling-book. He did not commence the preparation of dictionaries till about the year 1806; and it was thirty-five years, after he began his great Dictionary, before he published the first edition, and to its perfection he gave the sixty years of his literary life.

During the time which he spent in preparing this magnificent volume, he and his family were sustained chiefly by his share of the profits on his Spelling-book; which, however, was less than one cent per copy.

His labors were great and arduous. Among other things, he investigated twenty original languages, and collected all the scattered rays of light those languages could afford him in the illustration of our own.

And we hazard little in saying, that the amount of intellectual labor recently bestowed on the revision of the work by Professor Goodrich and his assistants has been greater than that bestowed upon the entire composition of any other English dictionary since the days of Johnson. The research of days has sometimes been required to fix and express the meaning of a single word.

650. RHYMING DICTIONARIES.

The torture of rhyme-finding seems, says D'Israeli, to have occasioned a general affliction among modern poets; and an unhappy substitute was early found in finding collections of rhymes. In Gouget's Bibliothèque Française, vol. iii., will be found a catalogue of these rhyming dictionaries. The earliest of the French was published in 1572. Indeed, some of these French critics looked upon these rhyming dictionaries as part of the art of poetry, recommending pocket editions for those who were apt to poetize in their walks.

Among these early attempts is one by Paul Boyer. It is a kind of encyclopædia, in which all the names are arranged by their terminations, so that it furnishes a dictionary of rhymes.

The demand for rhymes seems to have continued; for, in 1660, D'Ablancourt Fremont published a Dictionnaire, which was enlarged by Richelet in 1667.

It seems the English have not been idle in thridding rhymes in their own country, for Poole, in 1657, in his Parnassus, furnishes a collection of rhymes; and he has had his followers. But the perfect absurdity or curiosity of a rhyming lexicographer appears in one of Walker's Dictionaries of the English language. As he was a skilful philologist, he has contrived to make it useful for orthography and pronunciation. He advances it as on a plan "not hitherto attempted;" and his volume, on the whole, as Moreri observes of Boyer's, is a thing "plaisant à considérer."

651. NOAH WEBSTER AND THE COUNTRY BOY

Some years ago, the great lexicographer passed through Eastern New York, on horseback, to visit a brother who lived in Madison county. When he had reached the town where his brother resided, he met a boy going to school, and the following conversation passed between them: "My son," said the learned doctor, "do you know where Mr. Webster lives?" "Yes, sir; and be you a relation of his?" "Yes." "Well," continued the boy, "you aint a brother of his is you?" "Yes." "Well, it can't no way, any how, be that you're the man that made the Spelling-book, can it?" "Yes." "O now!" rejoined the boy, as he gazed with awe-struck wonder upon the venerable doctor, "that's a fish story." The old gentleman often recurred to this incident, as one of the most pleasing reminiscences of a long horseback ride.

652. COBB'S LEXICON.

Lyman Cobb, in his Lexicon of the English Language, has a most excellent tact in defining and explaining words (which are differently spelt, but alike in pronunciation) by the introduction of anecdotes. For instance, the word "MADE, v. a. make.

MAID, s. an unmarried woman.

"Counsellor Green, during his cross examination of a prevaricating old female witness, by which it was essential to prove that a tender of money had been made, had a scrap of paper thrown him by the opposite counsel, on which was written, —

"'Garrow, submit. That tough old jade Can never prove a tender made!'"

Another

"To, prep. noting motion towards; as far as.

Too, ad. likewise, also.

Two, a. one and one; twice one; a couple.

"Three gentlemen meeting to sup at a hotel, one of them wished for partridges. A brace was accordingly brought, which he was requested to carve. On this, he took one to himself, and left the other for his friends. 'Hold,' cried one of them; 'that is not fair.' 'Perfectly fair, I think,' said the gentleman; 'there is one for you two, and here is one for me too.'"

A third.

"COUSIN, s. an uncle's child, or aunt's child.

COZEN, v. a. to cheat, to defraud.

"Call me cousin, but cozen me not."

DRAMA.

§ 73. HISTORICAL ITEMS.

653. ANCIENT PANTOMIMES.

THE endeavor of one or more individuals to express or relate any story by mere action was carried to much greater perfection among the ancients than now appears to be possible. According to Lucian, a single dancer or mime was able to express all the incidents and sentiments of a whole tragedy or epic poem by action, accompanied by music; and the fable of Proteus, he seemed to think, meant no more than that he was an accomplished pantomime. The education of a mime required, he says, his whole life to make himself master of his profession. He must know the past, the present, and what is to come; in short, the spectator must understand the dancer, though dumb, and hear him, though silent.

Lucian mentions a famous mime who played Ajax the madman so well, and raged in such a way, that one would have said he did not counterfeit, but was mad in reality. Timocrates, a tutor in philosophy, and who, from conscientious motives, had declined being present at such plays, by accident seeing a pantomime, cried out, "What admirable sights have I lost by a philosophical modesty!" and ever afterwards attended them.

This kind of scenic representation was given at funerals, and the actors were called archimimes. They went before the coffin, and imitated the gestures and actions of the deceased. His virtues and vices were depicted.

Demetrius the cynic disdained and railed at the art of the mime, declaring all the success was derived from the music; but a famous mime, in Nero's time, invited him to see him dance, and, having witnessed his performance, then to find fault with him. Having imposed silence on the music, he danced the story of the Amours of Mars and Venus; the discovery of them by the Sun. In short, so well was it done, that Demetrius, transported, cried out aloud, "I hear, my friend, what you act. I not only see the persons you represent, but methinks you speak with your hands."

654. THE ORIGIN OF HISSING.

Formerly there was no hissing in the theatre. The benevolent audience were contented to yawn and fall asleep. The invention of hissing is no older than 1680, and took place at the first representation of Aspar, a tragedy of Fontenelle. So we are told by the poet Roi, in his Brevet de la Calotte, where he says, in speaking of Fontenelle, —

"Auteur d'Aspar, œuvre immortelle, Par le Sifflet, qui sortit d'elle."

655. THE FRENCH THEATRE.

The French theatre owes its origin to the religious exhibitions given by pilgrims on their return from Palestine. At these exhibitions, the pilgrims gave an account of the remarkable places of the Holy Land, and recited their own adventures. They were afterwards imitated by those who had never been to the Holy Land, and are still practised in Catholic countries by priests in their churches, by kings in their palaces, and by the pope in the Vatican. To these succeeded the mysteries — dramatic representations of subjects taken from the New Testament, which, being forbidden by the Provost of Paris, the priests invited the king to be present at an exhibition, to prove that they were calculated to excite religious feelings. The building in which they were performed was divided into three scaffoldings; the highest representing paradise, the next the world, and the lowest, which was in the form of a dragon's head, representing hell. The only entrance to the two upper scaffoldings was through the dragon's head. The actors never left the stage, even to change their dress. The pieces were so long as to require several days for their representation. At the close of each evening, the audience were invited to return, till the whole was finished. Some occupied forty nights. Though considered as religious ceremonies at first, the mysteries became finally so gross as to be forbidden by act of Parliament.

656. ENCORES.

The first encore on record was that given to Livius Andronicus, a Roman actor, who, according to Valerius Maximus, was called back so often to repeat his speeches, that he, in self-defence, brought a boy to declaim for him, while he himself supplied the gesture.

657. EDWARD III. REGULATING PLAYS.

Edward III. ordained that a company of men, called vagrants, should be whipped out of London, because they represented scandalous, foolish things, in alehouses and other places, to crowds of people. This severe edict put the players upon contriving religious representations; for, a few years after, the clergy and scholars of St. Paul's school petitioned Richard II. "to prohibit a company of unexpert people from representing the history of the Old Testament, to the great prejudice of the said clergy, who have been at great charge and expense in order to represent it publicly at Christmas."

656. THE FIRST ENGLISH COMEDY.

Our literary antiquaries long doted on the first English comedy, Gammar Gurton's Needle, being a regular comedy, in five acts, in rhyme. The rusticity of the materials is remarkable. A diligent crone, darning the lower habiliments of Hodge, loses her needle—

"A little thing, with a hole in the end, as bright as any silver, [silver,] Small, long, sharp at the point, and strait as any pillar."

Had a needle not been a domestic instrument of more rarity than it is since Birmingham flourished, we had not had such a pointed and polished description. In fact, the loss of the gammar's needle sets the whole village in flames; the spark falling from the mischievous waggonery of a Tom o' Bedlam in an artful insinuation against a certain gossip, notable for the luxuriance of her grotesque invectives. Dame Chat is a scold, whose curses and oaths neither the fish-market or Shakspeare himself could have gone beyond. Brawls and battles involve the justice, the curate, and the devil himself in their agency. The prime author of all the mischief produces the catastrophe; for he contrives to make Hodge extract from a part more tender than his heart the cause of so much discord, with great risk to its point and straightness. And the parties conclude,—

"For Gammar Gurton's needle's sake let us have a FLAUNT!"

The writer of this extraordinary, and long-supposed-to-be earliest, comedy in our language, the title-page informs us, was Mr. S——, M. A.; and, moreover, that it was acted at the University of Cambridge. When afterwards it was ascertained that Mr. S. was no less a person than John Still, subsequently Bishop of Bath and Wells, it did not diminish the number of its admirers. The black-letter brotherhood were long enamoured of this most ancient comedy, as a genuine beauty of the infancy of the drama. Dodsley and Hawkins enshrined Gammar Gurton's Needle in their Reliquary; and literary superstition "Swore it was the relic of a saint."

This ancient comedy is the work of a truly comic genius, who knew not how to choose his subject, and indulged a taste repulsive to those who only admit of delicate, and not familiar humor. Its grossness, however, did not necessarily result from the prevalent grossness of the times; since a recent discovery has shown the world that an English comedy, which preceded the hitherto supposed first comedy in our language, is remarkable for its chasteness, the propriety of its great variety of characters, the truth of the manners in a wide circle of society, and the uninterrupted gayety pervading the whole airy composition.

So recently as in 1818, an ancient printed drama, styled Ralph Roister Doister, was discovered; a legitimate comedy, of five acts, in rhyme, and, as the writer himself professes, modelled on the dramas of Plautus and Terence. He claims for it the honor of the highest class—that of comedy; but this term was then so indistinct, that the poet adds the more usual one of interlude.

Gammar Gurton is a representation of sordid rusticity. Roister Doister opens the movable scenery of domestic life in the metropolis, touched with care and warmed with reality. The plot, without involution, progresses through the acts. An egotistical and affectedly amorous harebrain, ever lamenting the dangerous beauty of his ridiculous self, fancies to marry a fair dame. He is hit off as

"So fervent hot wooing, and so far from wiving,
I throw, never was any creature living."

He is the whetstone of a sharp parasite, whose opening monologue exhibits his full portrait.

"But know ye, that for all this merry note of mine,
He might oppose me now that should ask where I dine."

He runs over a nomenclature of a most variegated acquaintance, with some fugitive strictures exquisitely personal. We find ourselves in a more advanced stage in society than we expected in the reigns of the last Henry or Edward. Such personages abounded in the twenty years of peace and luxury under James I., when the obsequious hanger-on flourished among the town heroes of the Gull's Horn-book. This parasite is, also, one of those domestic dependants whose shrewdness and artifices supply a perpetual source of comic invention; such as those found among the Latin dramatists, whose scenes and incidents are Grecian, and from whom this Matthew Merry-greek seems, by his name, happily transplanted. This poet delights by scenes colored with the truth of nature, and by the clear conception of his domestic personages. There is a group of domestics, the ancient housekeeper spinning on her distaff, amid her maidens, some sewing, some knitting, all in free chat. These might have formed a study for the vivid Teniers, and even for Shakspeare in his happiest vein. They are not the domestics of Swift and of Mandeville—the spoilers of the establishment. Not that they are without the common feelings of the servants' hall; for they have at heart the merry prosperity of their commonwealth. After their "drudgerie," to dissipate their "weariness" was the fundamental principle of the freedom of servitude. Their course is "lovingly to agree." A pleasant song, on occasion of the reception of "a new-come man" in the family, reveals the "mystery" of their ancient craft.

This song may have been written about the close of the reign of Henry VIII. The short ballad metres, in our ancient poems, are perfectly harmonious, and the songs are racy and joyous.

"A thing very fitt
For them that have witte,
And are felowes knitte,
Servants in one house to bee;
As fast for to sitte,
And not oft to flitte,
Nor varie a whitte,
But lovingly to agree.

"No man complainyng,
No other disdainyng,
For losse or for gainyng,
But felowes or friends to be;
No grudge remainyng,
No work refrainyng,
No helpe restrainyng,
But lovingly to agree.

"No man for despite,
By worde or by write,
His felowe to twite,
But further in honestie;
No good turns entreite,
Nor old sores recite,
But let all goe quite,
And lovingly to agree.

"After drudgerie,
When they be werie,

Then to be merie,
To laugh and sing they be free;
With chip and cherrie,
High derie, derie,
Toll on the berie,
And lovingly to agree.

The fate of some books is as remarkable as the histories of some men. This lorn and lost drama, deprived even of its title and the printer's name, offered no clew to the fine genius who composed it; and the possessor who deposited it in the library of Eton College was not at all aware of its claim to be there preserved. It was to subsequent research, after the reprint had been made, that both the writer and the celebrity of his comedy were indisputably ascertained.

659. THE FIRST ENGLISH TRAGEDY.

In the transition from the simpler interlude to the aggrandizement of a more complicated scene, and more numerous personages, so indistinct were the notions of tragedy and comedy, that the writer of a morality, in 1578, declaring that his purpose was to represent "the manners of men and fashion of the world now-a-days," distinguishes his drama both as "a pleasant tragedy" and "a pitiful comedy." This play, indeed, may be placed among the last of the ancient dramas; and it is probable that the author considered that these vague impressions might serve to designate a superior order of dramatic productions.

The term comedy was as indefinite in France as with ourselves. Margaret of Valois, in 1544, gave the title of comedy to such scriptural pieces as the Nativity, the Adoration of the Kings, and the Massacre of the Innocents; and in Spain, at the same period, they also called their moral pieces comedies. Comedy was the general appellation for a play. Shakspeare himself calls the play of the players in Hamlet both a tragedy and a comedy. It is quite evident that at this period they had no distinct conception of comedy merely as a pleasant exhibition of society. Aristotle had not afforded them a correct description in our sense, drawing his notions from the old comedy, those personal satires or farcical lampoons acted on the Athenian stage.

To this day we remain still unsatisfied what Dante meant by calling his great poem a Commedia.

While these indistinct notions of tragedy and comedy were prevalent with us, even long after we had a public theatre, we really possessed tragedy and comedy in their more classical form; tragedy, which soared to the sententiousness of Seneca; and comedy, which sported with Plautus and Terence.

We owe this first TRAGEDY in our language, represented before the queen in 1561, by the gentlemen of the Inner Temple, to the master spirit who planned the Mirror for Magistrates, and left as its model the Induction. Sackville, Lord Buckhurst, the first Earl of Dorset, in that national poem had struck with the nerve of Chaucer, while he anticipated the grave melodious stanza and the picturing invention of Spenser. But called away from the land of the Muses to the political cabinet, this fine genius seems repeatedly to have consigned his works to the hands of others; even his lighter productions are still concealed from us in their anonymous condition. As in the Mirror for Magistrates, Sackville had resigned that noble scheme to inferior names, so in this tragedy of Ferrex and Porrex, or, as it was sometimes entitled, the Tragedy of Gorbodue, while his genius struck out the same originality of plan, yet the title-page informs us that he accepted a coadjutor in Thomas Norton, who, as much as we know of him in other things, was a worthy partner of Sternhold and Hopkins.

In this first tragedy in our language, cast in the mould of classical antiquity, we find a division of scenes and a progressive plot carried on, though somewhat heavily, through five acts; the ancient ethical choruses are preserved, changing their metres with rhyme. And here, for the first time, blank verse was recited on the stage.

Notwithstanding these novel refinements, our first tragedy bears a strong impress of ancient simplicity. Every act was preceded by "a dumb show," prefiguring the incidents of the opening act; these scenical displays of something considered to be analogous to the matter were remains of the pageants.

Blank verse, which the Earl of Surrey had first invented for his version of Virgil, the Earl of Dorset now happily applied to the dramatic dialogue. To both these noblemen our poets owe their emancipation from rhyme; but the rhythmical artifices of blank verse were not discovered in the monotonous, uncadenced lines of its inventors. The happiest inventor does not overcome all difficulties.

A political anecdote concerning this tragedy is worth recording. In the discussions of the dangers and mischiefs of such a state of insubordination, the poet, adopting the prevalent notions of the divine right and the authority of "the absolute king," inculcates the doctrine of passive obedience. These lines, which appear in the first edition, were silently removed from the latter ones. It is an evidence that these dreary principles, which, in the following reigns of James and Charles, produced such fatal misunderstandings, even at this time began to be questioned.

660. FIRST AMERICAN TRAGEDY.

The first tragedy written on this continent was from the pen of Benjamin Coleman, while studying in Harvard College. It was entitled Gustavus Vasa, and was enacted at Harvard at a regular commencement. Coleman studied divinity and settled at Boston. He was eloquent and affectionate, and was called upon to pronounce the eulogies of most of the great men who died in his time. His published sermons are one hundred in number; and from these the materials have principally been furnished for the biographies of the illustrious men of the "old colonies."

§ 74. BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES AND INCIDENTS.

661. SOPHOCLES

If Æschylus be styled, as he usually has been, the father, Sophocles certainly demands the title of the master, of tragedy, since what the former brought into the world the other reduced to a more regular form.

Sophocles was five and twenty when he conquered his master, Æschylus, in tragedy. Cimon, the Athenian general, having found the bones of Theseus, and brought these noble relics with pomp into the city, a contention of tragedians was appointed, as was usual upon extraordinary occasions. Æschylus and Sophocles were the two rivals, and the prize was adjudged to Sophocles, although it was the first play he ever presented in public.

Cicero relates that this great man continued the profession of his art even to his latest years; but his sons resented this severe application to writing, as a neglect of his family and his estate. On this account, they at last brought the business into court before the judges, and petitioned the guardianship of their father, as one that was grown a dotard, and therefore incapable of managing his concerns. The aged poet, being acquainted with the motion, in order to his defence appeared in court, and recited his Œdipus of Colonus, a tragedy he had just before finished, and then desired to know whether that piece looked like the work of a dotard. There needed no other plea in his favor, for the judges, admiring and applauding his talent, not only acquitted him of the charge, but, as Lucian adds, voted his sons madmen for accusing him. The general story of his death is, that having exhibited his last play, and obtained the prize, he fell into such a transport of joy as carried him off; but Lucian differs from the common report, and affirms that he was choked with a grape-stone, like Anacreon.

The passion which Sophocles entertained for the drama often displayed itself superior to every feeling of personal interest or vanity. He appeared once on the stage in the character of a mere domestic, who has not a word to utter, but only to play at ball; in order that, by his peculiar skill in the art, he might give the last finishing grace to the representation of the tragedy. He probably thought with our poet, that "Honor and shame from no condition rise:

Act well your part; there all the honor lies."

662. EURIPIDES

Euripides, the contemporary and rival of Sophocles, had originally devoted himself to the study of philosophy; but warned, by the fate of his master, Anaxagoras, (who, under the accusation of despising the public gods, was banished from Athens by the mob,) of the danger which then attended all free inquiry, he transferred his attention to dramatic poetry. Yet, although he had the fate of Anaxagoras before his eyes, he was not always so well guarded in his remarks as he should have been. He hazarded one relating to the sanctity of an oath, in his Hippolytus, which brought him into danger: "My tongue has sworn, but still my mind is free." For this verse he was impeached of impiety, as teaching and defending perjury; but it does not appear that he was punished for it. The answer he made to the accuser is left upon record by Aristotle: "that it was a very unreasonable thing to bring a cause into a court of judicature, which belonged only to the cognizance of a theatre, and the liberty of a public festival; that when these words were spoken upon the stage, there went along with them some reason to justify them, and that he was ready to justify them whenever the bill should be preferred in the right place." Another time, Seneca informs us, he incensed the audience highly, by making Bellerophon dogmatize too gravely in favor of avarice; so much so, indeed, that they would have driven the actor from the stage, if Euripides himself had not appeared, and besought them to have a little patience, by assuring them that they would soon see the unhappy end of the miser whose maxims had so highly disgusted the audience.

In general, however, his pieces were extravagantly applauded; and nothing can better demonstrate the high esteem they were in than the service they did to the Athenians in Sicily. The Athenian army, under the command of Nicias, suffered all the calamities of unsuccessful war, and the victors took a most cruel advantage of their victories; but although they treated the Athenian soldiers with so much inhumanity, yet they are said to have spared such as could repeat any verses of Euripides. "We are told," says Plutarch, "that many who returned safe to their country kindly saluted Euripides, declaring that they had been restored to their liberty for teaching their victors such of his verses as they remembered, and that others, who roamed up and down, had meat and drink given them in return for singing his verses."

663. TERENCE.

Terence, although one of the purest of the Roman writers, was of African origin. He was a native of Carthage, and brought early to Rome among other slaves; but fell into the hands of a generous master, Terentius Lucanus, who gave him first a good education, and afterwards his liberty. Agreeably to a custom of the Romans, he took the name of his master; and thus, by a singular facility, says Madame Dacier, while he has immortalized the name of his master, he has not been able to preserve his own.

When Terence offered his first play, Cæcilius was not only the oldest, but considered the best poet of the age; much regard was therefore paid to his judgment; and the ædile, before he would look at Terence's production, told him to wait upon Cæcilius, and take his opinion upon it. The old gentleman, being at table, bade the young author take a stool, and begin to read it to him. It is observed by Suetonius, that Terence's dress was mean, so that his outside did not much recommend him; but he had not gone through the first scene, when Cæcilius was so pleased, that he invited him to sit at table with him, and defer the reading of the remainder of the play till after supper. Cæcilius, on hearing it to the end, found only more and more reason to admire; he dismissed the author with a most flattering testimonial of his approbation; the play was brought out, and attended with a success which at once established Terence's fame as a dramatic writer.

The plays of Terence appear to have brought him in very large sums. He received eight thousand sesterces for his Eunuchus, which was acted twice in one day, a piece of good fortune which perhaps never happened to any other play; for plays with the Romans were never designed to serve above two or three times. For the rest he was no doubt equally well paid, since it appears from the prologue to the Hecyra, that the poets used to be paid every time their play was acted. At this rate Terence must have made a handsome fortune before he died, for most of his plays were acted more than once in his lifetime; and yet a notion has prevailed — for what reason it is difficult to discover — that he died in poverty. He left a daughter, who was afterwards married to a Roman knight, and it is certain that he left also a house and gardens on the Appian Way, near the Villa Martis.

664. CORNEILLE.

Corneille, whom his countrymen delight to call the Shakspeare of France, was brought up to the bar, which he attended some little time; but having no turn for business, he soon deserted it. At this time, he had given the public no specimen of his talents for poetry, nor does he appear to have been conscious of possessing any. A love affair is said to have given occasion to his first production, the comedy of Mélite; and he is reported to have felt quite astonished to find himself the author of a piece, of an entirely new species, as well as at the prodigious success with which it was acted. After so happy an essay, he continued to produce several other comedies of the same kind; all of them inferior, indeed, to the tragedies which he afterwards wrote, and infinitely so to the works of Molière, but much superior to any thing which the French had hitherto seen. His Medea, a tragedy, came forth next, which met with no great success; but in 1637, he presented the Cid, another tragedy, in which he showed the world how high his genius was capable of rising. All Europe has seen and admired the Cid, for it has been translated into almost all languages; but the reputation which he acquired by this play drew most of the wits of his time into a confederacy against it. Some affected to treat it contemptuously; others wrote against it. Cardinal Richelieu himself is said to have been one of the cabal, and, though he had settled a pension upon the poet, could not abstain from secret attempts against his play. It was supposed to be under his influence that the French Academy drew up that critique upon it, entitled, "Sentiments of the French Academy upon the Tragi-comedy of Cid;" in which, however, while they censured some parts, they did not scruple to praise it very highly in others. Corneille now endeavored to support the vast reputation he had gained by many admirable performances in succession, which, as Bayle observes, "carried the French theatre to its highest pitch of glory, and assuredly much higher than the ancient one of Athens." He had, notwithstanding, still to contend with the bad taste of the most fashionable wits. When he read his Polyeucte, one of his best tragedies, before a company of these personages where Voiture presided, it was very coldly received, and Voiture afterwards told him, it was the opinion of his friends that the play would not succeed.

Racine, in a speech made to the French Academy in the beginning of 1685, does great justice to Corneille's talents. After representing the miserable state in which the French theatre then was, that it was without order, decency, sense, or taste, he passes to the sudden reformation effected by Corneille, "a man who possessed at once all those extraordinary talents which form a great poet — art, force, judgment, and wit. Nor can any one sufficiently admire the greatness of his sentiments, the skill he shows in the economy of his subjects, his masterly way of moving the passions, the dignity, and at the same time the vast variety of his characters."

This encomium must have the more weight, since it comes from the only man in the world who has been considered as Corneille's rival; and from one, too, who had some reasons for not entertaining the most grateful recollection of the author of the Cid. For we are told by Valencour, who had the fact from Racine himself, that when he read his first play of Alexandra to Corneille, he was advised by him to apply himself to any other kind of writing rather than the drama, to which his genius was not at all adapted. "Corneille," adds Valencour, "was incapable of low jealousy; if he spoke so to Racine, it is certain that he thought so. But we know also that he preferred Lucan to Virgil; whence we must conclude that the art of writing excellent verse, and the art of judging excellently of poets and poetry, do not always meet in the same person."

665. MOLIERE'S FIRST BIAS FOR THE STAGE.

Accident determined the taste of Molière for the stage. His grandfather loved the theatre, and frequently carried him there. The young man lived in dissipation; the father, observing it, asked in anger if his son was to be made an actor. "Would to God," replied the grandfather, "he was as good an actor as Montrose." The words struck young Molière; he took a disgust to his tapestry, and it is to this circumstance that France owes her greatest comic writer.

666. SCHILLER.

The celebrated German poet Schiller composed his play of the Robbers when at school at Stutgard: the seminary was governed by strict military regulations, which naturally irritated and oppressed the proud and daring spirit of Schiller. All books not within the routine of school study were strictly proscribed. Schiller braved the restrictions, and read and ruminated at night over the works of Plutarch, Ossian, Young, Goethe, and, above all, Shakspeare, till his favorite authors fell, one by one, into the hands of the inspectors. The histories of Greece and Rome still remained to him, and his ardent imagination constantly dwelt among their patriots and heroes. He now composed the dialogue between the shades of Brutus and Cæsar, which Charles Moor used to sing in the Robbers: while employed on the play, he used to recite scenes and speeches, to the great delight of his schoolfellows. One day, as he was declaiming, with great energy, the scene (now omitted) in which Francis Moor, tortured by suspicion, says to Moses, "Ha! what, know'st thou none? reflect — death, heaven, eternity, perdition, hang on the words of thy mouth," the inspector opened the door, inquiring, in an angry tone, what boy was in such a passion, and swearing so dreadfully. The youthful audience all laughed; and when the inspector departed, Schiller bawled out the next words of the part with double emphasis, "Ein confiscirter kerl!" "a confiscated fellow!" He wrote an able probation essay, on the Connection between the Physical and Intellectual Nature of Man; which procured him a license as a regimental physician, on quitting the academy. In this essay, he quoted a passage from the Robbers, then in manuscript, calling it, "a popular English Drama, called the Robbers." The play was soon after acted at Mannheim, with great applause. Schiller commenced other dramatic works, and very soon left Stuttgart and his profession. He repaired to Mannheim, and devoted himself entirely to literature.

667. SKETCH OF SHAKSPEARE.

William Shakspeare

Those who are fond of tracing great events to little causes see the origin of Shakspeare's glory in his being compelled to quit the country for having first assisted in robbing Sir Thomas Lucy's park, and afterwards lampooning him in a ballad. But Shakspeare's genius was not born to blush unseen, and sooner or later must have burst every trammel with which it was fettered.

When Shakspeare fled to London, the natural bent of his wit and humor threw him among the players. He was a stranger, and ignorant of the art, and he was glad to enter the company in a very subordinate situation; nor did his performance as an actor recommend him to any distinguished notice.

The part of an actor, however, neither engaged nor deserved the attention of Shakspeare, who soon turned the advantage which that situation afforded him to a higher and nobler use. Having made himself acquainted with the mechanical economy of the theatre, his native genius supplied the rest. Thus did Shakspeare set out with little advantage of education, no advice or assistance from persons more learned than himself, and entirely destitute of patronage.

Shakspeare, however, was not long without friends; for to be the acknowledged patron of a man of his genius was to receive, not confer, an honor. The Earl of Southampton distinguished himself by his generosity to the immortal bard; and even Queen Elizabeth expressed herself so much pleased with the character he had drawn of Sir John Falstaff, in the two parts of Henry IV., that she commanded the author to continue it for one play more, and to show the knight in love, which he executed inimitably in the Merry Wives of Windsor.

In 1603, Shakspeare, in conjunction with Burbage, Heminge, Fletcher, Condel, and others, obtained a license from King James I., authorizing them to act plays, not only at their usual house, the Globe, on the Bankside, but in any other part of the kingdom, during his majesty's pleasure. Now the theatre seemed to rise to the height of its glory and reputation, dramatic authors abounded, there were several very eminent players, and every year produced a number of new plays. Shakspeare continued to be a principal manager of the playhouse; until, having acquired such a fortune as satisfied his moderate wishes and views in life, he quitted the stage, and passed the remainder of his life in an honorable ease at his native town of Stratford-on-Avon, where he lived until the 23d of April, 1616, when he paid the great debt of nature, and "shuffled off this mortal coil," in the 53d year of his age. It is a remarkable circumstance that Cervantes died on the same day as Shakspeare.

668. BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.

Winstanley relates that Beaumont and Fletcher meeting once at a tavern, in order to form the rude draught of a tragedy, Fletcher undertook to kill the King, and that his words being overheard by a waiter, they were seized, and charged with high treason; but when it was discovered that the plot was only against a theatrical king, the affair ended in mirth.

Beaumont and Fletcher, with the advantage of Shakspeare's wit, which was their precedent, had great natural gifts, improved by study. Beaumont, especially, was so accurate a judge of plays, that Ben Jonson, while he lived, submitted all his writings to his examination, and, it is thought, used his judgment in correcting, if not in contriving all his plots. The first play that brought Fletcher and him in esteem was their Philaster. Their plots were generally more regular than Shakspeare's, especially those which were made before Beaumont's death; and they understood and imitated the conversation of gentlemen much better. Humour they did not attempt to describe.

Dryden tells us that Beaumont and Fletcher's plays, in his time, were the most pleasant and frequent entertainments, two of them being acted through the year for one of Shakspeare's or Jonson's; and the reason he assigns is, because there is a certain gayety in their comedies, and a pathos in their most serious plays, which suit generally with all men's humor. The case, however, is now reversed; for Beaumont and Fletcher's are not acted above once for fifty times that the plays of Shakspeare are represented.

669. SKETCH OF SIR WILLIAM DAVENANT

Sir William Davenant, by many supposed the natural son of Shakspeare, succeeded Ben Jonson as poet laureate in 1637, and obtained a patent for a company of comedians from King Charles, and was knighted by that monarch. He was accounted a great poet in several branches of that science: his poem of Gondibert is esteemed a noble poem, which he wrote in France during his exile with King Charles II. His works are printed in folio, (1673,) which contains seventeen dramatic pieces, besides his poems. Sir William was the first contriver of painted scenes in our English theatres, as well as one of the first introducers of singing operas. There is a work of this kind whose title runs thus: "The cruelty of the Spaniards in Peru, expressed by instrumental and vocal music, and by art of perspective in scenes, at the Cockpit in Drury Lane, at three in the afternoon, 1658."

670. CIBBER AND POPE.

Colley Cibber was intended for the church; but, instead of going to a university, he was obliged to take up arms in favor of the Prince of Orange, during the revolution, in 1687. Soon after this, he went on the stage, for which he had conceived an early inclination, but did not meet with much encouragement at first, his salary being only ten shillings per week. Goodman, an old celebrated actor, having seen him play the chaplain in the Orphan, declared, with an oath, that he would one day make a good actor; which commendation filled Colley with no little exultation. His salary was now augmented to fifteen shillings. In consequence of the indisposition of Kyneston, who was to have played Lord Touchwood, (Double Dealer,) he undertook that character at a day's notice, and performed it so well before Queen Mary, that he was highly complimented by Mr. Congreve, the author, and his salary was increased to twenty shillings. He next distinguished himself in Fondlewife, the Old Bachelor, afterwards in Sir Novelty Fashion, in his own and first play, Love's Last Shift, (1695.) His performance of the fop was so great, that he was never thought to have his equal in those characters. The Careless Husband is reckoned the best comedy he ever produced; in which he performed Lord Foppington, and Mrs. Oldfield Lady Betty Modish, (1704.) By his play of the Nonjuror, (1717,) he incurred the resentment of the enemies of government, but was in consequence thereof made poet laureate, in 1730; at which time he quitted the stage, though he occasionally appeared on it afterwards. In tragedy writing he was unsuccessful; but his comedies, though chiefly borrowed from others, were in general well received. He collected and published his plays in two volumes quarto. His muse and spouse, as he says himself, were equally prolific; for the one was seldom the mother of a child but in the same year the other made him father of a play. His chief enemy was Mr. Pope, who made him the hero of his Dunciad; but Colley bore all his invectives with good humor, and was frequently revenged on this sublime poet by his sallies of mirth, especially as Pope's disposition was ill calculated to bear his jokes; but Cibber, like the generality of successful dramatists, who are chiefly indebted to managerial power for their fame, was jealous of all rival authors. He never encouraged young writers; for it was his delight, according to his own phrase, "to crush those singing birds." It seems the first offence which Mr. Cibber gave Mr. Pope was his introducing in the characters of Bays (the Rehearsal) an extemporary allusion to an unsuccessful piece, called Three Hours after Marriage, in which Mr. Pope had assisted Dr. Arbuthnot and Mr. Gay. The audience, by a roar of applause, approved of Cibber's wit, which was resented by Mr. Pope, behind the scenes. This celebrated poet having in his Dunciad attacked Cibber for libertinism, the actor retaliated, and did not a little chagrin his satirist by declaring that to him the public were chiefly indebted for Mr. Pope's elegant translation of Homer, which he proved by a ridiculous story, in which he informed the public that soon after Pope commenced translating Homer, he had interfered in an illicit gallantry of the poet's, which otherwise might have fixed upon him a malady that would have closed up his literary labors! So, he intimated, the world were doubtless obliged to the kindly care of Colley for the completion of the great work of Homer translated.

Of Milman, the editor of Poets of the Nineteenth Century says,—

"This eminent dramatic poet was born in London, on the 10th of February, 1791, and was the youngest son of Sir Francis Milman, a physician of high reputation. He was first sent to school at Greenwich, where he had for his early instructor the talented Dr. Burney, under whose excellent tuition he made great proficiency in the elements of literature; after which he was removed to Eton, where he remained nine years. In 1810, he became a student of Brazen Nose College, Oxford, where his previous acquirements and continued diligence gained him the highest literary reputation; and there he obtained the greatest number of prizes that had ever fallen to the lot of any single scholar within these halls. One of them was for English, and another for Latin verse; and the third and fourth for English and Latin essays. After a career of such distinction, the path of life was open to the successful scholar, and in 1815 he obtained a fellowship in that college where his literary honors had been won. In 1817, he entered into holy orders, and was presented to the vicarage of St. Mary, in the town of Reading. Here he employed himself in the duties of his sacred calling until he was elected to an office which he was so well qualified to adorn; this was the professorship of poetry in the University of Oxford, to which he was appointed in 1821. The life of the learned and reverend professor, as an author, notwithstanding this brief abstract, has been sufficiently distinguished by active exertion. Before he entered into orders, he wrote the Tragedy of Fazio, a work constructed upon the old English dramatic model; and the attempt was so successful, that the play was performed at Drury Lane to crowded houses, and still continues to be a favorite on the stage. The work itself exhibits a rich vein of poetry, and abounds in striking situations; so that it also pleases in the closet, notwithstanding the awkwardness of the plot, and occasional inconsistency of the characters. His next production, which appeared in 1820, was the Fall of Jerusalem. This magnificent topic had been brooded over by Coleridge for years, as the subject of an epic poem, in which the importance of the event, the thrilling nature of its incidents, and the grandeur of its antecedents and consequences, would have furnished materials only of secondary importance to those of Paradise Lost; but it was the misfortune of Coleridge to dream of great literary enterprises which he wanted industry to achieve.

The subject remained unoccupied until it fell into the hands of Milman, who converted it into a sacred drama, in which, attentive to dramatic unities, he has confined the time of action to thirty-six hours; but within that brief space he has collected such an amount of description and incident as leaves us little to regret for the non-appearance of the promised epic. His other productions were Anne Boleyn, a dramatic poem, in which the character of Henry VIII., and the Jesuit, Angelo Caraffa, are delineated with great power of description; the Martyr of Antioch, where we have the lovely picture of a young female only a little lower than the angels; and Belshazzar, in which he has contrasted, with the strongest light and shade, the last night of pomp and revelry in Babylon, and the tremendous ruin in which it was closed. Besides these productions, Milman wrote an epic poem in twelve books, entitled Samor, Lord of the Bright City; but this work, although exhibiting many passages of great power and richness, is defective in clearness and interest as a narrative, and has never become a favorite with the public. Although the drama has been his chosen department, Milman is defective in that quality which is the most essential element in dramatic writing—the sweeping vehemence and passion which are so necessary to convert poetical abstractions into living realities. But if he is somewhat cold and artificial as a mere dramatist, he atones for this defect by his high qualities as a poet—grandeur of imagery, depth of thought, and rich melody of language, by which the lyrical passages of his plays are among the noblest specimens of our modern poetry. We may add, that he is a bright refutation of Dr. Johnson's idea, that religion is unfitted for poetical purposes. A single page of any of Milman's sacred dramas is a conclusive argument upon this head. It is enough, for instance, to allude to his hymn of Miriam, in the Fall of Jerusalem."

§ 75. FIRST EFFORTS.

672. MOLIERE'S EXCHANGE OF TRAGEDY FOR COMEDY.

Molière, in the early part of his career as a poet, did not discover the true bent of his genius, but, still more unfortunate, he imagined that his most suitable character was tragic. He wrote a tragedy, and he acted in a tragedy. The tragedy he composed was condemned at Bourdeaux; the mortified poet flew to Grenoble. Still the unlucky tragedy haunted his fancy; he looked on it with paternal eyes, in which there were tears. Long after, when Racine, a youth, offered him a very unactable tragedy, Molière presented him with his own: "Take this; for I am convinced that the subject is highly tragic, notwithstanding my failure." The great dramatic poet of France opened his career by recomposing the condemned tragedy of the comic wit, in La Thébaïde.

673. A LOVE STORY BEHIND THE SCENES.

The Bouquet de l'Infante, at the Opera Comique, Paris, met with success, a little from its own merit, more from its being the production of the son of one who was so long and so deservedly a popular favorite, and most of all from the romantic history of its composition. The young composer had formed an attachment to a young lady of fortune, the daughter of one of the Parisian dilettanti.

"It is not enough, young man, that you should have inherited your father's name and fortune; you should show the world that you have succeeded to his talent likewise," was the answer of the old musician to all the tender appeals of the lover.

Finding the father resolute, Adrian Boieldieu set about his task, and composed the Bouquet de l'Infante, with what terrible misgivings you can well imagine. But fortune for once was on the side of true love; the piece was successful; and on the very night of its début, the obstinate old Geronimo received its composer as the affianced husband of his daughter.

674. JOLY'S FIRST PLAY.

The French dramatist Joly was the son of a keeper of a coffee-house in Paris, where a sort of literary club was wont to meet. One evening, a tale of Madame de Murat's was the subject of their conversation; and the warm encomiums they united in bestowing upon it arrested, in an extraordinary degree, the attention of Joly. As soon as the club broke up, he retired to his bedroom, spent the night in writing, and, before morning, had contrived the plan of a drama in verse, and advanced a considerable way in its composition. A few days more enabled him to complete his work, which, to the astonishment of his father's literary guests, he put into their hands at their next meeting, requesting their opinion of it. The proposal of having the performance read excited, at first, only the merriment of the assembled critics; but its merits were soon felt and acknowledged; and, when it had been heard to the end, there was only one opinion as to the certainty of its success, if it should be represented on the stage. Accordingly, the piece, entitled a School for Lovers, in three acts, was brought out, and received with great applause. Joly now gave himself up to literature; but, although he afterwards produced several other dramatic compositions, it is remarked that scarcely any of them equalled his first perform-terous applause, to save it from that damnation which it would otherwise meet with on the first night; while I, unknown, and without interest, must trust to the good taste and liberality of the audience for my success.

"At length the moment came when my fate was to be decided. The music had ceased; the fatal bell had rung; and after the cry of 'Hats off' in the gallery, all was quiet—you might have heard a pin drop in the theatre. I sat in breathless expectation, feeling those sensations which an author alone can feel. The first two or three scenes passed off tolerably. I watched the countenances of the audience; some, I thought, expressed that they were eagerly looking for something better. The applause was sparing,—although the performers did their duty,—and gradually diminished. Soon a slight buzz of disapprobation ran round the house; a person next me asked his neighbor if he did not wonder how the manager could have the impudence to bring such trash before the public; and judge of my feelings, gentle reader, when the same good-natured friend remarked on one of my best jokes, on the originality of which I prized myself, 'Our author seems to have borrowed largely from Joe Miller; I have not heard one joke or pun in the play which I have not read a dozen times before.' I could scarcely refrain myself from telling him flatly that he lied. At length the stifled feelings of the audience burst forth, and the gods belched forth their thunder: hisses, groans, and cries of 'Off! off!' were heard in every direction; and to add to my misery, the manager stepped forth, eyeing me with a look which almost petrified me, and promised that the play should not be repeated. Half mad, I rushed out of the box, and heard two flat, vulgar-looking tradesmen discussing the merits of my unfortunate play. One of them said, 'Well, now, it may be bad taste, but I don't think that that ere piece be so much amiss; I like it.' I could hardly resist rushing forth and shaking him by the hand. In the words of Otway, 'I could have hugged the greasy rogues! they pleased me.' I soon found myself at my lodgings, sadly musing on the scene which had passed, and firmly resolving never to send another play where it could not be fully appreciated. This was the fate of my first attempt, when, with little interest, and less money, I took it to the manager. But now, having acquired a name, and having some interest, which is every thing to an author, I have several times met with decided success, although many of my productions which have been successful were, at least in my opinion, very inferior to my 'first play.'"

675. MY FIRST PLAY.

"It will not be much longer," I muttered," says I. J. B. Turner, "as I buttoned up to the top my almost threadbare coat; 'I soon shall be able to get another;' at the same time I felt instinctively for my own copy of my manuscript play, which was carefully placed therein. I hurried out of my lodgings, and slamming the street door, I stood on the step, surveying the clouds. It was a cold November evening, a most inauspicious time to produce a good play; for all the good-natured fashionables are out of town, and none but surly critics, reporters to newspapers, and play-going lawyers in it; and the darkening clouds and chilling fog proclaimed the approach of night.

"This night is big with fate!" escaped my lips, while, with rapid steps, I hastened to the theatre to witness the first performance of my new play. Trembling with hope and fear, I found myself at the entrance of the theatre, and my heart leaped within me when I found myself quietly seated in an upper box, where I could hide myself as much as possible from the eyes of the public; for I fancied every eye in the theatre turned towards me; and every time I saw one individual whisper to another, I thought it must be to point out me as the author of the new piece. I regarded every fiddler in the orchestra with anxious eyes, and at every pause of the music I fancied that I perceived the curtain drawing up. How different, thought I to myself, is my situation from that of a well-known author whose name alone almost insures the success of his play; or, even if it be bad, his friends are sure, by their unjust and bois-

§ 76. ORIGIN, OR ORIGINAL CHARACTERS OF DRAMAS.

676. ORIGIN OF A DRAMATIC PERFORMANCE.

The plot of the London Hermit, by O'Keeffe, was founded on the following anecdote:—

The gardens at Pain's Hill, near Cobham, in Surrey, in the possession of Mr. Bond Hopkins, of which so much praise has been justly given, were previously owned by Mr. Hamilton. He advertised for a person who was willing to become the hermit of that retreat, under the following, among many other curious conditions: that he was to dwell in the hermitage for seven years, where he should be provided with a Bible, optical glasses, a mat for his bed, and a hassock for his pillow, an hour-glass for his timepiece, water for his beverage from the stream that runs at the back of his cot, and food from the house, which was to be brought him daily by a servant, but with whom he was never to exchange one syllable; he was to wear a camlet robe, never to cut his beard or his nails, to tread on sandals, never to stray in the open parts of the ground, nor beyond their limits; that if he lived there, under all these restrictions, till the end of the term, he was to receive seven hundred guineas; but on the breach of any one of them, or if he quitted his place any time previous to that term, the whole was to be forfeited, and all the loss of time remediless. One person attempted it, but three weeks formed the term of his abode.

677. SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER.

Mr. Lewis Grummit, formerly an eminent grazier in Lincolnshire, died in that county at a very advanced age. It was from a hospitable joke of this worthy man, that Dr. Goldsmith took the hint of Marlow's mistaking the house of Mr. Hardcastle for an inn, in the comedy of She Stoops to Conquer. The circumstance was as follows:—

Mr. Grummit, late one night, met a commercial traveller, who had mistaken the road, and inquired the way to the nearest inn or public house. Mr. G. replied, that, as he was a stranger, he would show him the way to a quiet, respectable house of public entertainment for man and horse, and took him to his own residence. The traveller, by the perfect ease and confidence of his manner, showed the success of his host's stratagem, and every thing that he called for was instantly provided for himself and his horse. In the morning he called, in an authoritative tone, for his bill, and the hospitable landlord had all the recompense he desired in the surprise and altered manners of his guest. Many other whimsical acts of kindness are related of him.

678. LA BRUYERE'S MENALCAS.

It is said that the Menalcas of La Bruyere's work was the Count de Brancas. He has forgotten two of the most extraordinary sallies of this man. The first is, that one day, the Count de Brancas walking in St. Germain de l'Auxerrois, M. de la Rochefoucault presented himself to speak to him. "God help you," said M. de Brancas, and walked on. M. de la Rochefoucault began to laugh, and at the same time prepared to address him again. "Is it not enough," said M. de Brancas, "that I have said 'God help you' already? These beggars are the most troublesome rascals!" Rochefoucault laughed still louder, and after some time succeeded in convincing Brancas that he was no beggar.

The second story was this: M. de Brancas was one day sitting by the fireside, reading with deep attention, when, the governante of his daughter coming in, he laid down his book, and took the child in his arms. He played with her for some time, when his servant came to announce to him a visit of importance; immediately, forgetting that he had laid down his book, and that it was his daughter that he held, he threw her from him, and walked out of the room. Fortunately the governante saved her life by receiving her in her arms.

679. SHAKSPEARE'S TRAGEDY OF HAMLET

This play is founded on the story of Amleth, in the Danish history of Saxo Germanicus. It is to be found in Mrs. Lenox's Shakspeare Illustrated. The story has a very romantic air, abounds with improbabilities, and is such altogether as would scarce have struck any imagination but Shakspeare's. Amleth, we are told, put on the guise of folly, rolled on the ground, covered his face with filth, raked the embers with his hands, &c. The ghost is entirely the invention of Shakspeare. In the original story, the catastrophe is full of terrors. Amleth, having made the nobility drunk, sets fire to the palace, and during the confusion goes to the usurper's apartment, and tells him Amleth was then to revenge his father's murder; upon which the king, jumping out of bed, is instantly put to death, and Amleth proclaimed king.

680. A NEW HAMLET.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer gives an account of a tragedy written by the Danish poet Oehlenschläger, on the historic legend upon which Shakspeare founded his immortal play. The new tragedy has been performed at Copenhagen with much success. The letter writer says, "I have been fortunate enough to procure a copy of the tragedy in the original Danish. When I first heard that Mr. Oehlenschläger had written on this subject, I could not refrain from thinking it a presumptuous undertaking on the part of any poet, no matter what his genius, to attempt treating a subject already handled by the great English dramatist. Since I have read Mr. Oehlenschläger's tragedy, my view of the matter has quite changed. There is, indeed, so little resemblance between Shakspeare's Hamlet and the historic legend from whence he originally took the idea of this tragedy, that we cannot be surprised that the poet, who has dramatized so many of the ancient legends of his native land, should have endeavored to throw into a dramatic form one of the most poetic of them all.

"Mr. Oehlenschläger has, of course, restored to all the characters of his new tragedy the names which historical tradition had given to them. Thus the king is called Fengo, the queen Gerutha, Hamlet's bride Sigrid, and the name of the hero is written according to the ancient orthography, Amleth."

681. RACINE'S LES PLAIDEURS.

The occasion and success of Racine's comedy Les Plaideurs are deeply interesting. A sort of lay benefice had been conferred on him, but he had scarcely obtained it when it was disputed by a priest; and then began a lawsuit, which, as he says, "neither he nor his judges understood." Tired out by law proceedings, weary of consulting advocates and soliciting judges, he abandoned his benefice, consoling himself meanwhile by writing the comedy of Les Plaideurs, which was suggested by it. We have spoken, in the preceding pages, of the suppers where Racine, Boileau, Molière, and others met, in which they gave full play to their fancy, and gaiety and wit were the order of the day. At these suppers the plot of the projected comedy was talked over. One guest provided him with the proper legal terms; Boileau furnished the idea of the dispute between Chicaneau and the countess; he had witnessed a similar scene in the apartments of his brother, a scrivener, between a well-known lawyer and the Countess de Crissé, who had passed her life and dissipated her property in lawsuits. The parliament of Paris, wearied by her pertinacious litigiousness, forbade her to carry on any suit without the consent of two advocates, who were named. She was furious at this sentence, and, after wearying judges, barristers, and attorneys by her repinings, she visited Boileau's brother, where she met the person in question. This man, a Paul Pry by inclination, was eager to advise her; she was at first delighted, till he said something to annoy her, and they quarrelled violently. This character being introduced into the comedy, the actress who took the part mimicked the poor countess to the life, even to the wearing a faded pink gown, such as she usually wore. Many other traits of this comedy were anecdotes actually in vogue; and the exordium of Intimé, who, when pleading about a capon, adopted the opening of Cicero's oration Pro Quintio, "Que res in civitate duce plurimum possunt, hee contra nos ambe faciunt hoc tempore, summa gratia et eloquentia," had actually been put to use by an advocate in a petty cause between a banker and a pastry-cook.

The humor of this piece shows that Racine might have succeeded in comedy; it is full of comic situation and the true spirit of Aristophanic farce. Yet it did not at first succeed, either because the audience could not at once enter into its spirit, or because it was opposed by a cabal of persons, who considered themselves attacked; and it was withdrawn after the second representation. Molière, however, saw its merits, and, though he had quarrelled with the poet, he said aloud, on quitting the theatre, "This is an excellent comedy; and those who decry it deserve themselves to be decied." A month afterwards the actors ventured to represent it at court. The king entered into the spirit of the fun, and laughed so excessively that the courtiers were astonished. The actors, delighted by this unlooked-for piece of good fortune, returned to Paris the same night, and hastened to wake up the author, to impart the news. The turmoil of their carriages, in his quiet street, in the middle of the night, awoke the neighborhood; windows were thrown open; and, as it had been said that a counsellor of state had expressed great indignation against Les Plaideurs, it was supposed that the author was carried off to prison, for having dared to ridicule the judges on the public stage; so that, while he was rejoicing at his success, the report in Paris the next morning was, that he had been carried off in the night by a lettre-de-cachet.

§ 77. HABITS AND PECULIARITIES.

682. EURIPIDES AND ALCESTIS.

Euripides composed his tragedies very slowly. He complained to the poet Alcestis, that he had, with considerable labor, finished only four verses in three days. Alcestis, who wrote with all the readiness of a bad author, told him that he had in the same time composed a hundred with perfect ease.

"But," said Euripides, rather piqued, "there is this difference between our compositions: your verses will live for three days, and mine will live forever."

683. CREBILLON.

When Crebillon was composing his tragedy of Catiline, a friend called on him, and was surprised to see four large ravens sitting at his elbow. "Walk gently, my good friend," said the poet, "walk gently, or you will put my conspirators to flight."

In his last illness, Crebillon expressed great regret that he should not live to finish the play which he had in hand, having gone through two acts of it only. The physician who attended him begged that he would bequeath him the two acts. Crebillon turned to him, and with a smile repeated a line from one of the acts:—

"Say, shall the assassin be the dead man's heir?"

684. CHURCHILL.

"Blotting and correcting was so much Churchill's abhorrence, that I have heard from his publisher," says D'Israeli, "he once energetically expressed himself, that 'it was like cutting away one's own flesh.' This strong figure sufficiently shows his repugnance to an author's duty. Churchill now lies neglected, for posterity only will respect those who ' ——— file off the mortal part Of glowing thought with Attic art.'

"I have heard that this careless bard, after a successful work, usually precipitated the publication of another, relying on its crudeness being passed over on the public curiosity excited by its better brother. He called this getting double pay; for thus he secured the sale of a hurried work. But Churchill was a spendthrift of fame, and enjoyed all his revenue while he lived; posterity owes him little, and pays him nothing!"

685. DUMAS' METHOD IN COMPOSING.

"I, generally," says Hans Christian Andersen, "found the jovial Alexander Dumas in bed, even long after midday; here he lay, with paper, pen, and ink, and wrote his newest drama. I found him thus one day; he nodded kindly to me, and said, 'Sit down a minute; I have just now a visit from my muse; she will be going directly.' He wrote on; spoke aloud; shouted a vivat, sprang out of bed, and said, 'The third act is finished!'"

686. CREBILLON ON SOLITUDE.

Crebillon, the celebrated tragic poet, was enamoured of solitude, that he might there indulge, without interruption, in those fine romances with which his imagination teemed. One day, when he was in a deep reverie, a friend entered hastily. "Don't disturb me," cried the poet; "I am enjoying a moment of happiness; I am going to hang a villain of a minister, and banish another who is an idiot."

§ 78. FACETIÆ AND HUMOR.

687. THE SELFISH MAN.

Colorden, when, on his death bed, was visited by his friend Barthe, who requested his opinion of his comedy of the Selfish Man, which he came to read at his bedside. "You may add an excellent trait to the character of your principal personage," replied Colorden; "say that he obliged an old friend, on the eve of death, to hear him read a five act comedy."

688. SHAKSPEARE AND HIS GODSON.

Shakspeare, in his frequent journeys between London and his native place, Stratford-upon-Avon, used to lie at Davenant's — the Crown, in Oxford. He was very well acquainted with Mrs. Davenant; and her son (afterwards Sir William) was supposed to be more nearly related to him than as a godson only. One day, when Shakspeare was just arrived, and the boy sent for from school to him, a head of one of the colleges, who was pretty well acquainted with the affairs of the family, met the child running home, and asked him whither he was going in so much haste. The boy said, "To my godfather Shakspeare." "Fie, child," says the old gentleman; "why are you so superfluous! Have you not learned yet that you should not use the name of God in vain?"

689. A SORCERER OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

Towards the close of the last century, a traveller, modest in his appearance and in his baggage, alighted at the principal tavern of Wurtzburg, a small city of Germany, where his person soon had the privilege of exciting the curiosity of all the inhabitants of the place. It is true that the stranger owed to the mystery of his conduct this remarkable excitement.

At first there might be discovered, notwithstanding the simplicity of his dress, something that betrayed the man of distinction. Although not a youth, he wore his hair long, like the students of the university, and his pale and melancholy visage wore even while he smiled a sombre cast. The next day after his arrival, instead of asking of his hostess, as all other travellers did, either the address of some citizen, to present to him his letters, or where the curiosities and antiquities of the city might be seen, he had gone out without saying a word. He had been walking all day, as his dusty clothes testified, and did not return until supper time. The day following he did the same thing. A shepherd boy said that he saw him walking rapidly along the banks of the Rhine, then stopping suddenly and gesticulating, and throwing his arms about like one possessed; and the young girls passed close to him without his paying any attention to them.

All these things, it must be confessed, were even more than enough to awaken conjectures as to the stranger. All that the hostess could say of him was, that he was a very sober, quiet man, always satisfied with what was set before him. Curiosity, however, continued to increase. It was remarked that the unknown man went immediately to his chamber after supper, but did not go to bed; and some of the family, who happened to be awake in the middle of the night, saw a light in his chamber. One of the youngest servants came running down stairs one evening, terribly frightened, and rushed into the hall, where were her mistress and two or three neighbors. She solemnly protested that the stranger was talking earnestly with some one in his chamber — "although no one but he had entered — by the door at least," added she. This made the auditors tremble. The little hussy was scolded soundly by her mistress for having listened at the lodger's door, and the next evening the good lady herself was at the same place where the servant had been, with her ear applied to the key-hole, where she heard — what she heard we know not. The truth is, she came down stairs with her spirit more troubled than had been observed in her since the death of her husband. She threw on her cloak, and hastened to the burgomaster's.

The following morning, when the stranger was going out, the landlady placed herself before him, made the sign of the cross upon her, and said, "Do you understand me?"

The stranger did not seem to hear her, and passed on, saluting her.

"Ah, it is a hardened sinner," cried she; "and yet the monster! with such a figure — who would have suspected him?"

In the evening, the traveller entered his chamber tranquilly. At each side of the door were two policemen, some of the hardy citizens of Wurtzburg, and on the stairs, in the hall, and in the street were all the women in the city remarkable for their curiosity. The number was very great.

The voice of the stranger rose and fell at intervals, as if he was discoursing with some one. Those who were near the door heard the following strange invocation: "Thou misformed offspring of our uncreated power — thou whom I have so long sought — thou shalt escape me no longer: answer me. Come, my black barbet, change thy costume. How thy black hair rises on end, thy body swells, and thy red eyes sparkle! Now, now thou understandest me — dost increase? increase again — stop, thou already reachest the ceiling — now one more effort, infernal power; if thou indeed hast submitted thyself to me, show thyself, demon, and speak to thy master."

At that call, a sharp, shrill voice, that seemed to come up out of the lower regions, answered, with an ironical humility, —

"Master, what dost thou desire of thy servant?"

At once all the women who heard the awful voice fled with screams of terror. The men burst open the door, although not fastened, and seized the traveller, whom they found seated in an arm-chair, at a little distance from the table. As to the demon, he had disappeared; but a distinct and strong sulphurous smell remained, as many witnesses testified.

The stranger was dragged before a magistrate, and charged with using magic and sorcery, and of holding commerce with the devil. The following was his only response: —

"I had begun a tragedy, but as my friends disturbed me continually in Weimer, where I live, I came to write here. The hero of my tragedy is a man who invokes the devil, and to whom the devil appears. I confess that I have an unfortunate habit, for which I ask pardon of the citizens of Wurtzburg, of reading aloud what I compose, as fast as I write it. As to my invoking, personally, the devil. I am too good a Christian to do that, and you, Mr. Burgomaster, too enlightened to believe it."

The sorcerer was named GOETHE, the author of Werther, and of Goetz von Berlichingen, and was then becoming the author of FAUST.

690. A DASH OF COLD WATER.

A celebrated writer of vaudevilles, being caught in a shower, took refuge under a portico. A very pretty person soon lifted the window, and after looking at him attentively for a moment, sent a servant out to him with an umbrella. The next day, the delighted author dressed himself up to his last result of the problem of what was becoming, and, as the umbrella was an old one, laid it aside as a souvenir, and, purchasing a new one of the costliest taste, called on the lady to return her flattering loan. She received the new umbrella evidently without remarking the change, and after listening, with curious gravity, to the rather pressing tenderness of the dramatist's acknowledgments, she suddenly comprehended that he was under the impression that she was enamoured of him, and forthwith naively explained, that, as he had stood in the way of a gentleman who wished to come and see her unobserved, she had sent him the umbrella to get him off her front steps!

691. RACINE AND THE MECHANICS.

Racine, while occupied in the composition of his Mithridates, used every morning to go to the garden of the Tuileries, where artificers of all kinds were then at work. On one occasion, without observing that any body was present, he commenced repeating his verses in a loud and energetic voice; but he suddenly found himself surrounded by a crowd of mechanics, who had left off their labor to follow him, considering him a madman, who would certainly, if not attended to, throw himself into the basin.

692. VOLTAIRE'S WIT.

When Voltaire wrote his tragedy of Merope, he called up his servant one morning, at three o'clock, and gave him some verses to carry immediately to the Sieur Panlin, who was to perform the tyrant. His man alleged that it was the hour of sleep, and that the actor might not like to be disturbed. "Go, I say," replied Voltaire; "tyrants never sleep."

693. A LOST PLAY.

It is an authentic anecdote of Hogarth, that he was wont to make certain miniature sketches on his thumb nail, to be elaborated at an after time. A certain dramatist followed the practice. He would write a plot in the same limited space in short-hand. He was once consulted on a new drama, by a manager. "I have it," exclaimed the ready artist; and he immediately marked the plot upon his thumb nail. Weeks passed over, but no play was presented. The manager waited on the author. "Now, about the piece! It's done, of course; you took it on your thumb nail!" "To be sure," replied the author, "and there it was for some time; but, as ill luck would have it, I one morning, unfortunately—washed my hands!"

694. SHARPLY HANDLED.

One of the last bons-mots in circulation amongst the wits of Paris is excellent. An author who had written several wretched tragedies was asked why he did not apply his talents to the composition of a comedy. "Because," he replied, "after reading Molière I had not the temerity." "What a pity," answered his tormentor, "that you never read Racine."

695. THE PRINTER'S TRAGEDY.

A printer at Paris wrote a tragedy called Joshua, which he printed in the most beautiful type, and gave a copy to the celebrated Bodoni, a brother printer at Parma.

"What do you think of my tragedy?" asked the author.

"Full of beauties!" exclaimed Bodoni; "your characters are perfect—exquisite—especially the capitals!"

696. VOLTAIRE AND THE YOUNG TRAGEDIAN.

A young writer, who flattered himself he was an original genius, having consulted Voltaire respecting a tragedy, which he had filled with extravagant incidents, Voltaire pointed out his defects. This young writer took pains to assure him that it had been his object to keep as far from the imitation of Corneille and Racine as possible.

"So much the worse; for do you not know, sir," said Voltaire, "that a good imitation is the most perfect originality?"

697. GOLDSMITH'S COMEDY.

"When Mr. Colman," says Cumberland, "then manager of Covent Garden Theatre, protested against Goldsmith's last comedy, when as yet he had not struck upon a name for it, Johnson stood forth in all his terrors as champion for the piece, and backed by us, his clients and retainers, demanded a fair trial. Colman again protested; but, with that salvo for his own reputation, liberally lent his stage to one of the most eccentric productions that ever found its way to it, and She Stoops to Conquer was put in rehearsal.

"We were not over-sanguine of success, but perfectly determined to struggle hard for our author. We accordingly assembled our strength at the Shakespeare Tavern, in a considerable body, for an early dinner, where Samuel Johnson took the chair at the head of a long table, and was the life and soul of the corps: the poet took post silently by his side, with the Burkes, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Caleb Whitefoord, and a phalanx of North-British predetermined applauders, under the banner of Major Mills, all good men and true. Our illustrious friend was in inimitable glee, and poor Goldsmith that day took all his rillery as patiently and complacently as my friend Boswell would have done any day, or every day of his life. In the mean time, we did not forget our duty; and though we had a better comedy going on, in which Johnson was chief actor, we betook ourselves in good time to our separate and allotted posts, and waited the awful drawing up of the curtain. As our stations were preconcerted, so were our signals for plaudits arranged and determined upon, in a manner that gave every one his cue where to look for them, and how to follow them up.

"We had amongst us a very worthy and efficient member, long since lost to his friends and the world at large, Adam Drummond, of amiable memory, who was gifted by nature with the most sonorous, and at the same time the most contagious laugh that ever echoed from the human lungs. The neighing of the horse of the son of Hystaspes was a whisper to it; the whole thunder of the theatre could not drown it. This kind and ingenuous friend fairly forewarned us, that he knew no more when to give his fire than the cannon did that was planted on a battery. He desired, therefore, to have a flapper at his elbow, and I had the honor to be deputed to that office. I planted him in an upper box, pretty nearly over the stage, in full view of the pit and galleries, and perfectly well situated to give the echo all its play through the hollows and recesses of the theatre. The success of our manoeuvres was complete. All eyes were upon Johnson, who sat in the front row of a side box; and when he laughed, every body thought themselves warranted to roar. In the mean time, my friend Drummond followed signals with a rattle so irresistibly comic, that, when he had repeated it several times, the attention of the spectators were so engrossed by his person and performances, that the progress of the play seemed likely to become a secondary object, and I found it prudent to insinuate to him that he might halt his music without any prejudice to the author; but, alas! it was now too late to rein him in; he had laughed upon my signal where he found no joke, and now unluckily he fancied that he found a joke in almost every thing that was said; so that nothing in nature could be more malapropos than some of his bursts every now and then were. These were dangerous moments, for the pit began to take umbrage; but we carried our play through, and triumphed not only over Colman's judgment, but our own."

698. REYNOLDS AND HIS PHYSICIAN

Dr. Bailie (not more famed for his medical skill than for his strong, common-sense mode of displaying it) being called in to attend F. Reynolds, the dramatist, during a nervous complaint, that fertile playwright said to him, "Doctor, do you not think I write too much for my constitution?" "No," replied the physician, bluntly, "but you do for your reputation."

699. LORD KENYON.

A friend having pointed out to Sheridan that Lord Kenyon had fallen asleep at the first representation of Pizarro, and that, too, in the midst of Rolla's fine speech to the Peruvian soldiers, the dramatist felt rather mortified; but, instantly recovering his usual good humor, he said, "Ah, poor man, let him sleep; he thinks he is on the bench."

700. IRISH PARSON AND THE MANAGER.

A worthy Irish parson, who had come to the metropolis with a stock of no less than five tragedies, and as many comedies, all to be acted at Drury Lane and Covent Garden, succeeded, by dint of importunity, in gaining access to the manager of the latter theatre, for the purpose of getting one of his pieces forthwith performed. To get rid of him and his ten plays, the manager hit upon the following successful expedient. One of the tragedies was called Lord Russell, and one of the comedies Draw the Long-bow. Mr. Harris received the author with his usual politeness, and sat, with great patience and much pain, listening to the doctor reading one of his plays to him: when he had got to the fourth act, Mr. Harris remarked that it was very fine indeed—excellent. "But, sir, don't you think it time for your hero to make his appearance?" "Hero, sir! what hero?" "Your principal character, Lord Russell. You are in the fourth act, and Lord Russell has not been on yet." "Lord Russell, sir!" exclaimed the doctor; "why, sir, I have been reading to you my comedy of Draw the Long-bow!" and gathering up his manuscript in a fury, the enraged author rushed out of the house.

701. THE SUPPER AT MOLIERE'S.

As much time as his avocations as actor and manager permitted, Molière spent at his country-house at Auteuil: here he reserved an apartment for his old school-fellow, the gay, thoughtless Chapelle; here Boileau also had a house; and at one or the other the common friends of both assembled, and repasts were held where wit and gayety reigned. Molière himself was too often the least animated of the party; he was apt to be silent and reserved in society; more intent on observing and listening than in endeavoring to shine. There was a vein of melancholy in his character, which his domestic infelicity caused to increase. He loved order in his household, and was annoyed by want of neatness and regularity: in this respect the heedless Chapelle was ill suited to be his friend; and often Molière shut himself up in solitude.

There are many anecdotes connected with this knot of friends; the famous supper, which Voltaire tries to bring into discredit, but which Louis Racine vouches for as being frequently related by Boileau himself, occurred at Molière's house at Auteuil. Almost all the wits, were there, except Racine, who was excluded by his quarrel with Molière. There were Lulli, Jonsac, Boileau, Chapelle, the young actor Barron, and others. Molière was indisposed: he had renounced animal food and wine, and was in no humor to join his friends; so he went to bed, leaving them to the enjoyment of their supper. No one was more ready to make the most of good cheer than Chapelle, whose too habitual inebriety was in vain combated, and sometimes imitated by his associates. On this occasion they drank till their good spirits turned to maudlin sensibility. Chapelle, the reckless and the gay, began to descant on the emptiness of life—the vain nature of its pleasures—the ennui of its tedious hours: the other guests agreed with him. Why live on, then, to endure disappointment after disappointment? how much more heroic to die at once! The party had arrived at a pitch of excitement that rendered them ready to adopt any ridiculous or senseless idea; they all agreed that life was contemptible, death desirable. Why, then, not die? The act would be heroic; and dying all together, they would obtain the praise that ancient heroes acquired by self-immolation. They all rose to walk down to the river, and throw themselves in. The young Barron, an actor and protégé of Molière, had more of his senses about him; he ran to awake Molière, who, hearing that they had already left the house, and were proceeding towards the river, hurried after them; already the stream was in sight. When he came up, they hailed him as a companion in their heroic act, and he agreed to join them. "But not to-night," he said; "so great a deed should not be shrouded in darkness; it deserves daylight to illustrate it; let us wait till morning." His friends considered this new argument as conclusive; they returned to the house; and, going to bed, rose on the morrow sober, and content to live.

702. BEN JONSON'S "WORKS."

Ben. Jonson.

In 1616, Ben Jonson collected the plays he had then written and published in one volume, folio, adding, at the same time, a book of epigrams, and a number of poems, which he entitled the Forest, and the Underwood. The whole were comprised in one folio volume, which Jonson dignified with the title of his Works,—a circumstance which exposed him to the ridicule of some of his contemporaries.

An epigram addressed to him on the subject is as follows:—

"Pray tell us, Ben, where does the mystery lurk, What others call a play, you call a Work?"

On behalf of Jonson an answer was returned, which seems to glance at the labor which Jonson bestowed on all his productions:—

"The author's friend thus for the author says — Ben's plays are works, while others' works are plays."

703. BEN JONSON'S WIT.

Lord Craven was very desirous to see Ben Jonson, which being told to Ben, he went to my lord's house; but being in a very tattered condition, the porter refused him admittance, with some saucy language, which the other did not fail to return. My lord, happening to come out while they were wrangling, asked the occasion of it. Ben, who stood in need of nobody to speak for him, said, "He understood his lordship desired to see him." "You, friend!" said my lord; "who are you?" "Ben Jonson," replied the other. "No, no," quoth his lordship, "you cannot be Ben Jonson, who wrote the Silent Woman; you look as if you could not say bo to a goose." "Bo," cried Ben. "Very well," said my lord, who was better pleased at the joke than offended at the affront; "I am now convinced you are Ben Jonson."

704. POINSINET AS KING'S SCREEN.

Preville, the comedian, and some others, (among whom was, I believe, the Count de Albaret,) frequently diverted themselves with the simplicity of Poinsinet, the poet, who, in other respects, was not deficient in talents. One day Preville came to him in great haste, to acquaint him that the office of the King's screen was just vacated; and added, that he would do well to solicit for it. Poinsinet asked what it was; the other told him, that the king did not use common screens, like private individuals; but he always employed a man of wit, to place himself between the king and the fire, in whatever part of the room his majesty might be, in order to save him the trouble of removing the screen; and that, besides, when the king was low-spirited, or was fatigued by his application to business, he diverted himself by conversing with his screen; who, by that means, frequently had an opportunity of saying a good word for his friends, or in favor of any other person whom he wished to serve, which made the office both important and lucrative. Poinsinet, delighted, asked what he had to do. "Nothing," said the other, "but try if you are able to fulfil the functions of the screen." A day being fixed, a dinner was ordered at a tavern; six of their common friends met there; a great fire was made; and, during dinner, they kept poor Poinsinet standing before the fireplace, encouraging him to support the extreme heat of the fire, which they unmercifully kept stirring all the time, by representing to him the advantages of his office, each begging of him to procure him some favor. They continued this cruel sport till the little man, who was half roasted, declared with great regret, that he despaired of ever being able properly to fulfil the functions of king's screen.

705. STAGE EFFECT.

One night, at the Dublin Theatre, Moss, a good low comedian, but full of the furor of extravagance in his acting, played the character of Lovegold, in the comedy of the Miser. To give an additional, and, as he thought, a happy stroke to the part, when he was frantic for the loss of his money, he ran to the front of the stage, and snatched the harpsichord-player's wig off, exclaiming, as loud as he could,—

"You have got my money—you have got my money! and I'll keep your wig till you return it."

The gentlemen of Cecilia's band instantly put their hands on their heads to secure their wigs, and immediately quitted the orchestra. The poor man, whose bald head had been exposed, and the sight of which got the ridiculous player a thunder of applause, could get no satisfaction from Moss for the insult; for he called it a theatrical joke.

§ 79. HONORS, PATRONAGE, AND REMUNERATION.

706. THE BEGGAR'S OPERA.

Gay, the poet, received about 400*l.* for the first Beggar's Opera, and 1100*l.* by the second. He was a negligent and bad manager. The Duke of Queensbury took his money into keeping for him, and gave him what was necessary, and he lived with him, and had not occasion for much. He died worth upwards of 3000*l.*

707. MOLIERE'S LES PRECIEUSES RIDICULES.

Into the elevated and artificial circle of society of the Hôtel de Rambouillet, previously described, the youthful and unsophisticated poet Racine was thrown, with a mind not vitiated by any prepossessions of false taste, studious of nature and alive to the ridiculous. But how was the comic genius to strike at the follies of his illustrious friends—to strike, but not to wound? a provincial poet and actor to enter hostilely into the sacred of these exclusions? Tormented by his genius, Molière produced Les Précieuses Ridicules, but admirably parried, in his preface, any application to them, by averring that it was aimed at their imitators—their spurious mimics in the country. The Précieuses Ridicules was acted in the presence of the assembled Hôtel de Rambouillet with immense applause. A central voice from the pit, anticipating the host of enemies and the fame of the reformer of comedy, exclaimed, "Take courage, Molière; this is true comedy." The learned Ménage was the only member of the society who had the good sense to detect the drift; he perceived the snake in the grass. "We must now," said this sensible pedant (in a remote allusion to the fate of idiocracy, and the introduction of Christianity) to the poetical pedant Chapelain, "follow the counsel which St Rémi gave to Clovis: we must burn all that we adored, and adore what we have burnt." The success of the comedy was universal; the company doubled their prices; the country gentry flocked to witness the marvellous novelty, which far exposed that false taste, that romantic impertinence, and that sickly affectation, which had long disturbed the quiet of families. Cervantes had not struck more adroitly at Spanish rhodomontade.

708. VOLTAIRE'S LAST APPEARANCE IN PUBLIC.

On the 1st of April, M. de Voltaire went to the Comédie Française. The court of the building, large as it is, was full of people waiting for him. As soon as his carriage, sky-blue and spangled with stars, made its appearance, the assemblage of Savoyards, apple-women, and all the canaille of the neighborhood, burst into acclamations of "Vive Voltaire!" The Marquis de Villette, who had previously arrived, and another friend, helped him to alight, and had some trouble to get him out of the crowd. When he entered the theatre, a crowd of a more elegant kind, and full of real enthusiasm for genius, surrounded him; the ladies, especially, threw themselves in his way, and stopped him, that they might look at him the better; some of them eagerly touched his clothes, and others pulled hairs from the fur of his cloak.

The saint, or rather the divinity, of the day was to occupy the box of the noblemen of the bed-chamber, opposite that of the Count d'Artois. Madame Denis and Madame de Villette were already seated, and the pit, in convulsions of joy, waited the poet's appearance. There was no rest till he was placed in the front row, beside the ladies. Then there was a cry, "The crown!" and Brizard, the actor, came to place it on his head. "Ah, Dieu, vous voulez donc me faire mourir!" cried Voltaire, weeping for joy, and refusing the honor. He took the crown in his hand, and presented it to Belle et bonne, (his pet name for Madame de Villette;) she was declining it, when the Prince de Beauveau, seizing the laurel wreath, placed it on the head of the Sophocles of the hour, who refused it no longer.

His new tragedy was acted, and applauded more than usual, but not enough to correspond with so triumphal a reception. When it was over, the curtain fell; and, rising again, discovered the bust of Voltaire, surrounded by all the performers, with palms and garlands in their hands. The bust was already crowned; and after a flourish of drums and trumpets, Madame Vestris declaimed, with an emphasis proportioned to the extravagance of the scene, some verses composed for the occasion by the Marquis de St. Marc. Then they all, in succession, placed their garlands round the bust; Mademoiselle Fanier, in a transport of enthusiasm, kissed it, and all the rest followed her example.

Voltaire's little comedy, Nanine, was then performed: when it was over, there was a fresh hubbub, and fresh embarrassment for the philosopher's modesty: when he got into his carriage, it was not allowed to proceed; the crowd threw themselves before the horses, and held them; and some young poets began a cry to take out the horses, and draw the modern Apollo home; unluckily, these enthusiasts were too few for the purpose, and at length the carriage was allowed to move on, in the midst of vivats, which he could hear all the way to his residence. When he got home, he wept afresh, and modestly protested that if he had foreseen that the public would commit such follies, he would not have gone to the theatre. Next day, his friends came in crowds to congratulate him on his triumph; he was unable to resist such ardor, kind feeling, and glory, and immediately resolved to buy a house and settle himself in Paris.

709. A CONTRAST.

May 31. M. de Voltaire died last night, at eleven o'clock. As the priests refuse to bury him, and his friends dare not send his body to Ferney, where his tomb is waiting him, they are seeking means to get over the difficulty. The government, whose weakness appears in every thing, has prohibited the actors from performing any piece of Voltaire's till further orders. It feared some fermentation in the public thus assembled. What a contrast with a coronation of the modern Sophocles two months ago!

710. CONGREVE AND VOLTAIRE.

Congreve, the English dramatist, spoke of his works as trifles, upon which he placed no great account; which was below him. Voltaire, when he was in England, paid him a visit. Congreve, during the first conversation, made him understand that he wished himself to be looked upon in no other light than as a gentleman, who led an easy and simple life. To this announcement Voltaire answered dryly, "Had you been so unfortunate as to be nothing more than a gentleman, I should not have given myself the trouble to wait upon you."

711. RACINE.

Boileau almost censures Racine for having accepted money for one of his dramas, while he, who was not rich, gave away his elaborate works to the public; and he seems desirous of raising the art of writing to a more disinterested profession than any other by requiring no fees.

712. RICHELIEU AND CORNEILLE.

Richelieu, of France, was one of the most remarkable men of the age in which he lived. Ambitious, proud, irritable, and domineering, he presents to posterity the true picture of a Romish priest, who considered that every thing should be subservient to the interests of the church, and that the end always sanctified the means. Dissimulation was so much employed by him, that it seemed systematic and natural; yet he was seldom deceived himself, except by those who flattered him; and with flattery he was never satisfied, unless it became hyperbolic. Although not learned, he patronized, or at least affected to patronize, learned men; not, it was asserted, from any real love to them, but because such patronage added to his reputation, gratified his vanity, and gave him eclat. An anecdote is related of him, which, if true, places his character in a very mean light. When Corneille, the great French dramatist, published the Cid, it was translated into all the languages of Europe, besides those of Slavonia and Turkey. Richelieu sent for the author, and offered him any sum he might demand, if he would permit him to be considered the author. Corneille preferred fame to riches, and refused; for which, it is said, the ambitious priest never forgave him. He was, however, subsequently obliged to concur in public opinion, and settle a pension on the poet.

713. PATRONAGE OF GLOVER BY THE PRINCE OF WALES.

Frederic, Prince of Wales, was very fond of the company of men of genius, and, among others who were admitted on a familiar footing at his private parties, was Richard Glover, author of Leonidas, a poem, and some dramatic productions, besides tracts on political and commercial subjects. One day the prince observed to the company that he had not seen Mr. Glover for some time, and asked if he was unwell; on which he was told that the person he inquired about was under some difficulties, occasioned by heavy losses in trade, which were supposed to have so discouraged him, that he was ashamed to appear at the levee. The prince replied, "I am very sorry for it;" and, presenting a bank note for five hundred pounds to the gentleman, he said, "Carry this to Mr. Glover as a small testimony of my esteem, and assure him from me that I sincerely sympathize with him in his affliction, and shall be always glad to see him."

714. GIFT OF JAMES I. TO JONSON.

Not only wages but gifts are proportioned to a man's style of living. When James I. heard that Ben Jonson was living in great poverty in an obscure place in London, he sent him 10*l.* to relieve his necessities. Some of the courtiers remarking on the smallness of the dole, the king said it was enough for "a man who lived in an alley."

715. BARKER'S DRAMA OF MARMION.

Mr. Wood, formerly a manager of a Philadelphia theatre, says,—

"James N. Barker, who had written several pieces before, and which had no fault but being American productions, at my request dramatized Marmion. I well knew the then prejudice against any native play, and concerted with Cooper a fraud upon the public. We insinuated that the piece was a London one, had it sent from New York, exactly packed up like the pieces we were in the habit of receiving, and made it arrive in the middle of rehearsal, when it was opened with great gravity, and announced without any author being alluded to. None of the company were in the secret, (I well knew 'these actors cannot keep counsel,') not even the prompter. Well, sir, it was played with great success for six or seven nights, when I, believing it safe, announced the author; and from that moment it ceased to attract. This is not a very creditable story, but a true one, and forms a strong contrast to the warmth with which Metamora and the Gladiator were received. Cooper also played Marmion in New York, without a hint of its father."

716. CONGREVE AND THE DUCHESS OF MARLBOROUGH.

Henrietta, Duchess of Marlborough, demonstrated her attachment to Congreve, the poet, in a manner indicative of absolute insanity. "Common fame reports," says Dr. Kippis, in the Biographia Britannica, "that she had his figure made in wax after his death, talked to it as if it had been alive, placed it at the table with her, took great care to help it with different sorts of food, had an imaginary sore in its leg regularly dressed, and, to complete all, consulted physicians with regard to its health."

717. MOLIERE'S HONORS.

The success of Molière, and his talent, naturally led to his favor among the great. The great Condé delighted in his society, and, with the delicacy of a noble mind, told him that, as he feared to trespass on his time inopportunely if he sent for him, he begged Molière, when at leisure to bestow an hour on him, to send him word, and he would gladly receive him. Molière obeyed; and the great Condé at such times dismissed his other visitors to receive the poet, with whom, he said, he never conversed without learning something new. Unfortunately, this example was not followed by all. Many little-minded persons regarded with disdain a man stigmatized with the name of actor, while others presumed insolently on their rank. The king generally took his part on these occasions. The anecdotes, indeed, which display Louis's sympathy for Molière are among the most agreeable that we have of that monarch. When brutally assaulted by a duke, the king reproved the noble severely. Madame Campan tells a story still more to this monarch's honor. Molière continued to exercise his functions of royal valet-de-chambre, but was the butt of many impertinences on account of his being an actor. Louis heard that the other officers of his chamber refused to call with him, which caused Molière to abstain from sitting at their table. The king, resolved to put an end to these insults, said one morning, "I am told you have short commons here, Molière, and that the officers of my chamber think you unworthy of sharing their meals. You are probably hungry. I always get up with a good appetite: sit at that table where they have placed my en cas de nuit," (refreshment prepared for the king in case he should be hungry in the night, and called an en cas.) The king cut up a fowl, made Molière sit down, gave him a wing, and took one himself, just at the moment when the doors were thrown open, and the most distinguished persons at court entered. "You see me," said the king, "employed in giving Molière his breakfast, as my people do not find him good enough company for themselves."

From this time Molière did not need to put himself forward; he received invitations on all sides. Not less delicate was the attention paid him by the poet Bellocq. It was one of the functions of Molière's place to make the king's bed; the other valets drew back, averse to sharing the task of an actor. Bellocq stepped forward, saying, "Permit me, M. Molière, to assist you in making the king's bed."

718. MOLIERE AND RACINE.

When Molière was at the height of his reputation, Racine, who was just then come from Languedoc, and was scarcely known in Paris, went to see him, under pretence of consulting him about an ode which he had just finished. Molière expressed such a favorable opinion of the performance, that Racine ventured to show him his first tragedy, founded on the martyrdom of Theagenes and Chariclea. Molière, who had an honest consciousness of superiority, which exalted him above envy, was not sparing either of praise or of counsel. His liberality carried him still further. He knew that Racine was not in easy circumstances, and therefore lent him a hundred louis d'or, thinking it a sufficient recompense to have the honor of helping forward a genius which he foresaw would one day be the glory of the French age.

719. BURIAL OF MOLIERE.

When Molière, the comic poet, died, the Archbishop of Paris would not let his body be buried in consecrated ground. The king, being informed of this, sent for the archbishop, and expostulated with him about it; but finding the prelate inflexibly obstinate, his majesty asked how many feet deep the consecrated ground reached. This question coming by surprise, the archbishop replied about eight. "Well," answered the king, "I find there's no getting the better of your scruples; therefore let his grave be dug twelve feet deep,—that's four below your consecrated ground,—and let him be buried there."

§ 80. FAILURES.

720. VOLTAIRE'S MARIANNE.

Voltaire's Marianne was, at first, only once acted. It is said that, the public being divided as to the merit of the work, the question was oddly settled. The farce which happened to be played that evening was entitled the Mourning. "For the deceased play, I suppose," said a critic in the pit; and this decided the fate of the piece.

721. LAMB HISsing HIS OWN FARCE.

When Lamb's farce of Mr. H. was acted, he gave a curious instance of one of his singular traits. It must be at once conceded that there were small evidences of humor in it, and the construction was undramatic; still there was much to show it was written by a man infinitely superior to all the farce writers in the kingdom. Towards the end of the performance, when it was evident to all that the piece was unmistakably damned, the attention of some of Lamb's friends was drawn to a very loud and violent hissing, which, like a stormy petrel, seemed to ride on the whirlwind and to direct the storm; or, as Talfourd said, it was the most prominent fact of the evening, "by merit raised to that bad eminence." What was their astonishment to find that this vigorous expression of dissent came from Lamb himself, who, when questioned as to his motive, after the fall of the curtain, stammered out, in his peculiar pop-gun manner, "I was so afraid they would take me to be the author!"

722. CARDINAL RICHELIEU'S COMEDY.

Cardinal Richelieu had composed a comedy, entitled Europe, of which France, Spain, and the other European states composed the characters. This piece, which was entirely of a political nature, and ill adapted for the stage, was played at the Hôtel de Bourgogne at the same time with the Cid. At the end of the piece, one of the actors came forward to pronounce a magnificent eulogium upon the piece, and to announce it for representation the next day; but a murmur was immediately heard through the house, and a general call for the Cid. The cardinal withdrew his piece, and was so much annoyed by this incident, that he immediately determined to procure the fall of the Cid, and united all the French Academy in the composition of the celebrated Critique which is known to every one.

Before the performance of his Europe, the cardinal had sent the piece to the Academy, in order that any errors against the rules of the stage or of poetry might be corrected. The Academy obeyed, and criticized it so severely, that they scarcely left a line unaltered. The cardinal, to whom it was brought back in this condition, was so enraged that he tore it on the spot, and threw it in pieces upon the hearth. This was in summer, and fortunately there was no fire on the hearth. The cardinal went to bed; but he felt the tenderness of a father for his dear Europe. He regretted having used it so cruelly; and calling up his secretary, he ordered him to collect with care the papers from the chimney, and to go and look whether he could find any paste in the house; adding that, in all probability, he would find some starch with the women who took charge of his linen. The secretary went to their apartment; and, having found what he wanted, he spent the greater part of the night with the cardinal in trying to paste together the dismembered comedy. Next morning he had it recopied in his presence, and changed almost every one of the corrections of the Academy, affecting, at the same time, to retain a few of the least important: He sent it back to them the same day by Boisrobert, and told them they would perceive how much he had profited by their criticisms; but, as all men were liable to error, he had not thought it necessary to follow them implicitly. The Academy, who had learned the vexation of the cardinal, took care not to retouch the piece, and returned it to him with their unanimous approbation. It was in this situation that it was produced on the stage, where it succeeded so ill that the historian of the French Academy has not thought proper to attribute its composition to the illustrious founder of that institution, but has ascribed it to Saint Sarlin, who, in fact, may have had some share in it, as he was entirely attached to the Cardinal de Richelieu.

723. DANCOURT'S AGIOTEURS.

When Dancourt gave a new comedy to the public, if it did not succeed, he was accustomed to console himself by going to sup with some of his friends at Cheret's. One morning, after the rehearsal of his Agioteurs, which was to be played in the evening for the first time, he thought of asking one of his daughters, who was only ten years old, what she thought of the piece. "Ah, father," said the girl, "you may go and sup this evening with Cheret."

724. VOLTAIRE'S SEMIRAMIS.

When the Semiramis of Voltaire was acted the first time, far from being received with all the applause which the confident author vainly anticipated, it went off very heavily. As Voltaire was coming from the playhouse, he met Piron, and asked him his opinion of it. "I think," said Piron, "you would have been very glad if I had written it."

725. MOLIÈRE'S MISANTHROPE.

It is well known that the Misanthrope of Molière was at first ill received by the public, and was only tolerated on the stage by the popularity of the Médecin malgré Lui. At the representation of this masterpiece of the comic drama, after the reading of Oronte's sonnet, the pit applauded. In the course of the scene, Alceste shows that the sonnet was in the worst possible taste. The public, confounded and ashamed of their mistake, took a dislike from that moment to the piece.

726. SEAT IN A YELLOW CABRIOLET.

M. Segur, among other literary productions, supplied the French theatres with a number of pleasing trifles. If he was not always successful, he was at least always gay in his reverses. When his works were ill received by the public, he consoled himself for a failure by a bon-mot; he made even a point of consoling his companions in misfortune. On one occasion, a piece of his brought forward was called the Yellow Cabriolet, which happened to be wholly condemned on the first representation. Some days afterwards, a piece, by another author, was presented, which was equally unfortunate. The author, petrified at his failure, stood for a moment immovable. "Come, come, my dear sir," said M. Segur, "don't be cast down; I will give you a seat in my Yellow Cabriolet."

§ 81. TRIALS AND MISERIES.

727. PLAUTUS.

At the same time that Cato was distinguished for his eloquence in the forum, Plautus was renowned for his comic representations on the stage. According to Varro, he was so well paid for his plays, as to think of doubling his stock by trading. In this speculation, however, he was so unfortunate, that he lost all he had acquired by the Muses, and for his subsistence was reduced, in a time of general famine, to work at a mill. How long he continued in this distress is uncertain; but Varro adds, that the poet's wit was his best support, and that he composed three plays during this daily drudgery.

728. VONDEL.

Vondel, the Dutch Shakspeare, after composing a number of popular tragedies, lived in great poverty, and died at ninety years of age; then he had his coffin carried by fourteen poets, who, without his genius, probably partook of his wretchedness.

729. RACINE'S ADVICE TO HIS SON.

The morbid state of Racine's feelings made his whole literary life uneasy; unjust criticism affected him as much as the most poignant satire, and there was nothing he dreaded more than that his son should become a writer of tragedies. "I will not dissimulate," he says, addressing his son, "that in the heat of composition we are not sometimes pleased with ourselves; but you may believe me, when, on the day after, we look over our work, we are astonished not to find that excellence we admired in the evening; and when we reflect that even what we find good ought to be still better, and how distant we are still from perfection, we are discouraged and dissatisfied. Besides all this, although the approbation I have received has been very flattering, the least adverse criticism, even miserable as it might be, has always occasioned me more vexation than all the praise I have received could give me pleasure."

730. SAVAGE'S SIR THOMAS OVERBURY.

During a considerable part of the time in which Savage was employed upon his tragedy of Sir Thomas Overbury, he was without lodging, and often without meat; nor had he any other conveniences for study than the fields or the streets allowed him. There he used to walk, and form his speeches, and afterwards step into a shop, beg, for a few moments, the use of a pen and ink, and write down what he had composed, upon paper which he had picked up by accident.

731. THE THREE LETTERS.

In Collet's Relics of Literature there is an affecting and melancholy instance of the straits to which genius is sometimes reduced, in three letters from Massinger, Nat Field, and Daborne, all men of talents, and dramatic writers, supplicating a joint loan of five pounds, with all the humility of men in the utmost distress.

732. MOLIÈRE'S TORMENT.

One day, during the representation of the Tartuffe, a person coming to speak with Molière, in his study, which looked upon the stage, the latter suddenly called out, "O that dog! that burglar! that butcherly wretch!" and struck his head with his fist, like one in a frenzy. The gentleman was extremely surprised, and thought him seized with a sudden fit; but Molière the next instant added, with the greatest composure, "Sir, 'twas only an actor, who spoke four of my lines most shamefully, without any accent or gesture; and to see my children thus hanged, drawn, and quartered torments me like a condemned soul."

733. RACINE'S MARRIAGE.

Racine, having yet only half run his unrivalled course, turned aside, relinquished its glory, repented of his success, and resolved to write no more tragedies. He determined to enter into the austere order of the Chartreux; but his confessor, more rational than his penitent, assured him that a character so feeling as his own, and so long accustomed to the world, could not endure that terrible solitude. He advised him to marry a woman of a serious turn, and hinted that little domestic occupations would withdraw him from the passion he seemed to dread—that of writing verses.

The marriage of Racine was an act of penance; neither love nor interest had any share in the union. His wife was a good sort of a woman, but perhaps the most insensible of her sex, and the properest person in the world to mortify the passion of literary glory, and the momentary exultation of literary vanity. It is scarcely credible, but most certainly true, since her own son relates the fact, that the wife of Racine had neither seen acted, nor read, nor desired to read, the tragedies which had rendered her husband so celebrated throughout Europe; she had only learned some of their titles in conversation. She was as insensible to fortune as to fame. One day, when Racine returned from Versailles with the princely gift from Louis XIV. of a purse of a thousand louis, he hastened to embrace his wife, and to show her the treasure. But she was full of trouble, for one of the children for two days had not studied! "We will talk of this another time," exclaimed the poet; "at present let us be happy." But she insisted he ought instantly to reprimand the child, and continued her complaints, while Racine, in astonishment, paced to and fro, perhaps thinking of his Satire on Woman, and exclaiming, "What insensibility! Is it possible that a purse of one thousand louis is not worth a thought?" This stoical apathy did not arise in Madame Racine from the grandeur, but the littleness, of her mind. Her prayer-books and her children were the sole objects that interested this good woman. Racine's sensibility was not mitigated by his marriage; domestic sorrows weighed heavily on his spirits. When the illness of his children agitated him, he sometimes exclaimed, "Why did I expose myself to all this? Why was I persuaded not to be a Chartreux?"

734. CORNEILLE'S DEATH.

Louis XIV. honored Racine and Boileau with a private monthly audience. One day the king asked what there was new in the literary world. Racine answered that he had seen a melancholy spectacle in the house of Corneille, whom he found dying, destitute even of a little broth! The king preserved a profound silence, and sent the dying poet a sum of money.

735. PHILIP MASSINGER.

Philip Massinger, the immediate successor of Shakspeare, and second only to him as a dramatic poet, was often as majestic, and generally more elegant, than his master; he was as powerful a ruler of the understanding as the bard of Avon was of the passions. And yet, with such rare talents, Massinger appears to have maintained a constant struggle with adversity, and to have enjoyed no gleam of sunshine; life was to him one long, wintry day, and "shadows, clouds, and darkness" sat upon it. There is a letter of his preserved, in which he, with Field, and two or three others as necessitous as himself, solicits the loan of a few pounds, with as much humility and self-abasement as if a mendicant asked alms. He was buried in the Churchyard of St. Southwark; and it does not appear, from the strictest search, that a stone or inscription of any kind ever marked the spot sacred to the dust of Massinger; even the memorial of his mortality is given with a pathetic brevity, which accords but too well with the obscure and humble passages of his life. It simply states, "March 20, 1639-40, buried Philip Massinger, a stranger."

736. DEATH OF RACINE.

The friends of Racine say that he died the victim of sensibility; it might, perhaps, more properly be termed an impotence of spirit. Although he had mingled much with the court, he had not learned to disguise his real sentiments. Having drawn up a rational and well-written memorial upon the miseries of the people, and the means of relieving them, he one day lent it to Madame Maintenon to read; when the king, coming in, seized hold of it, and insisted on knowing who the author was. On Madame Maintenon's informing him, his majesty commended the ability of Racine, but censured his meddling with things that did not concern him; saying, with an angry tone, "Because he knows how to make verses, does he think he knows every thing? And would he be a minister of state because he is a great poet?" On Madame Maintenon's reporting to Racine the passion which the king was in, the unlucky poet conceived such dreadful ideas of the king's displeasure, that he fell into a fever, of which he died.

Louis, who was not insensible of Racine's great merit, felt much regret at the consequences which his resentment had produced, and sent often to inquire after him during his illness. Finding, after his death, that he had left the world poor, he settled a handsome pension on his family.

§ 82. VARIOUS FACTS.

737. FIRST EDITION OF SHAKSPEARE.

"Perhaps," says Mr. Beloe, "there is no book in the English language which has risen so rapidly in value as the first edition of the works of our great natural English poet, Shakspeare.

"I can remember," says he, "a very fine copy to have been sold for five guineas. I could once have purchased a superb one for nine guineas. At the sale of Dr. Monro's books, it was purchased for thirteen guineas; and two years since, I was present when thirty-six guineas were demanded for a copy."

738. DRAMATISTS AND THEIR DRAMATIC CHARACTERS.

We should be unjust to some of the greatest geniuses, when the extraordinary sentiments they put into the mouths of their dramatic personages are maliciously applied to themselves.

Euripides was accused of atheism when he made a denier of the gods appear on the stage.

Milton has been censured by Clarke for the impiety of Satan; and it was possible that an enemy of Shakspeare might have reproached him for his perfect delineation of the accomplished villain Iago; as it was said that Dr. Moore was sometimes hurt, in the opinions of some, by his horrid Zeluco.

Crevillon complains of this. "They charge me with all the iniquities of Atreus, and they consider me in some places as a wretch with whom it is unfit to associate; as if all which the mind invents must be derived from the heart." This poet offers a striking instance of the little alliance existing between the literary and personal dispositions of an author. Crevillon, who exulted, on his entrance into the French Academy, that he had never tinged his pen with the gall of satire, delighted to strike on the most harrowing string of the tragic lyre. In his Atreus, the father drinks the blood of his son; in Rhadamistus, the son expires under the hand of the father; in Electra, the son assassinates the mother. A poet is a painter of the soul; but a great artist is not therefore a bad man.

739. MOLIERE'S DEATH.

The circumstances connected with the death of Molière form by no means the least curious portion of his history. He had lately produced his Malade Imaginaire, a piece in which he not only ridiculed the professors of medicine, but attacked the art itself. Though laboring under a severe attack of the chest, he sustained the character of Monsieur Pourgon, the imaginary invalid, and excited peals of laughter at fancied illness, while he was suffering cruelly from that which was too real. During the concluding scenes, in which Monsieur Pourgon is received as a member of the faculty, while pronouncing the word jure, the actor was seized with a violent fit of coughing, which he in vain endeavored to disguise from the audience under an affected laugh. He was conveyed home, where his cough increased so much, that it was followed by a vomiting of blood, which suffocated him.

He thus expired without an opportunity of receiving the sacrament, or even of making the formal renunciation of his profession, which was essential to entitle him to Christian burial. The king, as stated elsewhere, deeply affected at the loss of this distinguished man, and willing to give, even after death, a fresh mark of the esteem in which he had always held him, used his personal influence with the Archbishop of Paris to surmount the illiberal objection. The prelate gave permission for his interment in the Church of St. Joseph; but the mob, less tolerant in their ignorance, and probably excited by some of the inferior clergy, assembled in great numbers, and showed a disposition to prevent the progress of the corpse. Their barbarous intention was only prevented by the address of the widow, who caused money to be thrown among them, and thus purchased their forbearance.

The few facts thus thrown together are not without interest. The fame of Molière will live while the French language shall endure; and the monarch under whose auspices he ran his brilliant career deserves credit from his appreciation of his genius, and the protection he afforded him.

740. TALFOURD.

A writer in a Boston paper, who met with Talfourd in London, gives us the following details respecting him:—

"Mr. Sergeant Talfourd sat near me, and as I had met him frequently while on the Oxford circuit, we were soon chatting familiarly together. The author of Ion is one of the most amiable men I ever knew; and never did any literary man enjoy in a fuller degree the esteem and admiration of his brother laborers in the same field. His face is not handsome, but it is indicative of great sweetness of disposition. His dark eyes glow with sensibility, and were not the lower portion of his face rather too full, its expression would be what is termed 'sweet.'

"Talfourd is a most industrious man; and I remarked to him that I wondered how he could get through so much legal business, and yet have time to woo the Muse. He replied that he had need work hard, as he had the mouths of thirteen children to feed. As an advocate, Mr. Talfourd stands very high, and he is a general favorite with the bar. His eloquence is rather of a persuasive character, and he elicits truth none the less effectually for using gentle means. It is really astonishing that he can, as he does, divest his mind of all the technicalities of law, and produce poetry of such beauty; but so it is. I remember being told by a tradesman of Monmouth, in whose house Mr. Talfourd used to lodge when on the Oxford circuit, that he would often listen for hours at Mr. T.'s door, after court hours, to hear him, as he walked up and down the room, recite poetry, it being Mr. Talfourd's habit to compose aloud, as he paces the room. The listener, (a tailor,) with quite an enthusiastic tone, assured me 'it was beautiful to hear him.'"

741. MATTHEW GREGORY LEWIS.

Connected with the dramatic fame of Matthew Gregory Lewis, a very interesting anecdote is related in the Memoirs and Correspondence of Lewis, published in 1839. It illustrates his native benevolence, which, amidst all the frivolities of fashionable life, and the excitement of misapplied talents, was a conspicuous feature in his character.

"Being one autumn on his way to participate in the enjoyments of the season, with the rest of the fashionable world, at a celebrated watering-place, he passed through a small country town, in which chance occasioned his temporary sojourn: here also were located a company of strolling players, whose performance he one evening witnessed. Among them was a young actress, whose benefit was on the tapis, and who, on hearing of the arrival of a person so talked of as Monk Lewis, waited upon him at the inn, to request the very trifling favor of an original piece from his pen. The lady pleaded in terms that urged the spirit of benevolence to advocate her cause in a heart that never closed to such appeal. Lewis had by him at that time an unpublished trifle, called the Hindoo Bride, in which a widow was immolated on the funeral pile of her husband. The subject was one well suited to attract a country audience, and he determined thus to appropriate the drama. The delighted suppliant departed, all joy and gratitude at being requested to call for the manuscript the next day. Lewis, however, soon discovered that he had been reckoning without his host; for, on searching the travelling desk which contained many of his papers, the Bride was nowhere to be found, having, in fact, been left behind in town. Exceedingly annoyed by this circumstance, which there was no time to remedy, the dramatist took a pondering stroll through the rural environs of B. A sudden shower obliged him to take refuge within a huckster's shop, where the usual curtained half-glassed door in the rear opened to an adjoining apartment: from this room he heard two voices in earnest conversation, and in one of them recognized that of his theatrical petitioner of the morning, apparently replying to the feeble tone of age and infirmity. 'There now, mother, always that old story—when I've just brought such good news too—after I've had the face to call on Mr. Monk Lewis, and found him so different from what I expected; so good humored, so affable, and willing to assist me. I did not say a word about you, mother; for though in some respects it might have done good, I thought it would seem so like a begging affair, I merely represented my late ill success, and he promised to give me an original drama, which he had with him, for my benefit. I hope he did not think me too bold!' 'I hope not, Jane,' replied the feeble voice; 'only don't do these things again without consulting me; for you don't know the world, and it may be thought—.' The sun just then gave a broad hint that the shower had ceased, and the sympathizing author returned to his inn, and having penned the following letter, ordered post horses, and despatched a porter to the young actress with the epistle,—

"Madam: I am sorry to acquaint you that my Hindoo Bride has behaved most improperly: in fact, whether the lady has eloped or not, it seems she does not choose to make her appearance, either for your benefit or mine; and to say the truth, I don't at this moment know where to find her. I take the liberty to jest upon the subject, because I really do not think you will have any cause to regret her non-appearance; having had an opportunity of witnessing your very admirable performance of a far superior character, in a style true to nature, and which reflects upon you the highest credit. I allude to a most interesting scene, in which you lately sustained the character of "the Daughter!" Brides of all denominations but often prove their empire delusive; but the character you have chosen will improve upon every representation, both in the estimation of the public and of your own excellent heart. For the infinite gratification I have received, I must long consider myself in your debt. Trusting you will permit the enclosed (fifty pounds) in some measure to discharge the same, I remain, madam, with sentiments of respect and admiration, your sincere well-wisher. M. G. Lewis."

742. HUGH KELLY.

Hugh Kelly, the author of the School for Wives, and several other dramatic pieces, was ever ready to relieve distress when he saw it, to the very extent of his power. To poor authors he was particularly liberal, constantly promoting subscriptions in their favor; and as he had a numerous and respectable acquaintance, he was generally successful. Being told one day that a man who had abused him in the newspapers was in much distress, and had a poem to publish by subscription, he exclaimed, "God help him: I forgive him; but stop;" then pausing, he said, "Tell him to come and dine with me to-morrow, and I'll endeavor to do something for him." The poor author went, and was received cordially; when Kelly gave him a guinea for his own subscription, and disposed of six copies.

743. KOTZEBUE'S THREE ENGAGEMENTS.

The celebrated Kotzebue was under a contract to supply three theatres, that of Vienna, Berlin, and Petersburg, with two dramatic pieces in the season. Upon being asked how he could possibly undertake so much, he replied, "Nothing, my good friend, is more easy. I have one plot for all, and three standing characters, which I vary in their dialogue and action according to the different tastes of my audiences. I have a lover, for instance — mark now how I use him at one theatre, and how I treat him at another. At Petersburg, he smokes; at Berlin, he wench; at Vienna, he games. If drawn as a villain in Russia, he may commit murder on the stage; but at Berlin and Vienna, he must not draw his sword before the curtain. Again, as I go north, my heroine must be virtuous; and within a few degrees of the pole, she must be a very saint. Thus, before a Prussian audience, she preaches; at Petersburg, she is a prude; at Vienna, she is a jilt; and at Paris, a prostitute.

DRAMATIC PERFORMERS AND ACTORS.

§ 83. ORIGIN AND EARLY LIFE.

744. SHUTER.

This once celebrated comedian is said to have owed his advance in life to a singular incident. When very young he was pot-boy at a public house in the neighborhood of Covent Garden. A gentleman came in late one evening, and after taking some refreshment, sent Shuter to call a hackney coach for him. On reaching home, the gentleman missed his pocket-book, and suspecting he had left it in the coach, the number of which he did not know, he hastened the next morning to the house from which it had been ordered, and inquired of Shuter if he knew the number of the coach. Poor Shuter could neither read nor write, and was totally unskilled in numerals; but he knew the signs by which his master scored the quarts and pints of porter which were drank at his house, and these were fortunately sufficient to express the number of the coach; he therefore readily replied to the gentleman's inquiry, by saying, "Two pots and a pint." (771) This to the gentleman was unintelligible, till the landlord explained its meaning. The coachman was summoned, and the pocket-book recovered. This acuteness of the boy so pleased the gentleman that he immediately placed him in school, and became his patron through life.

745. MR. BURKE IN THE DITCH.

Mr. Burke, in his juvenile days, was extremely fond of private acting. A few of his companions proposed that he should play Richmond, in Richard III.; and having given him the part at a very short notice, he arose betimes one morning, and walked down a lane adjoining his father's house, so intent on studying his part, that he did not perceive a filthy ditch before him, and had just uttered with heroic dignity, "Thus far have we got into the bowels of the land," when he found himself up to the middle in mire.

746. MRS. SIDDONS'S MARRIAGE.

Mrs. Siddons's father had interdicted his daughter from marrying an actor. She, however, encouraged the addresses of Siddons, who did not rank very high in his profession, playing all sorts of characters, from Hamlet to Harlequin. They were ultimately married; and after the nuptials old Kemble said to a friend, "I cannot say that my daughter has disobeyed me, for nobody can say that Siddons is an actor."

747. THE EFFECTS OF BADINAGE.

"I solemnly declare," says Wemyss, "at the moment I placed my foot in the Glasgow mail coach, as it passed through Falkirk, to return home, I had firmly resolved to abandon forever my foolish project, and, by strenuously devoting myself to business, make all the atonement in my power for the loss of time and trouble I had occasioned to my relations. One unfortunate occurrence again altered all my well-formed resolutions. On my arrival in Dundee, on the 20th of June, 1814, Mr. Courtney was entertaining a party of gentlemen at dinner. The officiousness of a servant in announcing my arrival produced a message requesting my presence in the dining-room. This summons I readily obeyed; but no sooner had I opened the door, and stood fairly over its threshold, than one universal roar of laughter burst from the crowded table, accompanied with expressions like the following: 'Make room for Roscius' — 'Here comes the proud representative of Shakspeare's heroes' — 'Right welcome back to Denmark' — 'A frog he would a-wooing go,' &c., &c."

"This ill-timed badinage sealed my fate. Smarting under the lash of jests, the truth of which I could not but inwardly acknowledge, I replied to my uncle's question of —

"'Are you cured of your folly, and determined for the future to attend closely to business?'

"'No, sir, I am off again to-morrow morning.'"

748. LISTON.

John Liston, the celebrated English comedian, for near forty years wielded the sceptre of Comus in his favorite palace of Drury. He began his profession in the "heavy business" or second tragedy parts; and by accident only, through the sudden sickness of another, whose comic part he took, was his humorous vein discovered. His style was very varied; at times his performances were of the legitimate and dignified character, while at others his facial powers would convulse both spectators and actors, and cause the curtain to fall amid a roar that prevented a word of the last scene being heard. This "gagging" and "mugging," as it is vulgarly called, made the more judicious portion of the public consider him for years only an entertaining buffoon. On one occasion, a part was written for him, called Henry Augustus Mug; and Mug, in the slang sense, became the sobriquet of Liston. Caricatures were produced, representing Nature relenting and resolving to make him handsome; the comedian waking in a fright, and imploring her to desist, as his face was his fortune. The following lines formed an appropriate accompaniment:—

LISTON'S DREAM.

As Liston lay wrapped in delicious repose,
Most harmoniously playing a tune on his nose,

In a dream there appeared the adorable Venus,
Who said, "To be sure there's no likeness between us;
Yet, to show a celestial to kindness still prone is,
Your looks shall soon rival the handsome Adonis," Liston woke in a fright, and cried, "Heaven preserve me!
If my face you improve, why, dear madam, you'll starve me!"

749. FORTUNATE FOUNDLING.

Mrs. Achmet, the actress, was found at night, when an infant, enclosed in a basket in one of the streets of Dublin. A gentleman, hearing the child's cries, humanely took it home, and resolved to rear it up as his own offspring. He spared no expense in giving his protégé an accomplished education; and, at a suitable period, conferred upon her at the altar his own name of Achmet.

§ 84. TREATMENT BY THEIR AUDITORS.

750. DIVIDING A CROWN.

Garrick, performing a king in a new piece, — in which the principal incident was similar to Lear's abdication of the throne in favor of his daughters, — when he came to the passage, "And now I divide this crown between you," (his two daughters,) a fellow in the pit cried out, "That's just half a crown apiece." An incessant laugh prevailed, and another syllable could not be heard during the remainder of the representation.

751. "HANG THE WITCH."

A good joke occurred at the Walnut Street Theatre, on one of the evenings of the representation of Murdoch's new play of Witchcraft. In returning modern verdicts, it is only necessary for the foreman to announce the result; but in this play each of the twelve — and a drawing, knotty set they were, too — stood up, and whined out, one after the other, "Hang the witch!" "Hang the witch!" "Hang the witch!" &c., amid roars of laughter, till the twelfth mock official announced his decision, and had taken his seat, when suddenly uprose a dry-looking Yankee in the pit, and cried out, in a strong nasal tone, "Ha-a-a-ng the Jury!" which, of course, utterly convulsed the house, and set gravity of face at utter defiance for a long while after.

752. MY FIRST HISS.

"To me," says Wemyss, "our visit to Mauchline was marked by an incident. It was here for the first time that I was hissed; the part, Fainwould, in Raising the Wind. I suppose that I deserved it; but it was the admirable acting of Emley, in Jeremy Didler, that caused the offence. He made me laugh so heartily at the breakfast table, that I could not speak for laughing, until the audience tried to change my tune. I went off the stage laughing, while the audience were hissing, but I did not return that night; I ran out of the (theatre) barn, home. How the farce was finished, I never exactly heard. I received a long lecture from the manager, the following morning, upon the folly of my course, concluding with what I then thought a remarkable expression, but which experience has taught me was correct — that no actor, however high his station, ever passed through his career, without at some period of his life encountering the displeasure of an audience; that I must make up my mind to such scenes, if I intended to remain upon the stage, and that nothing but my inexperience prevented him from discharging me forthwith."

753. SHOOTING AN ACTOR.

One of the most remarkable instances with which we are acquainted, of the illusions produced by theatrical representations, occurred in a small town in Maryland, several years ago. In the evening of a day on which a military muster had been held at the town, Othello was performing in a barn, by a strolling company of players. A piece of canvas was let down before the door, and the sentinel, one of the train-bands, stationed at it with a loaded musket, in order to prevent a gratuitous gaze from the outside, and the interruption of unruly persons. The man contrived to put his head in from time to time, and thus to catch the intrigue of the play. He was observed to be occasionally much agitated during the third and fourth acts, but the cause was not suspected. Suddenly, just as the Moor is about to stifle Desdemona, he turned impetuously in, levelled his piece at the actor, and shot him dead, exclaiming with fury, "No negro shall ever murder a white woman in my presence, if I can help it." We have this anecdote from an eye-witness, a gentleman of unquestionable veracity, who attested that the poor sentinel was not intoxicated, and had the reputation of good nature and good conduct.

754. "SHALL I CUT?"

At the first representation of the Tom Jones, of Poinsett, two persons were observed in the pit, one of whom was overheard saying to the other, from time to time, "Shall I cut? Shall I cut?" This suspicious phrase attracted attention, and the pair were just on the point of being arrested as pick-pockets. "What have we done?" said one of them. "We are only tailors, and I have the honor of making clothes for M. Poinsett, the author of the new play. As I have to furnish him with a dress to appear before the public, which will be sure to demand his appearance at the second representation, and as I know very little of the merits of dramatic works, I have brought with me my principal journeyman, a very clever man, for he makes out all my accounts; and I was only asking him, from time to time, if he would advise me to cut the cloth in question, which must be paid for out of the profits of the play."

755. THE ACTOR HISSED.

A leading actor at the opera having fallen sick the first night of the representation of a new play, an inferior one was chosen to supply his place. He sang, and was hissed; but without being disconcerted, he looked steadfastly at the pit, and said, "Gentlemen, I don't understand this. Do you think that for 600 livres per annum, which I receive, I can afford to give you a 2000 crowns' voice?" The public were so pleased with the sally, that the actor was allowed to proceed with great applause.

756. INCLEDON'S SELF-COMPOSURE.

Charles Incledon was proverbial for the coolness with which he regarded the turbulence of "the gods." He always listened to the "storm" with the utmost nonchalance, and occasionally addressed the noisy tenants of Olympus. One evening he was prevented from singing by a dire conflict in the most classical part of the house: and after pacing the stage for some time, "nursing his wrath to keep it warm," he pulled his watch deliberately from his fob, and thus addressed them: "Ladies and gentlemen, if you would contrive to finish this row in a quarter of an hour, I would esteem it as a particular favor. I'm engaged to sup with a friend at half past eleven, and I have very little time to spare." This good-humored rebuke had the desired effect, and the beligerent parties "grounded arms" immediately.

757. MACREADY AND THE SHREWSBURY BUTCHER.

The following anecdotes of Macready are from the pen of Dyer. "The prejudice felt," says he, "against this distinguished artist, Macready, is the most unjust that can be imagined. I believe it still exists, though with less violence than heretofore; but even now he is the terror of country theatres. My antipathies against him were strongly excited by the reports of my brother actors; and I treated him with a rancor which, at this hour, I remember with compunction. A few years after, I apologized for my conduct, because my increased experience increased my respect for the consequence of a tragedian; and I felt the firmness and sensitiveness of a man so deservedly eminent as Macready should be endured, at least. He has a fair excuse in the insolent self-sufficiency of performers for the excitement of his ill humor; and I found the reserve of genius was mistaken for hauteur. Macready shows nothing but the becoming pride of a gentleman, and if actors were more accommodating, he would be less irritable. As an actor, he is faultless; for he conceives with judgment, and executes with truth. He is Virginus, and Hamlet, and Tell, as completely as if the souls of his heroes had entered him when he assumed the garb of each character. Nothing could rouse him from his identity in the scene, if the actors were only perfect; not even the uproar of an overflowing half price, than which the confusion of Babel is not more confounding. Once, however, I saw him at fault in the Shrewsbury Theatre, in William Tell. The Shrewsbury butchers are proverbially a noisy crew; and on the night of his benefit the crowd and confusion was so terrific, Macready 'stuck dead,' in player parlance, and, after many unsuccessful efforts, obtained a pause in the storm, and addressed his friends thus: 'Ladies and gentlemen, I have played William Tell many, many times; but, indeed, the frightful noise you make entirely drives the recollection of the words from me.' An awful silence ensued for a moment, when a bull-like voice shouted from the gallery, 'Why, you have a good house, you; so go on, go on!' And he did go on, though he appeared annihilated by the rude command. There are too many men of the mental calibre of the Shrewsbury butcher in every auditory, who have no more idea of the sensibilities of a really sterling performer, who by a strong effort of feeling and genius identifies himself with his part, than of the music of the spheres.

758. GENERAL FITZPATRICK.

General Fitzpatrick being at a country play, the entertainment happened to be the Stage Coach, which was acted so wretchedly, that it was impossible to make head or tail of it. As soon as the curtain closed, and one of the performers came to give out the next play, the general begged leave to ask the name of the entertainment just finished. "The Stage Coach, sir," says Buskin, bowing very respectfully. "O, then, sir," says the general, "will you be so good to let me know when you perform this again, that I might be an outside passenger?"

759. THE ACTRESS AND THE SAILOR.

"When I was a poor girl," said the British Duchess of St. Alban's, "working very hard for my thirty shillings a week, I went down to Liverpool during the holidays, where I was always kindly received. I was to perform in a drama, and in my character I represented a poor, friendless, orphan girl, reduced to the most wretched poverty. A heartless tradesman prosecutes the sad heroine for a heavy debt, and insists on putting her in prison, unless some one will be bail for her. The girl replies, 'Then I have no hope, I have not a friend in the world.' 'What! will no one be bail for you to save you from prison?' asks the stern creditor. 'I have told you I've not a friend on earth,' was my reply. But just as I was uttering the words, I saw a sailor in the upper gallery spring over the railing, letting himself from one tier to another until he bounded clear over the orchestra and foot-lights, and placed himself beside me in a moment. 'Yes, you shall have one friend, at least, my poor young woman,' said he, with the greatest expression in his honest sunburnt countenance; 'I will go bail for you any moment. And as for you, (turning to the actor,) if you don't bear a hand and shift your moorings, you lubber, it will be worse for you when I come athwart your bows.' Every creature in the house rose; the uproar was perfectly indescribable; and amidst the universal din stood the unconscious cause of it, sheltering 'the poor young woman,' and breathing defiance against my mimic persecutor. He was only persuaded to relinquish his care of me by the manager's pretending to arrive to rescue me, with a profusion of bank notes."

760. MACREADY INTERRUPTED.

At a London theatre, as Macready, in the concluding part of Macbeth, gave utterance to the passage commencing, "Why should I play the Roman fool?" he was interrupted by a fellow in the gallery calling out with stentorian lungs, "Vy, indeed, ven we come here to see you play the English fool; leave your damnable grimaces, and begin the pantermime!" At this uncouth greeting of the closing efforts of the great tragedian, Talfourd, who stood at the wing, nearly fainted.

§ 85. PATRONAGE AND POPULARITY.

761. ROSCIUS.

Quintus Roscius, a Roman actor, became so celebrated upon the stage, that every actor of superior eminence to his contemporaries has been since called the Roscius. It is said that he was not without some personal defects; particularly his eyes were so distorted, that he always appeared upon the stage with a mask; but the Romans frequently constrained him to take it off, and overlooked the deformities of his face, that they might the better hear his elegant pronunciation. In private life he was so much esteemed as to be elevated to the rank of senator. When falsely accused, Cicero, who had been one of his pupils, undertook his defence, and cleared him of the malevolent aspersions of his enemies, in an eloquent oration extant in his works. Roscius is said to have written a treatise, which has not escaped the wreck of time, comparing, with great success and erudition, the profession of the orator with that of the comedian. His daily pay for acting is said to have been 1000 denarii, or 32*l.* 6*s.* English money, though Cicero makes his annual income amount to the enormous sum of 48,434*l.* 10*s.*

762. LE KAIN AND THE CHEVALIER.

Le Kain, the French actor, who retired from the Parisian stage covered with glory and gold, was one day congratulated by a company on the retirement which he was preparing to enjoy. "As to glory," modestly replied this actor, "I do not flatter myself to have acquired much. This kind of reward is always disputed by many, and you yourselves would not allow it, were I to assume it. As to the money, I have not so much reason to be satisfied: at the Italian theatre their share is far more considerable than mine; an actor there may get twenty to twenty-five thousand livres; and my share amounts at the most to ten or twelve thousand." "How!" exclaimed a rude chevalier of the order of St. Louis, who was present, "how! a vile stroller is not content with twelve thousand livres annually, and I, who am in the king's service, who sleep upon a cannon, and lavish my blood for my country, I must consider myself as fortunate in having obtained a pension of one thousand livres!" "And do you account as nothing, sir, the liberty of addressing me thus?" replied Le Kain, with all the sublimity and conciseness of an irritated Orosmane.

763. THEATRICAL POPULARITY.

"Of the good people of Irvine," says Wemyss, "I, at least, am bound to speak with gratitude; the ball, upon my benefit night, being literally crammed. As I was fortunate enough thus to eclipse all the better actors, it is but fair I should assign the reason. A gentleman of the town had written a trifling drama on the subject of Burns's Tam O'Shanter, which was produced for Ryder's benefit, in which I was cast for the part of Cutty Sark. With the tuition of Ryder, the witches' scene, in the interior of Alloa Kirk, so well described by the immortal poet, was placed upon the stage, with all the effect which paint, canvas, and dress could give it. The business of the scene was capitally arranged; and with such spirit was it kept up, that when I obtained the tail of Tom's mare, on the middle of the Brig of Doon, one universal shout of 'Well done, Cutty Sark!' followed the descent of the curtain, each night of performance. The little urchins in the street would salute me, as I passed, with 'Well done, Cutty Sark!' and when my name was announced for a benefit, every body was determined to be there; an overflowing house was the consequence; but Cutty Sark had nearly become a professional nickname, of which I was not at all ambitious, although it had put several pounds sterling in my pocket."

764. MAKING SHORT ALLOWANCE GO A LONG WAY.

Mademoiselle F., the pretty actress of the Palais Royal, was coming out of the theatre in the daytime, after signing the terms of a new engagement. The manager conducted her to her carriage. "Well," said he, as he handed her in, "we have agreed now upon your salary for a year—eighteen hundred francs!" "Hush, hush, hush!" exclaimed the lady, putting her hand on the manager's mouth, "don't speak so loud; my coachman will overhear you, and I pay him two thousand four hundred!"

765. TRUTH OR LIBEL.

"The great tragedian, Madame Rachel," says the Paris correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer, of 1848, "has latterly changed her rooms from the Rue Joubert to the Rue de Rivoli. Not wishing the trouble of transporting all her furniture, or, perhaps with Israelitish acumen, thinking that a good bargain could be made by its sale, it was all advertised. Among the articles which belonged to the sacred precincts of her bedchamber, and which had been the chaste witnesses of her classic dreams and visions, was catalogued a small lot of ebony furniture, dressed with crimson velvet. An ambitious old gentleman, in the St. Denis quarter of the town, who had many years cherished longings for a fauteuil of princely ebony, chanced to observe the catalogue, and forthwith despatched his son to secure, at any reasonable price, the lot. The bidders were earnest, for many were anxious to secure some little memento of the great actress. But in the end, the ebony was knocked down, at some six or seven hundred francs, to the purchaser of St. Denis. It was a low price; the son was delighted; the old man doubted. The next day he posts to the hotel, to have a sight of his purchase; he scrapes a little from the corner of a chair; all seems well, and he is satisfied. In two days the late dumb ministers to the luxury of Madame Rachel are duly installed in the mansion of the old gentleman of St. Denis. But, on closer inspection, the ebony proves to be only pear wood, richly stained and polished! The veteran posts forthwith to the rooms of the tragedian, and makes known the deception, charitably offering to share the loss. Madame Rachel is engaged, and can listen to no such tale. Again and again the old man renews his efforts, until his patience failing, the matter comes before the courts. Meantime, a friend of the complainant had communicated an important piece of testimony. It seems a catalogue had been made out, and submitted to Madame Rachel, in which the articles in dispute were entered simply as black furniture. Madame Rachel declined the use of the term, as calculated to vulgarize her old chamber equipments, and says in a note, write "ebony." It is written; and Melpomene stands charged with selling pear wood for ebony. Her advocate contends that catalogues frequently make use of figurative expressions, not to be understood literally; that, for instance, a bedstead of mahogany is not to be taken as really such, but as one inlaid (veneered) with mahogany; so an ebony fauteuil made to resemble ebony. Moreover, the articles had been publicly exposed; and instead of paying seven thousand francs, which would have been the price of genuine ebony, the plaintiff had paid but seven hundred. In short, the tragedian carried the court, as she carried the audience, by storm. The poor old gentleman has classic authority to call his fauteuil ebony, or pear wood, but can make no demands upon the tragic Electra."

766. COMEDY AND TRAGEDY EXCHANGED.

Foote once came to Edinburgh, with a complete company of comedians, but did not receive much encouragement. At length, after he had pined a month, a nobleman, residing in town, ordered a tragedy, and insisted on Foote and all his comedians performing in it, notwithstanding their not being all adapted for that branch of dramatic representation. The thing took well, on account of its absurdity, and the execrable acting; and, after a fortnight of crowded houses, Foote returned in good spirits, remarking, that if comedy had become tragedy with him in one respect, tragedy, or something very like it, had become comedy in another.

767. DUCHESS OF BOLTON.

Lavinia Fenton, afterwards Duchess of Bolton, was tempted by Rich from the Haymarket to Lincoln's Inn Fields, in the year 1728, by a salary of fifteen shillings per week. On the success of the Beggar's Opera, to secure this valuable actress, he raised it to thirty shillings! and such was the rage of the town respecting her, that she was obliged to be guarded home every night by a considerable party of her confidential friends, to prevent her being run away with.

768. MRS. SIDDON'S RISE.

Although some difference of opinion exists as to the relative merits of male tragedians, yet, by common consent, Mrs. Siddons is allowed to be the greatest actress that ever trod the British stage. This lady, who is a sister of Mr. Kemble, first became a candidate for public favor as a singer; but she soon abandoned the operatic line for the most sublime department of the drama—tragedy. It was on the 12th of October, 1782, that Mrs. Siddons first appeared at Drury Lane Theatre in the character of Isabella. The excellence of her performance was universally acknowledged and applauded; but the surest test of its merit was in the sympathy of the audience, which was not only evinced by tears, but such was the "cunning of the scene," that several ladies actually fainted. Her fame was at once established as the first tragedian in Europe; and the numerous characters which she successively added to that of Isabella fully justified the first decision of the public. Testimonials of her transcendent talents were poured in from all quarters; and the gentlemen of the bar subscribed a purse of one hundred guineas, which was presented by Mr. (afterwards Sir Arthur) Pigott and Mr. Fielding, accompanied by a very polite letter, expressing their admiration of her talents.

769. KEMBLE'S CLOSING SCENE.

The character fixed upon, with happy propriety, for J. P. Kemble's closing scene, was Macbeth. He had labored under a severe cold for a few days before, but on the memorable night of the 29th of March, 1817, the physical annoyance yielded to the energy of his mind. He was, he said, in the greenroom immediately before the curtain rose, determined to leave behind him the most perfect specimen of his art which he had ever shown; and his success was complete. At the moment of the tyrant's death, the curtain fell, amid the unanimous acclamation of the audience. The applauses were vehement and prolonged; they ceased—were resumed—rose again—were reiterated—and again were hushed. In a few minutes the curtain ascended, and Mr. Kemble came forth, in the dress of Macbeth, (the audience by a consentaneous movement rising to receive him,) to deliver his address. . . . Mr. Kemble delivered the lines with exquisite beauty, and with an effect that was evinced by the tears and sobs of many of the audience. His own emotions were very conspicuous. When his farewell was closed, he lingered long on the stage, as if unable to retire. The house again stood up, and cheered him with the waving of hats and long shouts of applause.

770. MRS. BILLINGTON AND HAYDON

Mrs. Billington, who was enthusiastically admired by Haydon, once showed him and asked his opinion of a portrait of herself, which had just been finished by Sir Joshua Reynolds, representing her in the character of St. Cecilia, listening to the celestial music, as she is generally drawn. "It is like," said he, "but there is a strange mistake." "What is it?" hastily asked Reynolds, who was present. "You have painted her listening to the angels; you ought to have represented the angels as listening to her." Mrs. Billington sprang up and threw her arms around his neck with delight at the happy compliment.

771. RUBINI'S REASON FOR NOT LEAVING THE STAGE.

When Rubini was asked how it came that he took leave of the public so often, and yet returned, he said, "I find it a most difficult thing to take leave of a hundred pounds a night."

772. KEAN AND HUGHES.

Mr John Hughes, who for a series of years had been Kean's most zealous and attached friend and counsellor, and who had invariably stuck to him, with the greatest constancy, "through weal and through woe," "through ill and through good report," was acting at Tewkesbury at one guinea per night; Kean, being the leader in tragedy, comedy, and opera, received one pound five shillings per week, and they chummed together, (as they had done for years;) the domestic and pecuniary arrangements, from motives of frugality and prudence, being always committed to Hughes's charge. It happened, however, that on a particular day at the end of a week, they were, in consequence of the exercise of a little prodigality at the commencement of the said week, literally without breakfast or dinner; but—mark the change of fortune—on that very day five years Hughes's circumstances were considerably improved, and Kean absolutely received one hundred and fifty guineas for his day's work, having played at Tewkesbury in the morning, (the theatre having been darkened,) at Gloucester in the afternoon, and at Cheltenham at night; and for each performance he received fifty guineas.

773. MRS. BELLAMY'S PATRON.

The last Duchess of Queensbury was of an eccentric, but of a benevolent disposition. She once sent for the celebrated Mrs. Bellamy, a few days before that fixed for her benefit; but refused to see her because she was dressed in a silk gown, and went in a chair; but notwithstanding, she engaged almost all the boxes at the benefit, and, on the morning after, presented her with two hundred and seventy guineas, a bill of considerable value, and sent her home in her own coach.

§ 86. MISFORTUNES AND TRIALS.

774. KEEN REPARTEE.

In a provincial town, an actor, who probably felt considerable difficulty in providing the necessary funds for stage dresses, or even clean linen, was playing the part of Arbate in Racine's Mithridates; when Mithridates appears in the third scene of the second act, and says to his confidant,—

*"Enfin, après un an, je te revois, Arbate,"  a wag in the pit stood up on the seat, and continued the speech,—

"Avec les mêmes bas et la même cravate," † which produced a roar of laughter in the house.

775. A FALLEN STAR.

Poor Berry was once the idol of the Edinburgh audiences, and, beyond doubt, the best low comedian of his day. Liston, Matthews, and Emery, combined, would not have formed a better actor than Jack Berry; but dissipation, and repeated acts of neglect of his profession through dissipation, at length so exhausted the kindness and patience of Mr. Henry Siddons, that he was reluctantly compelled to abandon him; and, in leaving the Edinburgh theatre, the last restraint upon his unhappy failing was lost in Dumbarton, where he and his wife had been giving an entertainment of a theatrical nature. He fell, in a state of intoxication, against a glass door, lacerating his arm in so dreadful a manner as to produce lock-jaw, from which, by care and attention of his physician, he recovered,

* After a year's absence, I see you again, Arbate.

† With the same stockings, and that &c but was never the same man again. He became a member of a travelling company, performing in the open air, at fairs; and thus the man whose talents had delighted the most enlightened audience in the British empire was converted into a low buffoon of a mountebank's caravan. He died in abject misery, almost shunned by his pot-house companions.

776. THEATRICAL BON-MOT.

In a very thin house an actress spoke very low in her communication with her lover. The actor, whose benefit it happened to be, exclaimed with a face of woful humor, "My dear, you may speak out; there is nobody to hear us."

777. A COMEDIAN'S TOOTH.

Spiller, the player, being one evening behind the scenes, tormented by a violent toothache, the barber offered to relieve him by drawing it. "No, my good friend," replied he, "I cannot spare one tooth now; but on the tenth of June the house closes, and you may then draw every tooth I have, for I am sure, after that, I shall have nothing to eat."

778. MRS. PORTER'S LAMENESS.

Her history inspires regret. With a character not only unquestioned, but marked by the noblest traits of generosity, she had to ply her profession for many years on the stage when she was absolutely a cripple. The cause of her lameness deserves honorable mention. On a summer evening, when she was taking the air in a one-horse chaise, having with her, according to custom, a brace of pistols, to defend her against robbery, a highwayman came up, and demanded her money; she levelled one of her pistols at him; the assailant immediately changed his tone to supplication, told her his name and the abode of his starving family, and appealed to her compassion so strongly that she gave him ten guineas out of her purse. He left her, and she lashed her horse to go on; but the animal started out of his track, upset the chaise, and caused her, by the fall, to dislocate her hip-joint. Notwithstanding all the pain and loss which the man had thus occasioned to her, she inquired into his circumstances, and, finding that he had told her the truth, she raised sixty pounds amongst her acquaintance, and sent it to the relief of his family. She was so much injured by this accident, that in acting Elizabeth, in the Albion Queens, she had to support herself on a crutch; but she turned even that circumstance to advantage, for, after signing Mary's death warrant, she expressed her agitation by striking the stage with her cane so violently as to bring forth bursts of applause. When she could act no longer, in consequence of her lameness, she had to subsist upon charity. Dr. Johnson paid her a visit some years before her death. She was then so wrinkled, that he said a picture of old age in the abstract might have been taken from her countenance.

779. CAPTAIN MORRIS, JOHN KEMBLE, JACK BANNISTER, AND THE DUKE OF NORFOLK.

Captain Morris, whose Bacchanalian songs are well known, was, in his advanced age, compelled to exist on a small income. The Duke of Norfolk, whose table he had for many years gladdened, if not graced, was one evening lamenting very pathetically to John Kemble, over the fifth bottle, the precarious state of Charles Morris's income. John did not like at first to tell the duke plainly what he, as a rich man, ought to do; but when the sixth bottle was produced, Kemble arose "like a tower," and broke out, as Jack Bannister tells the story, into a sort of blank verse speech, into the numbers of which he always fell, when nearly intoxicated. As Bannister relates it, the speech was as follows—true, as Kemble ever was, to the very rhythm of Shakespeare:—

"And does your grace sincerely thus regret
The destitute condition of your friend.
With whom you've passed so many pleasant hours?
Your grace hath spoke of it most movingly.
Is't possible the highest peer o' th' realm,
Amidst the prodigalities of fortune,
Should see the woes which he would not relieve?
The empty breath and vapor of the world
Of common sentiment become no man:

How should it, then, be worthy of your grace?
But Heaven, lord duke, hath placed you in a sphere
Where the wish to be kind, and being so,
Are the same thing. A small annuity
From your o'erflowing hoards, a nook of land
Clipped from the boundless round of your domains,
Would ne'er be felt "a monstrous cantle out;"
But you would be repaid with usury;
Your gold, my lord, with prayers of grateful joy;
Your fields would be o'erflowed with thankful tears,
Ripening the harvest of a grateful heart."

It is almost needless to say, what every body knows, that the duke at once granted the prayer of the actor's petition.

780. THE INSANE ACTOR.

Mr. Taylor thus relates the cause of the madness of Reddish: "His insanity took place soon after an unlucky occurrence at Covent Garden, the first night of his engagement. He appeared in the part of Hamlet, and in a fencing scene between him and Laertes, Whitefield, who performed the latter character, made so clumsy a lunge, that he struck off the bag-wig of Hamlet, and exposed his bald pate to the laughter of the audience. In conversing with him in Bedlam, I soothed him by telling him that I was present at the scene, and that though the accident had a risible effect, the audience knew the fault was to be wholly ascribed to the awkwardness of his competitor. The mortification, however, made so strong an impression on his mind, that he never appeared on the stage again, and, I heard, ended his days in the infirmary at York. He was the second husband of Mrs. Canning, the mother of our late eminent statesman, Mr. George Canning. He distinguished himself chiefly in the characters of Edgar, Posthumous, and Henry the Sixth in the play of Richard III. Poor Reddish!"

781. THE HALF-STARVED ACTOR.

Colley Cibber relates that a poor, half-starved actor, who used to play the apothecary, in Romeo and Juliet, to the life, and with great applause, received an augmentation of salary in consequence of his popularity. Unfortunately, an increase of wealth led him to increase his fare, until he gradually assumed a plumpness which unfitted him for the worn-out pharmacopoliist; and not being able to perform in any other line, the poor man was discharged. However, poverty once more brought him down to his original condition, when he reappeared upon the boards as triumphantly as ever.

§ 87. INFLUENCE OF IMAGINATION.

782. MISS SHERRIFF'S PERFORMANCE OF CLARI.

An audience at the National Theatre, in 1839, were electrified by a scene, which offered a curious instance of the effect of imaginary woes in producing a display of actual passion and distress. It occurred in Miss Sherriff's personation of Clari, in John Howard Payne's pathetic drama of the Maid of Milan. In the last scene of the play, the penitent Clari, who has been seduced from her humble but happy home by Vivaldi, a proud young nobleman, returns and seeks her parents. She first encounters her mother, to whom she is soon reconciled. But the father, who is of sterner stuff, spurns her from his path. It was in the midst of his terrible imprecation upon his child, that Miss Sherriff, as Clari, rapt by the cunning of the scene, and by a sensitive imagination, full into hysterics, and uttered the most piercing shrieks. The curtain was immediately dropped upon the scene, the effect of which upon the audience was that which might have been naturally awakened by an actual occurrence of an intensely tragic nature. Many instances of a similar kind have been mentioned. Mrs. Sloman, in Philadelphia, was agitated in a like manner while personating the part of Mrs. Beverly, in the Gamester.

783. MOLIERE AND ANOTHER ACTOR.

Molière, the celebrated comedian, and styled by Voltaire "the best comic poet that ever lived in any nation," was seized with death while acting in the character of a sick man, in Le Malade Imaginaire, one of his own plays. According to another account, his death is attributed to performing in ill health. The same part, it is said, proved fatal to the actor who succeeded him.

784. MADAME MALIBRAN.

"A few details will prove that dramatic genius arises in a great measure from deep feeling; and this great tragic actress, Malibran, having, in the pursuit of her avocation, accompanied by great private sorrows, over-excited her nervous system, was subject to fits of hysteria, akin to epilepsy, and to attacks of catalepsy, such as I have never seen elsewhere, and hope never to see again. For example: having been one day informed, falsely as it proved, that her brother was killed at Algiers, her whole frame became immovable, and as suddenly as if she had been converted into a statue by the wand of an enchanter. She remained standing for two hours, neither hearing nor seeing any external object. Waking from her trance, when her attendants were off their guard, she unconsciously precipitated herself down a flight of stone stairs, cutting herself severely in her fall. Being taken up, she remained inanimate and motionless, until, in the middle of the night, she was seized by an automatic movement, when she began to roll over and over, from right to left; such a motion as Magendi, if I remember rightly, describes as taking place when the cerebellum was pierced in a certain place.

"The day afterwards Madame Malibran insisted upon fulfilling her duties at the King's Theatre; was lifted into her carriage, not being able to stand; was taken out in the same manner; was dressed, while sitting, for her part in the Semiramide; and when the moment came that she was to appear, to the unutterable astonishment of her friends, she rushed on the stage, and drew down thunders of applause by her unrivalled acting and singing. Every time she came off the stage, she retched violently, until the blood came, and, soon after the performance was over, relapsed into her insensibility. On other occasions, when other persons would have required bleeding, she recovered without it; and on all occasions of illness, her frame required artificial support to a most unusual extent."

785. AN AMATEUR.

Charles Hulet, a comedian of some celebrity in the early part of the last century, was an apprentice to a bookseller. After reading plays in his master's shop, he used to repeat speeches in the kitchen, in the evening, to the destruction of many a chair, which he substituted in the room of the real persons in the drama. One night, as he was repeating the part of Alexander, with his wooden representative of Clitus, (an elbow-chair,) and coming to the speech where the old general is to be killed, this young mock Alexander snatched a poker, instead of a javelin, and threw it with such strength against poor Clitus, that the chair was killed upon the spot, and lay mangled on the floor. The death of Clitus made a monstrous noise, which disturbed the master in the parlor, who called out to know the reason, and was answered by the cook below, "Nothing, sir, but that Alexander has killed Clitus."

786. BETTERTON.

The assumption of a variety of characters by a person of irritable and delicate nerves has often a tragical effect on the mental faculties. We might draw up a list of actors who have fallen martyrs to their tragic characters. Betterton, although his countenance was ruddy and sanguine when he performed Hamlet, at the appearance of the ghost, through the violent and sudden emotion of amazement and horror in the presence of his father's spectre, instantly turned as white as his neckcloth, while his whole body seemed to be affected with a strong tremor. Had his father's apparition actually risen before him, he could not have been seized with more real agonies. This struck the spectators so forcibly, that they felt a shuddering in their veins, and participated in the astonishment and the horror so apparent in the actor.

787. THE FICTITIOUS AND THE REAL

It is certain that the constant simulation of infirmities on the stage sometimes leads to real sufferings of the same kind, and even to death. Molière, the comedian, died in Paris, in 1673, while acting the character of a sick man in Le Malade Imaginaire. The same part also proved fatal to the actor who succeeded him.

Mr. Bond, the translator of Buchanan's History, so yielded himself up to the force and impetuosity of his imagination, when acting the character of Lusignan, in the tragedy of Zara, that, on the discovery of his daughter, he fainted away, and soon closed his eyes in death.

Pliny relates a story of an actor who imitated the gout so naturally as at length to bring that disorder upon him.

Madame Clarion, the celebrated French actress, accounted for her prematurely growing old in appearance by the influences of the grief and distresses with which she had been constantly overwhelmed on the stage. This celebrated woman, however, had her life protracted far beyond the usual period of existence, and, in the eighty-first year of her age, she delighted John Kemble, who paid her a complimentary visit, with a most energetic recitation of one of the scenes of Phædra.

788. JOHN KEMBLE.

Perhaps no man ever acted so completely up to a character as Kemble. For the time, he almost imagined himself to be the very thing he represented. The following example to the above rule happened one night at a provincial theatre, when John performed the character of Brutus. The unfortunate wight, who that evening represented Mark Antony, fatigued by his exertions, sought, behind the scenes, refreshment from a tankard of cool porter. John, making an exit from the stage, caught the noble Antony in the very act. He shrank aghast from the horrid sight! Mark Antony drinking porter! Kemble struck the offending pewter pot from the luckless actor's hands, ran to his tiring-room, threw himself on a sofa, and much time elapsed before his brother actors could prevail upon him to continue the performance.

789. THEATRICAL QUACKERY OF MISS CHESTER.

On the quackery of her system of doing tragedy, a most whimsical and generally accredited anecdote is on record.

While Miss Chester was at York, one evening, having to perform a serious scene of Lady Townley, in the comedy of the Provoked Husband, she was observed, between the fourth and fifth acts, in a rather retired part behind the wings, sobbing and moaning, and beating her bosom in a most unusual manner for an actress not en scène.

One of the actors very kindly asked her the cause of the grief so painfully expressed. She replied not in words, but motioned him to be gone, and then sighed and moaned more enthusiastically and vociferously than before. The good-natured actor, alarmed at a pretty woman's grief, entreated her to retire to her dressing-room, and let the other ladies assist to console her; on which she suddenly suspended her tones of grief, and snappishly exclaimed,—

"Go along, sir,—leave me,—for I am working up my feelings for the last scene."

This became a by-word and a jest among the frequenters of the greenroom.

§ 88. SELF-ESTEEM, ENVY, AND SIMILAR TRAITS.

790. MRS. CLIVE AND GARRICK.

The celebrated Mrs. Clive was an actress of considerable repute in London long before Garrick appeared upon the stage. When his genius broke forth in the metropolis, every other performer sunk at once into the shade, and Mrs. Clive, as well as the rest, with all her original merit, fell into comparative insignificance. Her temper was violent, and her manners coarse. She always vented her spleen, without restraint, upon Garrick, and even affected to deny his merit as an actor. One night, while he was performing Lear, she stood behind the scenes attending to his performance. Unable, with all her masculine roughness of character, to resist the pathetic touches of his skill, she remained fixed on the spot, sobbing and abusing him at the same moment. At length, after repeated alternations of tears and curses, wholly overcome by the affecting powers of the great actor before her, she hastily rushed from the place, with the following strange, but expressive tribute to the universality of his skill: "I believe he could ACT A GRIDIRON."

791. GARRICK AND FIELDING.

Garrick's parsimony has been a subject of much discussion. He gave a dinner, at his lodgings, to Fielding, Macklin, Havard, Mrs. Cibber, and some others. Vails (presents) to servants being then much in fashion, most of the company gave Garrick's man, David, (a Welshman,) something at parting, some a shilling, some half a crown, &c., whilst Fielding very formally slipped a piece of paper in his hand, with something folded up in it. When the company were all gone, David seeming to be in high glee, Garrick asked him how much he got.

"I can't tell you, sir," said Davy; "here is half a crown from Mrs. Cibber,—Got pless her!—here is a shilling from Mr. Macklin, here is two from Mr. Havard, and here is something from the poet—Got pless his merry heart!"

By this time David had unfolded the paper, when, to his great astonishment, he saw that it contained no more than one penny! Garrick felt nettled at this, and next day spoke to Fielding about the impropriety of jesting with a servant.

"Jesting!" said Fielding, with seeming surprise; "so far from it, I meant to do the fellow a real piece of service; for had I given him a shilling or half a crown, I knew you would have taken it from him! but by giving him only a penny, I knew he had a chance of calling it his own!"

792. MACREADY'S DYING SPOT.

Mr. Macready was never popular with stock actors. He annoyed them exceedingly at rehearsals, by giving every man his particular place on the stage, so that in the picture presented he should be the centre. This actor must stand here, that actor there—it was his will.

On one of the nights of his last engagement in New Orleans, when he was to play Hamlet, he was very particular, at rehearsal, in the disposition of characters at the fall of the curtain. He had selected the most commanding place on the stage, well down to the lights, and declared that there he intended to die. It so happened, that as the fatal moment was approaching, just after Hamlet had stabbed the king, his majesty took it into his head to die on the spot selected by the philosophic Dane. The poison was burning in Hamlet's veins; he was in the agonies of death; but still he found time to say, sotto voce, to his step-father,—

"Back—back—I'm going to die there."

The blood of outraged royalty was up, and the stabbed monarch replied,—

"I'm king, and I'll die where I please—pick out a place for yourself." And Hamlet was compelled to let his soul out farther up the stage.

793. COLLEY CIBBER.

Colley Cibber, known for some years by the name of Master Colley, made his first appearance on the stage in a very subordinate situation. After waiting impatiently for the prompter's notice, he by good fortune obtained the honor of carrying a message on the stage to one of the principal actors of that day, whom he greatly disconcerted by his awkwardness. Betterton, in anger, inquired who it was that had committed such a blunder. Drones, the prompter, replied, "Master Colley." "Then forfeit him," rejoined Betterton. "Why, sir, he has no salary." "No! then put him down ten shillings a week, and forfeit him five." To this good-natured adjustment of rewards and punishments Cibber owed the first money he received from the dramatic treasury.

Cibber, in a conversation with Mrs. Bracegirdle on the subject of Garrick's performance of Bays in the Rehearsal, spoke of the Roscius with affected derogation, saying, "To be sure, Garrick was well enough, but not superior to his son Theophilus." Mrs. Bracegirdle replied, "Come, come, Cibber, tell me if there is not something like envy in your character of this young gentleman? The actor who pleases every body must be a man of merit." The old man felt the force of this sensible rebuke, and frankly replied, "Why, faith, Bracy, I believe you are right; the young fellow is clever."

794. THE RULING PASSION.

R., who in his earlier days had been the hero of a barn, was for some years playing a humble line of business at the Liverpool theatre; his dignity was hurt, but the salary was consolatory. On the night that Palmer had expired on the stage, R. was smoking a pipe in an adjoining tavern. One of the performers suddenly rushed in, pale and agitated, exclaiming, "John Palmer has dropped down dead in the third act!" "Aha!" said Mr. R., after a pause of surprise, "and who have they sent for to finish the part?"

795. JOHNSON AND GARRICK.

Dr. Johnson said one day to Hawkins, "Garrick, I hear, complains that I am the only popular author of his time who has exhibited no praise of him in print; but he is mistaken. Akenside has forborne to mention him. Some, indeed, are lavish in their applause of all who come within the compass of their recollection; yet he who praises every body praises nobody; when both scales are equally loaded, neither can preponderate."

796. MISS POPE'S WAIST.

Miss Pope was rallied one evening in the green-room, by a certain actress, more noted for her gallantries than professional talents, on the largeness of her waist; on which she observed, "I could only wish it, madam, as slender as your reputation."

797. MACREADY SUBSTITUTING KEMBLE.

A benefit for the Philanthropic Society being in hand, Mr. C. Kemble, who was to have performed on that occasion the character of Romeo, (though too old for it,) in the tragedy of Romeo and Juliet, being taken ill, the committee of members appointed to superintend the performance found it necessary to apply to Mr. Macready, who it was by no means certain would become the substitute for Mr. C. Kemble. They accordingly waited on Mr. Macready, who received them politely, but with a great portion of that superabundant importance for which he is so much distinguished. On the committee communicating to him the nature of their mission, the hero of the buskin, prudently considering that it might not redound to his credit to refuse assisting a public charity, replied with lofty condescension, "I will certainly act for the benefit of the Philanthropic Society; but I see how it is—as you cannot have the corporal, you now apply to the general!"

798. COLLOT D'HERBOIS.

The French revolution, among its illustrations of the worst human passions, exhibits one in Collet d'Herbois. When this wretch was tossed up, in the storm, to the summit of power, a monstrous imagination seized him; he projected razing the city of Lyons, and massacring its inhabitants. He had even the heart to commence, and to continue this conspiracy against human nature: the ostensible motive was royalism, but the secret one was literary vengeance! As wretched a poet and actor as a man, he had been hissed off the theatre in Lyons; and his dark, remorseless genius resolved to repay that ignominy by the blood of its citizens and the very walls of the city. Is there but one Collet d'Herbois in the universe?

799. KEAN'S EXPENDITURES.

From the January of 1814 to that of 1833, Kean was the star of the British stage, and his individual talents drew more, and for the exertion of these talents he himself received more, than any three performers that coëxisted with him. His books show a sum nearly averaging £10,000 a year for eighteen years. How, with his active life, so vast a sum could have been expended—for he never gambled—is one of the things which those who knew him best can never cease to wonder at. He had some silly habits of display, such as travelling on all occasions in a carriage and four; but his household expenses were always on a moderate scale; yet a few days before his death he was in danger of an arrest for a sum not exceeding 100l.

800. SHAKSPEARE'S GHOST.

"Shakspeare haunts me night and day," said a stage-strutting hero. "That he is so eternally haunted is not to be wondered at," said a bystander, "at all; for he has most cruelly murdered him, to my certain knowledge, in every character of that author he ever attempted to represent."

801. KEAN AND THE BULLY.

Kean got into a quarrel one night with a powerful fellow at a house in Clare market, and was at last stripped and fighting with his superior in strength, size, and science. His friends got him away to the Bedford, and they sat down to supper, during which one of the party said, "I am glad we were there; the fellow you were fighting with was —, who had a hard contest with the Gas Light Man." Soon after, Kean was missed, and it ultimately appeared that he had left the Bedford, sought out his antagonist, and fought with him in the street, and that in consequence the guardians of the night conveyed them to St. Dunstan's watch-house, from whence they were bailed by Mrs. Butler, of Covent Garden market. It is to be noted that Kean insisted on his adversary being bailed by his (Kean's) friends, with the express intent of going to fight it out in a room, to see if he could beat this terrible fellow from Oxford; but he was at length pacified.

802. MUNDEN AND THE HAUNCH OF VENISON.

It is related of Munden, the actor, that he was once, at a dinner, placed behind a haunch of venison, and requested to carve it. "Really, gentlemen," said he, "I know very little about anatomy; I dare say, now, there is some particular cut in the haunch—some favorite bon morceau; I dare say there is; but, I assure you, I am quite ignorant where to pick for it." A dozen knives instantly started up from the cloth, and Munden was instructed where the favorite piece lay. Joe uttered a whole string of thanks, working out the prime slice, loaded it with sauce and jelly, and then, with the plate in his hand, looked through his glasses round the table. Every mouth watered, every hand was raised, and every tooth prepared. "I wish I could please you all; but if I give the titbit to one, I shall offend all the rest; so, egad," added he, "I'll keep it myself, and every gentleman can help himself to what he likes best."

803. GARRICK'S VANITY.

The vanity of David Garrick was insatiate; and, being so visible to all, they had but to administer to this weakness, and they achieved their point. Mallet, who wrote the Life of the Duke of Marlborough, wishing to have his tragedy of Elvira brought forward, adopted this mode: Having waited upon him one day, after the common salutation, Mr. Garrick asked him what then employed his studies. "Why, upon my word," said Mallet, "I am eternally fatigued with preparing and arranging materials for the Life of the Great Duke of Marlborough. My nights, my days are occupied with that history; and you know, Mr. Garrick, that it is a very bright and interesting period in the British annals. But hark ye, my friend; do you know that I have found out a very pretty, snug niche in it for you?" "Hey! how's that? a niche for me!" said the manager, turning quickly upon him, his eyes sparkling with unusual fire. "How could you bring me into the history of John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough?" "That's my business, my dear friend," rejoined Mallet, "but I tell you I have done it." "Well, Mallet, you have the art of surprising your friends in the most unexpected and the politest manner; but why won't you now, who are so well qualified, write something for the stage? You should relax, you know; for I am sure the theatre is a mere matter of diversion, a pleasure to you." "Why," said the other, "to tell you the truth, I have, whenever I could rob the duke of an hour or so, employed myself in adapting La Motte's Ines de Castro to the English stage; and here it is." The manager embraced Elvira with rapture, and brought it forward with all expedition.

A gentleman of the law, who could not miss such an opportunity of laughing at Mr. Garrick's preposterous vanity, met him one day, and told him he had been applied to by the booksellers to publish an edition of the Statutes at Large, and he hoped he should find a snug niche in them to introduce him.

804. G. F. COOKE IN AMERICA.

Shortly after Cooke arrived in America, he was one evening in company with a number of actors, whom he bored outrageously. "Mr. H.," said he, "what do you know of the stage? You are no actor, although the applause you receive from the Yankees makes you think yourself one." From the woe-begone appearance of the young Thespian, the tragedian thought he had proceeded too far, and, endeavoring to heal the wound he had inflicted, rose with tears in his eyes, and observed, "What I said was in jest. I hold your professional talents in high estimation, and now freely make the acknowledgment." H. burst out in a loud laugh, exclaiming, "You old quiz, will you again say that I am no actor?"

§ 89. POWERS OF IMITATION.

805. TALMA AND THE OFFICER.

When Talma was once performing Hamlet at Arras, in the fifth scene, where he is about to stab his mother, a military stranger was so overcome by the tragic powers of the actor, that he was carried out of the theatre. His first words on recovery were, "Has he killed his mother?"

806. FOOTE'S MIMICRY.

Foote, the Aristophanes of the day, was a frequent visitor to the shop of Davies, at that time the resort of so many of the great literati of the age. His broad face was ever beaming with fun and wagery, and his satirical eye was ever on the lookout for characters and incidents for his farces. He was struck with the odd habits and appearance of Johnson and Goldsmith, now so often brought together in Davies's shop. He was about to put on the stage a farce called the Orators, intended as a hit at the Robin Hood debating club, and resolved to show up the two doctors in it for the entertainment of the town.

"What is the common price of an oak stick, sir?" said Johnson to Davies. "Sixpence," was the reply. "Why, then, sir, give me leave to send your servant to purchase a shilling one. I'll have a double quantity; for I am told Foote means to take me off, as he calls it, and I am determined the fellow shall not do it with impunity."

Foote had no disposition to undergo the criticism of the cudgel wielded by such potent hands, so the farce of the Orators appeared without the caricatures of the lexicographer and the essayist.

807. GARRICK SITTING FOR A PORTRAIT.

David Garrick sat many times to Sir Joshua Reynolds for different portraits. At one of those sittings he gave a very amusing account of his having sat once for his portrait to an indifferent painter, whom he wantonly teased; for when the artist had worked on the face till he had drawn it very correctly, as he saw it at the time, Garrick caught an opportunity, whilst the painter was not looking at him, totally to change his countenance and expression, when the poor painter patiently worked on to alter the picture, and make it like what he then saw; and when Garrick perceived that it was thus altered, he seized another opportunity, and changed his countenance to a third character, which, when the poor tantalized artist perceived, he, in a great rage, threw down his pallet and pencils on the floor, saying he believed he was painting from the devil, and would do no more to the picture.

808. GARRICK AND MADAME CLAIRON.

When the great actor, Garrick, was at Paris, he visited the celebrated Madame Clairon. In the course of his conversation with her, he asked her if she had ever heard of the Gamut of the Passions. She expressed her ignorance of what he meant; he immediately, with his voice and countenance, ran over the whole scale and compass of them, beginning with the most simple, and gradually proceeding to the most complex.

A friend of Garrick asked him why a whisper of his was heard throughout the whole theatre, whilst the loud acclamations of many of his colleagues were occasionally completely unintelligible. "The blockheads," replied he, "have no idea of distinctness in their speaking; they know not how to acquire "A temperance that may give it smoothness."

809. MATHEWS.

"Mathews, the comedian," says Leigh Hunt, "I had the pleasure of seeing at Mr. Hill's several times, and of witnessing his imitations, which, admirable as they were on the stage, were still more so in private.

"The reasons why Mathews's imitations were still better in private than in public, were, that he was more at his ease personally, more secure of his audience, ('fit, though few,') and able to interest them with traits of private character, which could not have been introduced on the stage. He gave, for instance, to persons who he thought could take it rightly, a picture of the manners and conversation of Sir Walter Scott, highly creditable to that celebrated person, and calculated to add regard to admiration. His commonest imitations were not superficial. Something of the mind and character of the individual was always insinuated, often with a dramatic dressing, and plenty of sauce piquante. At Sydenham he used to give us a dialogue among the actors, each of whom found fault with another for some defect or excess of his own, Kemble objecting to stiffness, Munden to grimace, and so on. His representation of Incedon was extraordinary; his nose seemed actually to become aquiline. It is a pity I cannot put upon paper, as represented by Mr. Mathews, the singular gabblings of that actor, the lax and sailor-like twist of mind, with which every thing hung upon him; and his profane pieties in quoting the Bible; for which, and swearing, he seemed to have an equal reverence. He appeared to be charitable to every body but Braham.

"As Hook made extempore verses on us, so Mathews one day gave an extempore imitation of us all around, with the exception of a young theatrical critic,—videlicet, myself,—in whose appearance and manner he pronounced that there was no handle for mimicry; and no harm would have come of it.

"One morning, after stopping all night at this pleasant house, I was getting up to breakfast, when I heard the noise of a little boy having his face washed. Our host was a merry bachelor, and to the rosiness of a priest might, for aught I knew, have added the paternity; but I had never heard of it, and still less expected to find a child in his house. More obvious and obstreperous proofs, however, of the existence of a boy with a dirty face could not have been met with. You heard the child crying and objecting; then the woman remonstrating; the cries of the child snubbed and swallowed up in the hard towel; and at intervals once came his voice, bubbling and deploring, and was again swallowed up. At breakfast, the child being pitted, I ventured to speak about it, and was laughing and sympathizing in perfect good faith, when Mathews came in, and I found that the little urchin was he."

810. THE ADMIRER PANTOMIME.

An ambassador from the King of Pontus, who was present in Rome at the representation of a pantomime, was so satisfied with the intelligence of the actor, that he asked the Emperor Nero to give him to him as a particular favor. "Do not be astonished at my request," said the ambassador; "I have savages for neighbors, whose language no one understands; nor can we make them comprehend what we mean; but this man, who knows how to speak by gestures, will easily make them comprehend our wishes."

Another stranger who was present at the performance of this pantomime, was so astonished at seeing one man execute an entire piece, that in his admiration he addressed these words to the actor: "In one body thou hast more than one soul."

811. GARRICK AND THE DEATH OF WOLFE.

Mr. West's justly admired picture, the Death of General Wolfe, at once raised the painter to a summit of reputation unattained before, and, by affording an ample subject for the talents of Woollet, laid that foundation of an English school of engraving, which brought the art to its present perfection in that country. When this affecting picture was exhibited at the Royal Academy, Mr. Garrick went one morning early, that he might review the exhibition uninterrupted by the crowd, which constantly attended at the fashionable hours. A considerable party was in the room, drawn there, at that hour, by the same motive. Of this number was a young lady, whose personal beauty appeared not to be her only accomplishment. The remarks she made on many of the pictures showed a delicate taste, and considerable knowledge of the arts. They were attended to with pleasure by her friends; and Mr. Garrick, then unknown to most of the company, paid some handsome compliments to her judgment. The Death of Wolfe drew the highest encomiums from every spectator. The young lady was particular in her commendation, but thought the expression not absolutely perfect; there was a something wanting in the general's countenance, which she could not easily describe; there was in that countenance a languor too happily portrayed. The company were dissatisfied with this opinion, and her friends appeared concerned on her account. Garrick, who had listened attentively, and viewed the picture with acute penetration, begged leave to offer something in support of the lady's opinion, which he hoped to convince the company was not altogether erroneous. The lady, he observed, had remarked that there was something wanting in the general's countenance : of that something he would endeavor to supply an idea. He immediately placed himself in the attitude so judiciously chosen by the painter, supported by two gentlemen of the company ; and displayed, in his own face, the exact countenance depicted by the artist. He then assumed a most animated expression of that transient rapture which history records the dying hero to have felt at the joyful words, "They run!" "Who run?" "The French!" He maintained the representation a sufficient length of time for every one present to compare, and feel, the astonishing effect of his inimitable performance. A burst of applause followed, which, he politely declared, was justly due to the discernment of the lady, who had suggested, perhaps, the only improvement of which that masterly work was susceptible.

812. FOOTE AND GEORGE FAULKNER.

When Foote was acting in Dublin, he introduced into one of his pieces, called the Orators, the character of George Faulkner, the celebrated printer, whose manner and dress he so closely imitated, that the poor fellow could not appear in public without meeting with the scoffs and jeers of the very boys in the streets. Enraged at the ridicule thus brought upon him, Faulkner one evening treated to the seat of the gods all the devils of the printing office, for the express purpose of their hissing and hooting Foote off the stage. Faulkner placed himself in the pit to enjoy the actor's degradation ; but when the objectionable scene came on, the unfortunate printer was excessively chagrined to find that, so far from a groan or a hiss being heard, his gallery friends partook of the comical laugh. The next morning he arraigned his inky conclave, inveighed against them for having neglected his injunctions, and on demanding some reason for their treachery, was lacerated ten times deeper by the simplicity of their answer. "Arrah, master," said the spokesman, "do not be after tipping us your blarney : do you think we did not know you ? Sure 'twas your own sweet self that was on the stage, and shower light upon us if we go to the playhouse to hiss our worthy master."

Failing in this experiment, Faulkner commenced an action against Foote, and got a verdict of damages to the amount of three hundred pounds. This drove Foote back again to England, where he resumed his mimicry, and humorously took off the lawyers on his trial, and the judges who had condemned him.

813. GARRICK AND Mlle. CLAIRON.

Not long before Mr. Garrick left Paris, in 1765, several persons of the first distinction, of both sexes, English and French, met by appointment at the Hotel de ———.

Mr. and Mrs. Garrick, and Mademoiselle Clairon, were of the party. The conversation turned for some time on the belles-lettres, in which the merits of several eminent writers were discussed with equal judgment and candor. Many critical observations were made on the action and eloquence of the French and English theatres ; and at the request of this very brilliant circle, La Clairon and Garrick consented to exhibit various specimens of their talents, which produced much entertainment. This friendly contest lasted a considerable time, with great animation on both sides ; the company loudly declared their approbation, in the strongest terms, of the two exhibitors. It was remarked that the French gave the preference to Mr. Garrick, and that the English, with equal politeness, adjudged the victory to Mademoiselle Clairon. But, as the greater part of the former were but little acquainted with the English language, Mr. Garrick was induced to relate a fact, and afterwards to exhibit it by action, which happened at one of the provinces of France, at a time he was there, and of which he had been an eye-witness. A father, he said, was fondling his child at an open window, whence they looked into the street. By one unlucky effort the child sprang from its father's arms, fell upon the ground, and died upon the spot. What followed, he said, was a language which every body understands, for it was the language of nature. He immediately threw himself into the attitude in which the father appeared at the time the child leaped out of his arms. The influence which the representation of the father's agony produced on such a company, and exhibited by this darling son of nature, in the silent but expressive anguish of unutterable sorrow, is easier to be imagined than expressed. Let it suffice to say, that the greatest astonishment was succeeded by abundant tears. As soon as the company had recovered from their agitation, Mademoiselle Clairon caught Mr. Garrick in her arms and kissed him ; then turning to Mrs. Garrick, she apologized for her conduct by saying it was an involuntary mark of her applause.

814. GARRICK AND PREVILLE.

When Garrick was in France, he made a short excursion from the capital with the celebrated Parisian performer Preville. They were on horseback, and Preville took a fancy to act the part of a drunken cavalier. Garrick applauded the imitation, but told him he wanted one thing which was essential to complete the picture ; he did not make his legs drunk. "Hold, my friend," said he, "and I shall show you an English blood, who, after having dined at a tavern, and swallowed three or four bottles of Port, mounts his horse in a summer evening to go to his box in the country." He immediately proceeded to exhibit all the gradations of intoxication. He called to his servant that the sun and the fields were turning round him ; whipped and spurred his horse until the animal reared and wheeled in every direction. At length he lost his whip, his feet seemed incapable of resting in the stirrups, the bridle dropped from his hand, and he appeared to have lost the use of all his faculties. Finally, he fell from his horse in such a death-like manner, that Preville gave an involuntary cry of horror ; and his terror greatly increased when he found that his friend made no answer to his questions. After wiping the dust from his face, he asked again, with the emotion and anxiety of friendship, whether he was hurt. Garrick, whose eyes were closed, half opened one of them, hiccoughed, and with the most natural tone of intoxication, called for another glass. Preville was astonished ; and when Garrick started up and resumed his usual demeanor, the French actor exclaimed, "My friend, allow the scholar to embrace his master, and thank him for the valuable lesson he has given him!"

815. MATHEWS'S DECEPTIVE POWERS.

A true tale is told of the late Charles Mathews, that, personating an eccentric old gentleman, a family friend, he drank tea with his mother without her finding out the cheat.

816. FOOTE AND GENERAL BLAKENEY.

Foote, whose talent lay in mimicry, even in his early days, had a knack of imitating General Blakeney in the shrug of his shoulders and the lisping of his speech, for which the general was remarkable, so that it grew a common topic among his acquaintances, who used to say, "Come, Sam, let us have the general." A friend at length acquainted Blakeney, who sent for Foote. "Sir," said he, "I hear you have an excellent talent at mimicking characters, and, among the rest, I find I have been the subject of your ridicule." "O sir," said Foote, with great pleasantry, "I take all my acquaintance off at times, and what is more particular, I often take myself off." "Gad so," said the other, "pray let us have a specimen." Foote, on this, put on his hat and gloves, took his cane, and, making a short bow, left the room. The general waited some time for his return; but at length, on inquiry, found he had really taken himself off, by leaving the house.

817. MACREADY'S COLLOQUIAL MANNER.

Mr. Macready's colloquial manner of delivering some of his most striking passages furnishes the subject matter for a brace of amusing anecdotes in Wemyss's book.

"In rehearsing the play of Virginus, at Baltimore, an occurrence took place which caused a hearty laugh at the expense of Mr. William Forrest, (brother to the tragedian,) who was the icilius. Caught by the natural tone and manner of Mr. Macready, who, turning suddenly, said, 'Will you lead Virginia in, or do you wait for me to do it?' 'Whichever you please, Mr. Macready,' was the ready answer. He even deceived the acting manager, Mr. Cowell, old and experienced as he was, in a similar manner in William Tell. When speaking to young Wheatley about his shoe being untied, Cowell said, rather pettishly, 'Don't keep us here all day, Mr. Macready, about the boy's shoe,—go on with the rehearsal.'"

§ 90. HUMOR AND WIT.

818. GARRICK'S RHIME.

Garrick was on a visit at Hagley, when news came that a company of players were going to perform at Birmingham. Lord Lytleton said to Garrick, "They will hear you are in the neighborhood, and will ask you to write an address to the Birmingham audience." "Suppose, then," said Garrick, without the least hesitation, "I begin thus:—

Ye sons of iron, copper, brass, and steel,
Who have not heads to think nor hearts to feel.

"O," cried his lordship, "if you begin thus, they will hiss the players off the stage, and pull the house down." "My lord," said Garrick, "what is the use of an address, if it does not come home to the business and bosoms of the audience?"

819. GARRICK.

Having occasion to go into the city with his friends Mr. Windham, the father of Mr. Windham member for Norfolk, and Dr. Monsey, a well-known character of that time, Garrick suddenly separated from his companions, as they were returning through St. Paul's Churchyard, and, walking into the middle of the road to a place where there was no danger of interruption from carriages, he directed his views towards the sky, and remained fixed in a musing posture, uttering, at times, "I never saw two before." This strange appearance naturally induced people to approach him, and to inquire what was the object of his attention. More, of course, followed, until a large crowd was collected. Garrick continued to repeat the same words, but made no answer to any questions. Various were the conjectures of the people, but no satisfactory solution occurred. At length, a man observed, that the gentleman was certainly looking at two storks, as it was an extraordinary circumstance for more than one bird of that species to be seen at a time. This explanation was well received, until somebody asked, who, but the gentleman himself, saw even a single stork. The multitude was at last so great, that Dr. Monsey and Mr. Windham, apprehending they might be taken for confederates in a plot to make fools, thought proper to retreat from the scene of action. Garrick did not practise this whimsical trick for the mere purpose of wanton merriment, as he contrived, in the midst of his apparent abstraction, to turn his quick and penetrating eyes in all directions, and in the multitude that surrounded him, saw a variety of attitudes and expressions of character, which he treasured in his pregnant mind, in order to render them subservient to his art.

Another time, as he was going down the Strand, near Somerset House, with his friend Monsey, a porter was tripping along and whistling, with every indication of careless good spirit. Garrick told his friend that he would draw a crowd round the man before he reached Temple Bar. For this purpose he went forward and contrived to attract the notice of the lively porter, and gave him such a marked look with his expressive features, that the man's disposition was changed in a moment. He followed Garrick with eyes attentively fixed. Garrick found means to stop till the man came near him, when he looked at him again with a new expression, and proceeded in this manner, hastily departing every time the man approached. At length the poor fellow twisted and turned himself in all directions, in order to see if there was any thing attached to his dress that excited attention, pulling off his wig with the same view, and asking all persons near him, if any thing was the matter with him, that induced the gentleman before him to notice him in so extraordinary a manner, till, at length, Garrick had fully effected his purpose, in seeing a crowd about the man.

§20. FOOTE AND THE SCOLD.

Footo, being scolded by a lady, said, "I have heard of tartar and brimstone: you are the cream of the one and the flower of the other."

§31. COOKE PAWNED.

The celebrated tragedian Mr. Cooke was always fond of a frolic on his benefit night, declaring that he never took liberties with his friends at any other time. It once happened, during an engagement at Philadelphia, that on such an occasion he was short of money, and at a loss to raise the wind for the accustomed breeze. In this dilemma he started up town in a speculative mood, determined to inspirit himself in some way or other. Having reached the corner of Callowhill and Eighth Streets, he cast his eye towards the Delaware, and perceived one of those enticing signs of three golden balls. He turned the corner, and, entering the fatal door, addressed the man behind the counter thus: "My name is Cooke. This is my benefit night. The manager can't do without me, as I am up for Richard III. I want some liquor. I have no money. Now I propose to hypothecate my royal person for ten dollars, and you may lay me up on one of your shelves." The joke was a queer one, and the master of ceremonies paid the ten dollars, and Cooke was laid up.

The theatre that night was crowded, and at seven o'clock the manager came forward to apologize, stating that with the permission of the audience the performance would commence with the farce. He had sent in different directions, but was unable to find Mr. Cooke in the city. He presumed the tragedian would be forthcoming in the course of the next half hour. As the manager retired, he was informed that a boy wished to see him in the greenroom. He found the lad, who presented a note, written in ciphers, which he at length translated thus:—

"My dear —, I am in pawn for ten dollars; send and redeem me, or it will be impossible for Richard to be himself to-night. Yours, Cooke."

The manager started immediately after the fixed star, and found him nicely shelved, with a plate of crackers and cheese, and a bottle of brandy by him. In the button hole of his coat was a piece of paper marked "No. 1473," pawned for ten dollars. The amount was paid, a hack called, and Mr. Cooke and manager rallied to the theatre, where the former had just time to dress, and commence "Now is the winter of our discontent," &c. It is said he never played Richard better, or received greater applause.

§22. GARRICK AND THE DOCTOR.

Dr. Thomson, who was a celebrated physician in his day, was remarkable for two things, viz., slovenliness of his person, and his dislike to muffins, which he always reprobated as being very unwholesome. On his breakfasting one morning at Lord Melcomb's, when Garrick was present, a plate of muffins being introduced, the doctor grew outrageous, and vehemently exclaimed, "Take away the muffins!" "No, no," said Garrick, seizing the plate, and looking significantly at the doctor, "take away the ragamuffins!"

§23. CLEVER PUN.

An actor named Priest was playing at one of the principal theatres. Some one remarked, at the Garrick Club, that there were a great many men in the pit. "Probably clerks, who have taken Priest's orders," said Mr. Poole, one of the best punsters, as well as one of the cleverest comic satirists of the day.

§24. QUIN AND THE LORD.

Quin, like Footo, associated with the best company, and both were also distinguished for a certain contempt for a portion of the society they courted, viz, the more noble, but less intelligent. During one day, at a party in Bath, Quin uttered something which caused a general murmur of delight. A nobleman present, who was not distinguished for the brilliancy of his ideas, exclaimed,—

"What a pity 'tis, Quin, my boy, that a clever fellow like you should be a player!"

Quin fixed and flashed his eyes upon the person, with this reply: "What would your lordship have me be? — a lord?"

§25. QUIN AND THE "SCOUNDREL."

Some person whom Quin had offended met him one day in the street, and stopped him.

"Mr. Quin," said he, "I—I—I understand you have been taking away my name."

"What have I said, sir?"

"You—you—you called me a scoundrel, sir."

"O, then keep your name, sir," replied Quin, and walked on.

§26. WITTY TRAGEDIAN.

"Don't you think my execution of Othello a capital performance? It is in my line, is it not?" asked an eminent tragedian of Cooke.

"Why, yes," replied the provoking punster; "all executions may be considered capital performances; and your performance of Othello is certainly one of that class, for you execute him, in your line, so effectually, that as soon as you lay hands upon him, he is no Moor."

§27. QUIN ON ANGLING.

Quin thought angling a very cruel diversion; and on being asked why, gave this reason: "Suppose some superior being should bait a hook with venison, and go a Quinning. I should certainly bite; and what a figure I should make dangling in the air!"

§28. FOOTE AND O'BRIEN.

Footo, the dramatist, having, in one of his entertainments, caricatured an actor named O'Brien, that gentleman waited upon the mimic, and indignantly complained of the injury his character had sustained through his being taken off upon the stage. The comedian, having vainly endeavored to laugh his visitor into good humor, at length observed,—

"Well, as you seem displeased at my taking you off, you shall immediately see me take myself off!"

"The enraged actor was pacified; and Footo, taking up his hat, walked out of the room. O'Brien waited an hour before he saw the joke! and found that he would have to wait longer still before he saw the joker. So he, too, "took himself off."

"How is it possible that there can be such wretched, unhappy people among you?"

To which Le Maitre replied,— "Madame, they are the Irish of France."

829. ANECDOTE OF SPILLER.

Spiller, the actor, one day, at Drury Lane Theatre, complaining of a violent toothache, the company's barber offered to take it out.

"No, not now," replied the pupil of Thespis, "but on the 10th of next June, when the theatre closes, you may take them all out, for I shall have no further use for them."

830. FOOTE'S REMARK ON GOLDSMITH.

One of the performers at the Haymarket Theatre was observing to Foote what a humdrum sort of a man Dr. Goldsmith appeared to be in the greenroom, compared with the figure he made in his poetry. "The reason of that," said he, "is because the Muses are better companions than the players."

831. SUCCESSFUL REPAITEE OF WESTON, THE ENGLISH ACTOR.

Weston, before his comic fame was established, appeared as a substitute for Shuter in the part of Sharp. Shuter's name was in the play-bills; and, when Weston appeared, the galleries vociferated "Shuter! Shuter!" Mrs. Clive played the part of Kitty Pry, and was no less a favorite than the other. The uproar continued, and nothing could be heard but "Shuter! Shuter!" As soon as it was possible to be heard, Weston, in his own inimitable and humorous manner, asked aloud, in a seemingly stupid amazement, and pointing to Mrs. Clive, "Shoot her! Shoot her! Why should I shoot her? I am sure she plays her part very well." Good humor was instantly restored, and he met with universal applause.

832. LEGRAND'S DEFENCE.

Legrand, who was both an actor and an author, but a man of a short and disagreeable figure, after playing some tragic part in which he had been ill received, came forward to address the house, and concluded his speech thus: "And in short, gentlemen and ladies, you must see that it is easier for you to accustom yourselves to my figure than for me to change it."

833. REYNOLDS AND MARTIN.

Reynolds, the dramatist, observing to Martin the thinness of his house at one of his own plays, added, he supposed it was owing to the war. "No," replied Martin, "I should judge it is owing to the piece."

834. THE QUEEN AND THE ACTOR.

The Sunday Mercury says that, after Frederic Le Maitre had played before Queen Victoria some scenes of a new role he is about to play at the Port St. Martin, called the Rag Picker, her majesty, who had become very much interested, said to the artiste, 835. THE GIMLET EYE.

Miss Pope was one evening in the greenroom, commenting on the excellences of Garrick, when, amongst other things, she said he had the most wonderful eye imaginable — an eye, to use a vulgar phrase, that would penetrate through a deal board. "Ay," cried Wewitzer, "I now understand what they call a gimlet eye."

836. MATHEWS AT WAKEFIELD.

Mathews once went to Wakefield, then, from commercial failures, in a dreadful state. In vain did he announce his inimitable Youthful Days: the Yorkshireman came not. When he progressed to Edinburgh, a friend asked him if he made much money in Wakefield. "Not a shilling," was the reply. "Not a shilling," reiterated his astonished acquaintance; "why, didn't you go there to star!" "Yes," replied Mathews, with mirthful mournfulness, "but they spell it with a ve in Wakefield."

837. MATHEW'S LAST JOKE

Mathews's attendant, in his last illness, intended to give the patient some medicine; but, a few moments after, it was discovered that the medicine was nothing but ink, which had been taken from the vial by mistake, and his friend exclaimed, —

"Good Heavens! Mathews, I have given you ink."

"Never — never mind, my boy — never mind," said Mathews, faintly — "I'll swallow a bit of blotting paper."

This was the last joke Mathews ever made.

838. TAYLOR'S PUN.

"My best pun," says Taylor, "was that which I made to Sheridan, who married a Miss Ogle. We were supping together at the Shakspeare, when, the conversation turning on Garrick, I asked him which of his performances he thought the best.

"O," said he, "the Lear, the Lear."

"No wonder," said I, "you were fond of a Leer, when you married an Ogle."

839. FIRE AND WATER.

A farce was performed in Bannister's time, under the title of Fire and Water. "I predict its fate," said he. "What fate?" whispered the anxious author at his side. "What fate!" said Bannister; "why, what can fire and water produce but a hiss?"

840. JEW DAVIS.

Bashfulness was not the badge of his tribe, and it certainly formed no part of his character: he had a sort of celebrity for non-payment. One of his creditors, thinking to shame him out of the money he owed, stood up in the pit of Sadler's Wells, and said, "Mr. Davis, I said I would expose you; you owe me seventeen and sixpence." "So I do," said Davis, "perfectly cool, and advancing to the foot-lights; "oblige me with half a crown, and it will make an even pound." We need not add that the creditor took nothing by his motion.

§41. SAVING A PENNY.

M. B., of Frankfort, who was married to an actress, and was also engaged as a writer for a journal called La Nouvelle de Conversation, was sent for by the principal editor.

"My dear sir," said the latter, "some one has sent me five louis, on condition that I write an article against your wife. There is the letter—read it."

M. B., having perused the letter, said, with the utmost gravity,—

"Well, five louis is too much to throw away; and as nobody knows a wife's faults so well as her husband, give me the money, and I will write the article."

The bargain was made; and in the next number of the journal a most severe article appeared against the lady.

§42. THE TRAGIC BARRER.

A hair-dresser, in a considerable town, made an unsuccessful attempt in tragedy. To silence an abundant hissing, he stepped forward, and delivered the following speech: "Ladies and gentlemen: yesterday I dressed you; to-night I address you; and to-morrow, if you please, I will redress you. While there is virtue in powder, pomatum, and horse-tails, I find it easier to make an actor than to be one. Vive la bagatelle! I hope I shall yet shine in the capital part of a beau, though I have not the felicity of pleasing you in the character of an emperor."

§43. FOOTE AND THE SILVER SPOON

Foote, being on a visit at Lord Townshend's, at Raynham, happened one morning to look into the pig-sty, and saw a silver spoon among the pig's victuals. One of the housemaids coming by, and perceiving Mr. Foote, cried out, "Plague on the pigs, what a noise they make!" "Well they may," said Foote, "for they have but one silver spoon between them."

§44. STAKE versus STEAK.

On one occasion, Garrick dined in the beefsteak room at Covent Garden, ready dressed in character for the part of Ranger, which he was to perform the same night at the other theatre. Ranger appears in the opening of the comedy; and as the curtain was not drawn up at the usual time, the audience began to manifest considerable impatience, for Garrick had not yet arrived. A call-boy was instantly despatched for him, but he was unfortunately retarded by a line of carriages that blocked up the whole of Russell Street, which it was necessary for him to cross. This protracted still further the commencement of the piece; and the house evinced considerable dissatisfaction, with cries of "Manager, manager!" When Garrick at length reached the greenroom, he found Dr. Ford, one of the patentees, pacing backwards and forwards in great agitation. The moment the doctor saw him, he addressed him in a strong tone of rebuke. "I think, David, considering the stake you and I have in this theatre, you might pay more attention to its business." "True, my good friend," returned Garrick; "I should have been in good time; but I was thinking of my steak in the other." The appearance of their favorite soon pacified the audience, and Garrick went through the character with more vivacity than ever.

§45. FOOTE AND GARRICK.

Samuel Foote.

Foote and Garrick being at a tavern together, at the time of the first regulation of the gold coin, the former, pulling out his purse to pay the reckoning, asked the latter what he should do with a light guinea he had. "Fshaw, it's worth nothing," says Garrick; "fling it to the devil." "Well, David," says the other, "you are what I always took you for, ever contriving to make a guinea go further than any other man."

§46. FOOTE'S WIT.

Foote's wit was quick, sometimes coarse. Being asked by a lady to translate a physician's motto, which was "A numine salus" — Health comes from God, — he quickly replied, "God help the patient."

Being at table next a gentleman who had taken a very large piece of bread, he took it up and cut a piece off. "Sir," said the gentleman, "that is my bread." "I beg pardon, sir," said Foote, "I protest I took it for the loaf."

Foote's wit in many cases is hardly worthy of imitation. There is, as in this instance, too much of the sting of the scorpion about it. It is poor policy, when a man, to display his wit, hurls sarcasms that creates him enemies or alienates his friends.

847. FOOTE'S OPINION OF GARRICK.

When Foote was in Paris, in the course of an evening's conversation with some English gentlemen, the subject turned on Mr. Garrick's acting, when some of the company expressed their fears of that great performer's relinquishing the stage.

"Make yourselves easy on that head," replied the wit, "for he'd play Richard before a kitchen fire in dog days, provided he was sure of getting a sop in the pan."

848. MATHEWS'S PROVISION FOR HIS SON.

Mathews being asked what he was going to do with his son, (the young man's profession was to be that of an architect,) "Why," answered the comedian, "he is going to draw houses, like his father."

849. VISITING BEDLAM.

Foote, Garrick, and Johnson once went together to Bedlam. Johnson, who was much affected at the sight of so much human misery, got into a corner to meditate, and, in the progress of this, threw himself into so many strange attitudes, and drew his face into such odd shapes, that Foote whispered Garrick, to know how they should contrive to get him out.

850. FOOTE AND JEMMY WRIGHT.

As Foote was one day passing by the King's Bench, his attention was attracted by a barber's shop, the owner of which, not being able to pay for several panes of glass, which were broken when he entered the house, he had substituted paper ones for them, and over the shop door was written this inscription:—

"Here lives Jeremy Wright—
Shaves as well as any man in England, almost,
Not quite."

Foote was so much convinced in his own mind that the owner was an eccentric fellow, that he was determined to ascertain it immediately; so, putting his head through one of the paper panes, he exclaimed, "Is Jemmy Wright at home, pray?" On which the facetious barber immediately thrust his head through another, and replied, "No, he is just popped out." Foote laughed heartily, and gave the man a guinea.

851. FOOTE AND THE PLAIN WOMAN.

A gentleman, having introduced his wife, who was very plain, to Foote, observed, that, though his Helen could not boast of much beauty, she was an excellent housewife. "I have no doubt of it, my good friend," said Foote; "I was only thinking it was a thousand pities that the Grecian Helen was not more like her, for if she was, Troy certainly would never have been burnt."

852. FOOTE'S FUN ON PARTRIDGE

When Foote was at Salt Hill, he dined at the castle; and when Partridge produced the bill, which was exorbitant, Foote asked him his name. "Partridge, an't please you," said he. "Partridge," returned Foote, "it should have been Woodcock by the length of your bill."

853. FOOTE AND THE DUKE OF NORFOLK.

When the Duke of Norfolk was Mr. Howard, he published a book, called his Own Thoughts, of which he promised a second part. Being in company with Foote, some time after this, at the Bedford Coffee-house, he pressed our hero to give an opinion of his book, which the other at first declined; but at length, being at a loss for an excuse, he replied, "I will wait for your next book, sir; second thoughts are the best."

854. FOOTE AND CORK.

Foote praising the hospitalities of the Irish, after one of his trips from the sister kingdom, a gentleman present asked him whether he had ever been in Cork. "No, sir," said he, quickly, "but I have seen a great many drawings of it."

855. KEMBLE AND THE BEGGAR.

The late John Kemble met a man in the street, who appeared extremely distressed, and asked charity; he gave him something, observing, "Either that man must be in actual distress, or he is a first-rate actor."

856. WILLIAM FRANCIS AND MR. S.

A gentleman once attempted to avoid the late Mr. William Francis, of the Philadelphia Theatre. (for whose society he expressed a particular relish in the evening parties,) by crossing the street to avoid the necessity of addressing him en passant. Mr. Francis, perceiving the inattention, attracted the notice of every person within hearing by loudly calling him by name, thus: "Don't trouble yourself to cross, Mr. S——; upon my honor, sir, I had no intention of speaking to you."

It is needless to say this just rebuke prevented any second insult. Mr. S—— was always most happy to shake Francis by the hand, wherever they met.

857. KEMBLE AND MR. SHAW.

On the first production of Gretry's Richard Cœur de Lion, at Drury Lane, on the 20th of October, 1786, John Kemble himself played Richard, and sang the songs. At one of the rehearsals of this piece, it appeared that Kemble had acquired the time of the principal song pretty correctly, but that he was sadly deficient in the time; on which Mr. Shaw, the leader, exclaimed with impatience, "Mr. Kemble, that really won't do; you murder the time." "Well, Mr. Shaw," said Kemble, with his usual solemnity, "it is better to murder time outright, than to be always beating it, as you are."

588. KEMBLE'S COSTUME AS CORIOLANUS.

When Kemble retired from the stage, he distributed his costume of Coriolanus amongst his brethren. To Mathews he gave his sandals, upon which the comedian exclaimed, "I'm glad I've got his sandals, though I am sure I could never tread in his shoes."

589. WILSON'S ADVERTISEMENT.

Richard Wilson happening to be in the printing office whilst the compositor was setting the types for the advertisement in a newspaper, he made him put the whole advertisement upside down; and telling me of this stratagem of his, I could not comprehend the purpose. "Why," said he, "a person looking at the paper would say, 'What's this? an advertisement reversed! O, Wilson's benefit!' And without this hum," added Wilson, "perhaps my advertisement might prove a maffelt."

590. GOOSE'S HEAD ON THE STAGE.

A person threw the head of a goose on the stage of the Bellville Theatre. Cotru, advancing to the front, said, "Gentlemen, if any one amongst you has lost his head, do not be uneasy, for I will restore it at the conclusion of the performance."

591. FINN'S MORCEAU.

The celebrated comedian Finn issued the following morceau the day previous to one of his benefits, at the Tremont Theatre, in the city of Boston:—

"Like a grate full of coals I burn
A great, full house to see;
And, if I prove not grateful too,
A great fool I shall be."

§ 91. AMUSING DETAILS OF ACTORS.

592. GEORGE FREDERIC COOKE.

The following anecdote of Cooke was told by Mathews, the mimic, to a company of friends in a steamboat, among whom was William Dunlap, author of the History of the American Theatre, from which the extract is taken.

Seated in the captain's cabin, and freed from all annoyance, Mathews became, as usual, the fiddle of the company, and story, anecdote, imitation, and song poured from him with the rapidity and brilliancy of the stars which burst from a rocket on a rejoicing night. To make himself still more agreeable to the senior, he introduced the memoirs of George Frederic, with that flattery which is delicious to all men, and peculiarly so to an author. "The story of Cooke and Mrs. Burns," he added, "you have told remarkably well, and when I have introduced it in my Youthful Days, I have always taken your words; but Tom Cooper, from whom, as I understand, you had it, forgot the termination of the story,—the real dénouement,—which makes it infinitely more dramatic." All joined in the request that Mathews would tell the story in his own way, and he, nothing loath, began:—

"I was a raw recruit in the Thespian corps, and it was my first campaign to Dublin. Chance made me a fellow-lodger with Cooke, at the house of Mrs. Burns. I had looked at the great actor with an awful reverence, but had not yet been honored by any notice from him.

"In getting up Macklin's Love à la Mode, I had been cast for a Beau Mordecai; and assuredly a more unfit representative of the little Jew can scarcely be imagined. As tall as I now am, I had then all the rawboned awkwardness of a hobbledehoy, and no knowledge of the world or of the stage. But Mr. Cooke must be shown to the Dublin public in Sir Archy, and there was no other Mordecai to be had. I was, however, perfect in the words; and if I murdered the Jew, I did it impartially; I murdered him 'every inch.'

"After the farce, I tarried, as you Yankees say, a considerable time at the theatre, rather choosing to linger among the almost expired dripping candles of the dressing rooms, than to seek, through mist and mud, my lofty, but comfortless abode in Mrs. Burns's garret, but the property man gave me my cue to depart, by putting out the lights; and I was slowly mounting to my bed, when, as I passed the room of the great man, I saw him (the door being open) sitting with a jug before him, indulging after the labors of the evening. I was stealing by, and had already one foot on the flight of stairs which led to my exalted apartment, when I was arrested by a loud, high-pitched voice, crying, 'Come hither, young man.' I could scarcely believe my senses: I hesitated. 'Come in,' was repeated. I advanced. 'Shut the door and sit down.' I obeyed. He assumed an air of courtesy, called upon Mistress Burns for another tumbler, and filled for himself and me.

"'You will be so kind, my good Mistress Burns, as to bring another pitcher of whiskey punch in honor of our friend.' 'To be sure and I will, Mr. Cooke.' The punch was brought, and a hot supper, an unusual luxury then to me. After supper, the veteran, quite refreshed and at ease, chatted incessantly of plays and players,—lashing some, commending others,—while I, delighted to be thus honored, listened, and laughed; thus playing naturally and sincerely the part of a most agreeable companion. After the third jug of punch, I was sufficiently inspired to ask a few questions, and even to praise the acting of the veteran.

"To use your words, as I have often before done," said Mathews, addressing himself to the biographer, "'one jug of whiskey punch followed the other,' and Cooke began to advise his young companion how to conduct himself on the real, and on the mimic scene of life. 'You are young, and want a friend to guide you. Talent you have; but talent without prudence is worthless, and may be pernicious. Take my word for it, there is nothing can place a man at the head of his profession but industry and sobriety. Mistress Burns!—Shun ebriety as you would shun destruction. Mistress Burns! another jug of whiskey punch, Mistress Burns.'

"O, Mr. Cooke!—

"'You make it so good, Mistress Burns; another jug.'

"'Yes, Mr. Cooke.'

"'In our profession, my young friend, dissipation is the bane of hundreds; villanous company, low company, leads to drinking; and the precious time is lost which should have been employed in gaining that knowledge which alone can make men respectable. Ah! thank you, Mistress Burns; this has the true Hibernian smack!

"You may say that, Mr. Cooke."

It is needless to remind the reader, that with the aid of Mathews's powers of imitation, sometimes called ventriloquism in this humbugging world, all this and much more would be extremely pleasant, and the more especially as the company had repeated supplies of the same inspiring beverage from the steward, and almost as good, certainly as strong, as that of Mrs. Burns.

Mathews went on to describe the progress of Cooke's intoxications, during which his protests against drunkenness became stronger with each glass. He then undertook to instruct the tyro in the histrionic art, and especially in the manner of exhibiting the passions. Here it would be in vain to endeavor to follow Mathews. Cooke's grimaces and voice, while his physical powers, under the government of whiskey, rebelled at every effort against the intention of the lecturer, were depicted by the mimic in a manner beyond the conception of even those who have seen the public exhibition of his talents: here all was unrestrained gig and fun, and the painting truly con amore, and glowing from heart and glass.

"It must be remembered," continued Mr. Mathews, "that I was but a boy, and Cooke in the full vigor of manhood, with strength of limb and voice herculean. I had the highest reverence for his talents, and literally stood in awe of him; so that when he made his horrible faces, and called upon me to name the passions he had depicted, I was truly frightened, overwhelmed with the dread of offending him, and utterly at a loss to distinguish one grimace from another, except as one was more and another most savage and disgusting."

"Now, sir—observe—what's that?"

"Revenge."

"Revenge, you booby! Pity! pity!"

"Then, after making another hideous contortion of countenance, he cries,—

"What is that, sir?"

"Very fine, sir, very fine indeed."

"But what is it, sir?"

"Forced to answer, and utterly unable to guess the meaning of the distorted face which he then again thrust before me, I stammered out,—

"Anger, sir."

"Anger!"

"Yes, sir, anger, to be sure."

"To be sure you are a blockhead! Look again sir—look again! It's fear, sir—fear. You play! you a player!"

Mathews then exhibited the face of Cooke as he distorted it to express the tender passion,—a composition of satanic malignity and the brutal leering of a drunken satyr,—and imitating Cooke's most discordant voice,—

"There, sir, that's love."

"This," continued Mathews, "was more than I could bear; even my fears could not restrain my laughter: I roared. He started at first, but immediately assuming a more serious aspect, he cried,—

"What do you laugh at, sir? Is George Frederic Cooke to be made a laughing-stock for a booby? What, sir!"

"Luckily, at that moment Mrs. Burns stood with the door partly opened, and another jug in her hands. 'You must pardon me, sir,' I said, with a quickness which must have been the inspiration of whiskey, 'but you happened to turn your soft and languishing look towards the door just as Mrs. Burns opened it, and I could not but think of the dangerous effect of such a look upon her sex's softness.'

"He laughed, and embracing the jug as the good woman put it down, he looked at Mrs. Burns, and with some humor endeavored to sing, 'How happy could I be with either, were t'other great charmer away!' but with a voice which defies art and nature for a comparison."

"Mistress Burns now protested against any more punch; but, after some time, agreed, upon Cooke's solemn promise to be satisfied with one more jug, to bring it."

"But remember your honor, Mister Cooke; and that is the jewel of a jontleman; and sure you have pledged it to me, you have."

"I have, my good Mistress Burns; and it is 'the immediate jewel of the soul,' as you say."

"I said no such thing; but I'll be as good as my word, and one more jug you shall have, and the devil a bit more, jewel or no jewel."

"I was heartily tired by this time, and placed my hope on Mrs. Burns's resolution. The last jug came, and was finished; and I wished him good night."

"Not yet, my dear boy."

"It's very late, sir."

"Early, early: one jug more."

"Mrs. Burns will not let us have it, sir."

"She will not? I'll show you that presently."

Then followed a fine specimen of imitation; Mathews, as Cooke, calling upon Mrs. Burns. (who was in the room below and in bed.) and then giving her answers as coming up through the floor, in the manner called ventriloquism.

"Mistress Burns! Do you hear, Mistress Burns?"

"Indeed and I do, Mr. Cooke!"

"Bring me another jug of whiskey punch, Mistress Burns."

"Indeed and I won't, Mr. Cooke!"

"You won't?"

"Indeed and indeed so I won't!"

"Do you hear that, Mistress Burns?" (smashing the jug on the floor.)

"Indeed and I do, and you will be sorry for it to-morrow."

"He then regularly took the chairs, one by one, and broke them on the floor immediately over Mrs. Burns's head, after every crash crying, 'Do you hear that, Mistress Burns?' and she as regularly answering, 'Indeed and I do, Mr. Cooke.' He next opened the window, and threw the looking-glass into the street."

"I stood," continued Mathews, "in a state of stupid amazement during the scene, but now attempted to make my escape, edging towards the door, and making a long stride to gain the garret stairs."

"Come back, sir! Where are you going?"

"To bed, sir."

"To bed, sir! What, sir! I command you to remain on your allegiance! Desert me in time of war! Traitor!"

"I now determined to make resistance; and feeling pot-valiant, looked big, and boldly answered,—

"I will not be commanded! I will go to bed!"

"Aha!" cried the madman, in his highest key. Aha! do you rebel? Caitiff! wretch! murderer!"

"He advanced upon me, and I shrank to nothing before his flashing eye. 'Murderer!' seizing me by the collar with herculean gripe, 'you will go? I will send you to the place you are fittest for! Murderer, I'll drag you to your doom! I'll give you up to Fate! Come along, caitiff!' and he dragged me to the open window, vociferating, 'Watch! watch! murder! murder!' in his highest and loudest key.

"Immediately the rattles were heard approaching in all directions, and a crowd instantly collected. He continued vociferating 'Watch! watch! murder!' until the rattles and exclamations of the watchmen almost drowned his stentorian voice.

"What's the matter? who's kilt? who's murdered? Where's the murderer?"

"Silence!" screamed Cooke; 'hear me!' All became hushed. Then holding me up to the window, the raving tragedian audibly addressed the crowd: 'In the name of Charles Macklin, I charge this culprit, Charles Mathews, with the most foul, cruel, deliberate, and unnatural murder of the unfortunate Jew, Beau Mordecai, in the farce of Love à la Mode.' Then, pulling down the window, he cried, 'Now go to bed, you booby! go to bed! go to bed! go to bed!'

The steamboat party remained together until near morning, and then retired to rest. Let it not be supposed that they imitated the folly of the hero of the above tale because whiskey punch has been mentioned. The evening, or night, was one of real interchange of mind, heightened by the peculiar powers and habits of the very extraordinary histrionic artist who gave this instance of Cooke's eccentric and pernicious propensities.

863. MACREADY AND THE BLUNDERING ACTOR.

It is well known that Macready is one of the most particular persons on the stage, and that he always goes through the business of the rehearsal as carefully as if performing before an audience. Occasionally, in the country, it has been his fate to meet with some extraordinary idiots, whose ignorance has sometimes led to mistakes of a very ludicrous character. One morning he was rehearsing Virginius, in many passages of which his colloquial style threw the provincials off their guard, and they imagined he was addressing them in familiar conversation, instead of rehearsing his part in the tragedy. Among other passages which he delivers in a very natural and colloquial style is that ending in the first act:—

"Do you wait for me to lead Virginia in;
Or will you do so?"

The actor who played Cilius, thinking Macready merely wished to know his pleasure on the matter, coolly responded, with an air of importance, "Whv, really, my dear sir, I don't care; just as you do it in London."

Another anecdote of the same kind is related respecting that part of William Tell wherein Macready asks the question, —

"Do you shoot?"

"A little," was the reply; "but, strange to say, I never had a go with one of them cross bows."

864. A BURDEN TAKEN OFF.

A ludicrous scene was unintentionally played at the Surrey Theatre. A Mr. D., a check tailor, took a benefit. Mr. D. might enact Falstaff without the usual ingredients which go to what is called "the making up" of that character. As he had been an actor in his thin days, Mr. D. thought it would be a treat to his benefit-makers if he showed them what he could do in his more palmy and fleshy days. Accordingly, "for this night only," by no particular desire but his own, he made not his first, but his fat appearance, and enacted, in proper Bradley style, some brigand part, in which, after running, or rather waddling, through his career of villany in the most approved manner, he was, of course, shot in the end. But there was not an end; for a difficulty arose — how was he to be got off the stage? — he of all men else — a twenty stone man. Two underlings were ordered by the stage manager to bring him off somehow; but they stared aghast at the daring of such an exploit, and flatly refused. "But he must be brought off," said the manager. They perspired (on a cold night) at the thought, swore, turned pale, and again refused. "I'll bring him off," said a tall, thin, Don Quixote-like supernumerary, who looked as if he could not have carried a lady's lapdog to church without resting it on a porter's pitching-block by the way. Accordingly, he advanced up to the fat bandit, stood over him a moment, as if he compassionated the fall of so much man, and then very coolly picking him up, tucked the entire twenty stone of D. under his right arm, and walked off the stage as deliberately as if he had but placed his Sunday umbrella there. The shout of laughter that arose from the whole audience was such as might have waked Elliston from under his Latin inscription, to wonder what could be the cause of so much mirth at the Surrey, and he not there in Rover or Fat Jack.

865. JOKES ON DYER.

Mr. Dyer does not mind a joke at himself. "On one occasion," says he, "we played Lovers' Vows; and when Frederic inquired, 'Is there a doctor in the village?' a matter-of-fact countryman replied, in a tone of sympathy, 'O, yes, sur; there's old Parfit, the horse doctor, lives up in town.'

"On my first performance of William, in Black-eyed Susan, my musical powers being rather deficient, I sang the verse, —

'All in the Downs the fleet was moored,' &c.

to the tune of the Storm; when a kind, weak-hearted creature, dissolved in tears at my supposed sorrows, sobbed aloud, 'Poor fellow! he's so cut up, he's forgot the tune.'

866. GAG IMPROMPTU.

An actor in Baltimore, some years ago, having to play the Duke, in Othello, and not being au fait in his part, found himself at fault when he came to this passage: "Take up this mangled matter at the best;" and, not wishing to call forth the goose from the audience, spoke it in this wise: "Take up the star-spangled banner, and bear it to the west!" which drew down a patriotic burst of applause instantly.

867. DYER AT PLYMOUTH.

Playing Der Freischütz at Plymouth, Mr. Dyer says, —

"Mine was triumphant success, and a loud call was raised for my appearance at the end of the play. Out of this circumstance arose a ludicrous mistake.

Dyer and fire, are similar in sound; and, when my admirers cried Dyer, several persons became dreadfully apprehensive of fire, and an elderly lady betrayed such violent agitation, that, to quiet her, a friend of mine shouted aloud, from his place in the boxes, 'It's false, madam, it's false! there is not a spark of fire in the house.'

568. GARRICK AND THE BUTCHER'S DOG.

David Garrick.

One very sultry evening in the dog days, Garrick performed the part of Lear. In the first four acts, he received the accustomed tribute of applause. At the conclusion of the fifth, when he wept over the body of Cordelia, every eye caught the soft infection. At this interesting moment, to the astonishment of all present, his face assumed a new character, and his whole frame appeared agitated by a new passion. It was not tragic; it was evidently an endeavor to suppress a laugh. In a few seconds, the attendant nobles appeared to be affected in the same manner; and the beautiful Cordelia, who was lying extended on a crimson couch, opening her eyes to see what occasioned the interruption, leaped from the sofa, and, with the majesty of England, the gallant Albany, and tough old Kent, ran laughing off the stage.

The audience could not account for this strange termination of a tragedy in any other way, than by supposing that the dramatis personæ were seized with a sudden frenzy. But their risibility had a different source. A fat Whitechapel butcher, seated on the centre of the front bench of the pit, was accompanied by his mastiff, who, being accustomed to sit on the same seat with his master at home, naturally supposed that he might here enjoy the like privilege. The butcher sat very far back, and the dog, finding a fair opening, got on the seat, and, fixing his fore paws on the rail of the orchestra, peered the performers with as upright a head and as grave an air as the most sagacious critic of the day. Our corpulent slaughter-man was made of melting stuff, and, not being accustomed to the heat of a playhouse, found himself oppressed by a large and well-powdered Sunday periwig, which, for the gratification of cooling and wiping his head, he pulled off, and placed on the head of the mastiff. The dog, being in so conspicuous a situation, caught the eye of Mr. Garrick and the other performers. A mastiff in a church warden's wig was too much. It would have provoked laughter in Lear himself at the moment of his deepest distress. No wonder, then, that it had such an effect on his representative.

569. POWELL AND HIS DRESSER.

The first season of performing the Fair Penitent, Mr. Powell represented the part of Lothario. He had a dresser called Warren, who claimed a privilege which at that time existed, though not always observed, of performing the dead part of the hero in the fifth act. Powell, being ignorant of the station his man had taken, called aloud for him, behind the scenes, in the middle of the last act. The sad representative of death, hearing his master's voice, and knowing that he was passionate, instantly replied, "Here am I, sir." Powell, being still ignorant of the situation of his servant, again called, "Come here this moment, you son of a —, or I will break all the bones in your skin!" Warren could no longer delay or resist, and jumped up, hung with sables, which, as it were to heighten his embarrassment, were tied to the handles of the bier. This, added to the roar in the house, urged his speed so earnestly, that, with the bier in his rear, he ran against and threw down Calista, (Mrs. Barry), overwhelming her with the table, lamp, book, bones, and all the dread lumber of the charnel-house, till at length he liberated himself, and precipitately took flight. The play ended abruptly, but not without leaving the audience in high good humor.

570. FORGETFULNESS.

Lessing, the celebrated German poet, was remarkable for a frequent absence of mind. Having missed money at different times without being able to discover who took it, he determined to put the honesty of his servant to the test, and left a handful of gold on the table. "Of course you counted it," said one of his friends. "Counted it!" said Lessing, rather embarrassed; "no, I forgot that."

571. HOOLE, THE TRANSLATOR OF TASSO. THE GHOST PUZZLED.

Hoole was born in a hackney coach, which was conveying his mother to Drury Lane Theatre, to witness the performance of the tragedy of Timanthes, which had been written by her husband. Hoole died in 1839, at a very advanced age. In early life he ranked amongst the literary characters that adorned the last century; and, for some years before his death, had outlived most of the persons who frequented the conversazioni of Dr. Johnson. By the will of the doctor, Mr. Hoole was enabled to take from his library and effects such books and furniture as he might think proper to select, by way of memorial of that great personage. He accordingly chose a chair in which Dr. Johnson usually sat, and the desk upon which he had written the greater number of the papers of the Rambler; both these articles Mr. Hoole used constantly, until the day of his death.

Hoole was near-sighted. He was partial to the drama; and, when young, often strutted his hour at an amateur theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields. Upon one occasion, whilst performing the ghost, in Hamlet, Mr. Hoole wandered incautiously from off the trap-door through which he had emerged from the nether world, and by which it was his duty to descend. In this dilemma he groped about, hoping to distinguish the aperture, keeping the audience in wonder why he remained so long on the stage after the crowing of the cock. It was apparent from the lips of the ghost, that he was holding converse with some one at the wings. He at length became irritated, and "Alas! poor ghost!" ejaculated, in tones sufficiently audible, "I tell you I can't find it." The laughter that ensued may be imagined. The ghost, had he been a sensible one, would have walked off; but no, he became more and more irritated, until the perturbed spirit was placed by one of the bystanders on the trap-door, after which it descended, with due solemnity, amid roars of laughter.

872. UNREHEARSED STAGE EFFECT.

"Our fat and jolly friend Isherwood, of the Front Street Theatre," says the Baltimore Clipper, "of sleek rotundity, and contented, good-humored phiz, gave us, on Saturday evening, a practical illustration of what we asserted when we were infant philosophers, that 'what goes up must come down,' while enacting Philip Franklin, in the Convict's Child. His daughter Martha, after a long separation, is presumed, on their union, to experience all those filial yearnings natural on such occasions, usually exhibited on the stage, by such exclamations, as 'Ha! 'tis my lost child!' 'My father!'—a start by papa—a rush towards each other—embrace—kiss on the forehead—and 'thy poor mother lives again in thee,' generally conclude the affecting scene. Now, Mrs. Lewis is no lightsome fairy, no unsubstantial vision; and in the furor of acting, rushing to her new-found father's arms, whose strength was not, apparently, equal to his affection, both father and daughter, amid smiles and tears, like some huge oak uprooted, tumbled over, ludicrously enough, on the bosom of our common mother, earth, 'amid,' as the newspapers have it, 'the shouts of a delighted audience!' Had the lean and hungry Cassius been there, he might well have exclaimed, 'What a fall was there, my countrymen!'"

873. MARRIAGE OF MR. AND MRS. KEELEY.

This matrimonial alliance originated in a joke, but proved a very pleasing earnest to both the parties. There was a conspiracy, entered into by some wags in the theatre, (both male and female,) to bring about a marriage between our hero and little Miss Goward. It was a sort of Benedict and Beatrice affair. The little couple had generally to act together as man and wife, or buffo lovers; he was the contic serving man, and she the soubrette; they were always bickering and quarrelling about trifles when off the stage, each seeming absolutely to dislike the other: this attracted notice, when the lady wags contrived to persuade the little gentleman that the poor girl was almost dying for him, yet would not declare her love. In the mean time, the gentlemen were equally busy in convincing the little lady that she alone could wean him from dissipation, and thereby save his life, insinuating that her cruel indifference, nay, her apparent dislike, had driven him to seek with Bacchus consolation for the frowns of Venus; and, strange as it may appear that two experienced actors should be so acted upon, yet it is a fact known and often spoken of by the waggish conspirators, that they actually married, each believing that by so doing it was to save the other's life; and it was a salvation to one party, for it certainly reformed the little gentleman, who immediately deserted his bacchanalian companions for the joys and cares of a domestic fireside, and was willingly transformed into a most exemplary husband.

874. AN ACTOR AT FAULT.

Foote's Othello, it is said, was a masterpiece of burlesque; but it fell very far short of the Hamlet which he attempted in the early part of his life, for his benefit. He went through the play tolerably well until he came to the last; but in the scene where he quarrels with Laertes,—

"What is the reason you use me thus?"

I loved you ever;—but 'tis no matter,

Let Hercules himself do what he may,

The cat will mew, the dog will have his day,"— stimulated by a desire to distinguish himself, he entered so much into the quarrel as to throw him out of the words, and he spoke it thus: "I loved you ever; but it's no matter. Let Hercules himself do what he may, the dog will mew—no, that's the cat; the cat will bark—no, that's the dog; the dog will mew—no, that's the cat; the cat will—no, the dog, the cat, the dog—pshaw!—pho!—it's something about mewing and barking; but, as I hope to be saved, ladies and gentlemen, I know nothing more of the matter."

875. POPE, THE ACTOR.

Pope, the actor, well known for his devotion to the culinary art, received an invitation to dinner, accompanied by an apology for the simplicity of the intended fare—a small turbot and a boiled edge-bone of beef. "The very thing, of all others, that I like," exclaimed Pope; "I will come with the greatest pleasure." And come he did, and eat he did, till he could literally eat no longer; when the word was given, and a haunch of venison was brought in, fit to be made the subject of a new poetical epistle,—

"—for finer or fatter

Never ranged in a forest, or smoked in a platter.

The haunch was a picture for painters to study,

The fat was so white and the lean was so ruddy."

Poor Pope divined at a glance the nature of the trap that had been laid for him; but he was fairly caught, and after a puny effort at trifling with a slice of fat, he laid down his knife and fork, and gave way to a hysterical burst of tears, exclaiming, "A friend of twenty years' standing, and to be served in this manner."

876. KEAN QUOTING LATIN.

Poor Kean, probably imagining that, with the multitude, it might favor the fiction of his Etonian education, was prone to the quotation of classical commonplaces; and a story told of R. Phillips, his secretary, shows how much this weakness was remarked by his associates. Kean was at some nocturnal vigil, and Phillips waiting for him, when this colloquy arose:—

Time, two in the morning.

Phillips.—Waiter, what was Mr. Kean doing when you left the room?

Waiter.—Playing the piano, sir, and singing.

Phillips.—O, come, he's all right, then.

Quarter past two.

Phillips.—What's Mr. Kean doing now?

Waiter.—Making a speech, sir, about Shakspeare.

Phillips.—He's getting drunk; you'd better order the carriage.

Half past two.

Phillips.—What's he at now?

Waiter.—He's talking Latin, sir.

Phillips.—Then he is drunk. I must get him away.

877. MRS. SIDDONS.

Not many years before Mrs. Siddons's retirement, this celebrated actress went down to Bath, to play a few of her favorite characters. One morning, coming from rehearsal, she called in at a shop to purchase some article of dress. Wholly absorbed in the part she was to perform, whilst the shopman was displaying his muslins, &c., Mrs. S. took one in her hand, and fixing her eyes full on the man, exclaimed in a solemn voice, "Did you say, sir, this would wash?" The poor fellow, in great alarm, began to think the intellects of his customer were not right; but Mrs. Siddons, recalled to recollection by his astonishment, with a smile, apologized for her absence of mind, and repeated the question in a voice better suited to the occasion.

878. COOKE AND KEMBLE'S BLUNDER.

Cooke, after rehearsing the Gamester with Mr. Cooper, in America, said to Mr. Dunlap, his manager, and afterwards biographer, "I'll tell you what: Tom and I were not very clear at rehearsal this morning. I hope we shall not do to-night as Kemble and I did in this same play. We played a scene of the third act in the second. I was frightened out of my wits. 'We're wrong,' says I. 'Go on,' says he; and we went through it. When we came off, I exclaimed, 'Do you know what we have done? We have played a scene of the third act.' 'I know it,' says John, very coldly.—'And what shall we do in the third act?'—'Play the second.' And so we did. But the best of the joke was, that the papers never found it out."

879. JOHNSTONE'S FORGETFULNESS.

The following curious circumstance took place at the Lyceum Theatre: During the performances, the galleries thought proper to call for their favorite song of the "Sprig of Shillelah," though not announced in the bills. Mr. Johnstone, however, came forward, with his usual alacrity and good humor, to comply with the wishes of the house: accordingly the music played; but when Mr. Johnstone was to have begun, he stood silent, and apparently confused. Again the music played the symphony, but the same silence and confusion took place in rather an increased degree. A third time the music played the symphony, but to no purpose. At last Mr. Johnstone came forward, and thus addressed the house: "Ladies and gentlemen, I assure you that I have sung this song so often that I forget the first line." A universal roar of laughter ensued, and about two hundred voices began at once to prompt the actor, who immediately sung it with the usual applause.

880. THE ACTOR STOPPED SHORT.

One of the principal actors at the Comédie Française stopped short in a tragedy at this passage, "I was in Rome.—" It was in vain that he began the passage several times; he never could get farther than Rome. At last, seeing there was no help for it, and that the prompter, as embarrassed as himself, was unable to find the place, or to give him any assistance, he turned his eyes coolly upon him, and said, with an air of dignity, "Well, sir, what was I doing in Rome?"

881. THE TWO LIONS.

In the days of Addison, animals divided the honors with, if they did not bear away the palm from, the biped histrions, insomuch that it became necessary for rival establishments who had not the real lions to make them, out of such materials as they possessed. A sketch of two of these manufactured actors is amusing enough. The first lion, at one playhouse, was a candle snuffer, who, being a choleric fellow, overdid his part, and wouldn't suffer himself to be killed without too violent a tussle for his life: besides, he grew more surly every time he came out of the lion, being vexed that he had not fought his best, and that he had suffered himself to be thrown on his back in the scuffle; and hinting significantly that he would fight his antagonist out of his lion's skin, for what he pleased. He was considered a dangerous animal, and was discharged, on the plea that he reared himself so high upon his hinder paws, and walked in so erect a posture, that he looked more like an old man than a lion. The second lion was a tailor by trade, who belonged to the theatre, and was a mild and peaceable man in his profession. He was too sheepish altogether. After a short, modest walk upon the stage, he would fall at the first touch of his two-legged adversary, without grappling him, and enabling him to make his melo-dramatic points. This lion was in the practice also of giving him a rip in his flesh-colored "tights," to make work for himself in his private capacity of tailor; and these defects, we are told, occasioned his dismissal.

882. ELLISTON'S ABSENCE OF MIND.

Wemyss, in his Life of an Actor, relates the following reminiscence of Elliston: "So completely turned was his brain by the honors extended to him by the nobility, and particularly by the king, that he frequently imagined himself invested with royalty, and, on one occasion, even so far forgot himself, in a pageant in which he personated the monarch, as to exclaim, in reply to the applause with which he was greeted by the audience, 'Bless you, my people!'"

883. MADEMOISELLE RACHEL AND THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

Mademoiselle Rachel, when giving one of her readings before the Duke of Wellington, perceived that all her audience were ignorant of the French language except the duke himself. She went on, however, with her reading and spouting, consoling herself with the idea that the duke at least understood her. After it was over, the duke approached the great actress, and said, "Mademoiselle, our guests have had a great advantage over me; they have had the happiness of hearing you; I am as deaf as a post."

884. PRIGMORE AND THE WIDOW.

There was a very benevolent widow living in Plymouth, in respectable circumstances, who frequently went to the theatre, and was kind enough to inquire into the private situations of various members of the company. Among others, she asked about Prigmore, and was told that he had but a small salary, and made a very poor appearance. Hearing this, she remembered that she had a pair of her late husband's indispensables in the house, which she resolved to offer him. A servant was, accordingly, despatched to the object of her charity, who meeting one of the actors, and partly disclosing her business, he went in search of Prigmore, and, finding him, exclaimed, "Prigmore, my boy, here's your fortune made at last; here's a rich widow in the town has fallen in love with you, and wants to see you." Prigmore, not suspecting his roguery, was led to the servant in a state of bewildered rapture, and by the latter was informed that the widow would be glad to see him any morning it was convenient. He appointed the following, and went home to his lodgings to indulge in a day dream of golden independence. His friend, in the mean time, whispered the truth through the green-room, where there were two or three others wicked enough to join in the conspiracy, by walking to Prigmore's house to tender their congratulations. Prigmore, as will be supposed, passed a sleepless night, and spent an extra hour at his toilet the next morning, in adorning himself with a clean cloth and neckcloth. He then sallied forth, and, on reaching the widow's, was shown into her parlor, where, casting his eyes around on the substantial sufficiency of its furniture, he began to felicitate himself on the aspect of his future home. The lady at length appeared: she was upon the verge of forty—a very fashionable age, which, resting upon the shoulders of a very comely-looking woman, seemed to be in character with her very comfortable dwelling. Prigmore's satisfaction and her benevolence operated equally in producing some confusion: at length a conversation commenced. She acquainted him that she had heard his situation was not so agreeable as he could wish,—that his income was a confined one; she was, therefore, desirous to do him all the service that lay in her power. Prigmore, considering this an express declaration of her affection, was about to throw himself at her feet, when she suddenly summoned the servant, and exclaimed, "Rachel, bring the breeches!" These words astounded him, and he stared in her face like a block of marble; the widow, as suspicious as himself of the hoax, could not interpret his wonder, but, on receiving the habiliments, folded them carefully up, and remarking that they were as good as new, (her husband having caught his fatal cold in them the first time he put them on,) begged Prigmore's acceptance of the same. "And was it for this you wanted me, madam?" exclaimed Prigmore, rising from his chair, his tone and countenance bespeaking a mixture of surprise and disappointment. "Yes, sir." He put on his hat, and walked to the door in silent indignation. The good woman, as much astonished as himself, followed him, and said, "Won't you take the breeches, sir?" "No, madam," he replied, pausing at the door to make some bitter remark; "wear them yourself!" For the remainder of the season, his life was far from being enviable.

885. SHAKSPEARE AND QUEEN ELIZABETH.

Queen Elizabeth condescended sometimes to a little flirtation. Shakspeare was performing the part of a king; Queen Elizabeth's box was contiguous to the stage; she purposely dropped her handkerchief upon the boards, at the feet of Shakspeare, having a mind to try whether her poet would stoop from his assumed majesty. She was mistaken. "Take up our sister's handkerchief," was his prompt and dignified order to one of the actors in his train.

886. ANTI-TEMPERANCE PLAY.

In Dryden's time, Mr. Henry Higden wrote a play called the Wary Widow, on the first representation of which the audience were dismissed at the end of the third act, the author having contrived so much drinking of punch in the play, that the actors all got drunk, and were unable to finish it.

887. UNLUCKY PAUSE.

A country actor, performing the part of Richmond the other day, in the tragedy of Richard III., had the misfortune to find his memory completely fail when he had reached the words, "Thus far into the bowels of the land have we marched on without impediment." After having repeated these words several times, the audience testified their displeasure by a general hiss, when, coming forward, he thus addressed them: "Ladies and gentlemen, thus far into the bowels of the land have we marched on without impediment, and I declare I cannot get any farther."

888. ABBOT.

On the first night of the Hunchback, Abbot, from over-anxiety, said, in the last scene, "I'll marry no man but my cousin Ellen." His brethren joked and warned him against repeating it, and hardly a night passed that he did not consequently incur the danger of saying the same thing.

889. AN INCIDENT.

Not long since, in England, a large, fat man enacted the ghost in Hamlet. His ghostship, of Falstaff proportions, placed himself, with truncheon in hand, on the trap-door, for the purpose of vanishing.

The bolt was withdrawn, and he slowly descended. The legs soon disappeared, but his round corporation was too capacious, and he stuck fast by the middle. No squeezing or drawing in of his body would permit his exit, and there he remained for some time, the house convulsed in laughter, the gods uproarious, and the actors endeavoring to force him through the aperture. He was at length lifted out by the stage attendants.

890. SINCLAIR.

It was some years ago the fashion to attribute bulls to Sinclair, in consequence of his having once made a singular perversion of the text in Rob Roy. The language is, "Rashleigh is my cousin; but, for what reason I am unable to divine, he is my bitterest enemy." Sinclair said, "Rashleigh is my cousin, but for what reason I am unable to divine." The jokes he endured on this account made him nervous and uncertain, and in Guy Mannering, when Dinmont says he sees "two lights dancing bonnily yon," instead of replying, "Two! I see but one, and that seems pretty steady," he said, "Two! I see but a couple, and they are pretty steady."

891. QUEER DEFENCE.

The gentleman who once played Jaffier at the Pittsburgh Theatre, publishes a communication in the Advocate of that city, in which he notices a bitter criticism that appeared in another Pittsburgh paper on his performance. He acknowledges the justice of the critique, and owns very frankly that he did murder the part most unmercifully; but he insists upon it that Venice Preserved was as well performed as the bills for the evening were printed at the office where the criticism issued. This is what we call carrying the war into Africa, a sort of special pleading perfectly justifiable in the premises. It is argumentum ad hominem, in an honest sense of that term.

892. HOW TO GET CLEAR OF A CRYING INFANT.

Tom Dibdin relates, in his Reminiscences, that a pompous actor, by the name of Newton, playing one evening at Tunbridge Wells, was very much annoyed by the crying of an infant in the pit. Walking forward to the front of the stage, he gravely took off his hat, and with great solemnity addressed the astonished mother as follows: "Madam, I assure you, upon the veracity of a man and a gentle-man, that unless you instantly adopt some method of keeping the play quiet, it will be morally impossible for the child to proceed." The mistake set the house in a roar of laughter, which frightened the unhappy infant into a scream that the disappointed mother was of necessity obliged to retire with her offspring, and resign the expected pleasure of the evening.

"so loud and dread"

893. MRS. BILLINGTON.

Of this very celebrated English singer Mrs. Merry (who at that time performed in Covent Garden, in a tragedy) related to the writer the following curious anecdote: On the occasion of one of her benefit nights, a lady of quality sent to her dressing-room a note of compliment, accompanied by a splendid diamond sprig, for the head, hinting that she would be pleased to see her gift honored by the singer wearing it during the evening. It so happened that she was to appear as Rosina, in the beautiful comic opera of that name; and accordingly Mrs. Billington appeared gleaning the harvest field and gathering up, by permission, the stray ears of grain, with the diamond sprig in her hair!

894. GARRICK'S LOST LOVER.

When in the early part of his life, Garrick performed Ranger with a most uncommon spirit, and so well looked the part, that a young lady, of great family and fortune, fell violently in love with him: her friends, finding it in vain to reason with her, and dreading her forming a matrimonial connection with a player, took her to see him play Scrub, and the very contemptible appearance he made in that part wrought a perfect cure. Garrick was himself so conscious of the pitiful figure he made in that character, and so thoroughly ashamed of it, that he gave directions to the box-keeper, that "if any of Lord Burlington's family came to take places, he must say the boxes were all taken."

895. MRS. PRITCHARD.

The celebrated actress Mrs. Pritchard, having retired with her family, during the summer, into a country village, took a fancy to see a play that was to be acted in a barn. She and her company engaged one of the best and most conspicuous seats in the little theatre. The scenes were made of pasteboard, and the clothes such as the manager could borrow or purchase. The orchestra was filled with one single crowdero. The actors were uncelebrated, it is true, but did their best. Mrs. Pritchard, instead of putting up with such fare as the country afforded, laughed so loudly and incessantly at the business of the scene, that the country audience were offended. Somebody present happened to know the great actress, and the fiddler, asking her name, was told she was the great Mrs. Pritchard, of the Theatre Royal in London. "I'll give her a hint presently," said crowdero, and immediately played the first tune in the Beggar's Opera:—

"Through all the employments of life, Each neighbor abuses his brother," &c.

"Come, let's be gone," said Mrs. Pritchard; "we are discovered; that fiddler is clever." And as she crossed over the stage to the entrance, she dropped crowdero a courtesy, and thanked him for his admonition.

896. COOKE AND THE TAILOR.

George Frederic Cooke, once performing in a country town, became indebted to a tailor for a suit of clothes. Shears offered to give him a receipt if Cooke would allow him to play Catesby to his Richard. Cooke, of course, was "O be joyful" at this easy mode of settling. Richard, in the tent scene, started from his knees and shouted, "Who's there?" and the lord of the goose and cabbage rushed on with the determination of making a hit. But Cooke looked so fiercely that the debutant was fairly frightened, and stammering out the beginning of his answer, unfortunately, in the middle, "Tis I, my lord; the early village cock," the audience was in a roar. Cooke surveyed the speechless offender for some time as if enjoying his agony, and then growled out, in an audible tone, "Why in the mischief don't you crow then?"

897. A LOSS.

Soon after Garrick's appearance on Drury Lane stage, an elderly gentlewoman called at his apartments and desired to speak with him on earnest business. She acquainted him that a young lady of great beauty and fortune, having seen him act Chamont and Lothario, and several other characters, had been so charmed with his performance, that she was willing to give him her hand, with her portion, which was at her own disposal. "But are you sure, Mr. Garrick, that you can prove yourself a good husband?" He answered, he did not doubt of proving such a husband as the young lady would wish to have. "I beg to have the honor of waiting on her." She promised to call in less than a fortnight, and fix a day of meeting. In vain did Garrick wait for the performance of her promise. A considerable time after, he met her by chance in the street, and asked her the reason of her not keeping her appointment. "O, dear!" said the old woman, "it is all over; the young woman has seen you play Abel Drucker, and her love is all gone."

§ 92. REAL CHARACTER AND ASSUMED CONTRASTED.

898. ABERNETHY AND LISTON.

With all his power of creating mirth and provoking laughter in others, Liston was, when at home, the dullest man imaginable, and a prey to low spirits, which frequently threatened his reason. By the persuasion of his wife, he went to the celebrated Abernethy, so well known for the brusquerie of his manner. Liston was ushered into the surgeon's room, and was received with a slight bow by the old cur, who was unacquainted with the name or person of his visitor.

"Sit down, sir. What ails you?" said the doctor.

Liston stated his complaint with gravity and deliberation.

"Is that all?" inquired Abernethy. "There's nothing the matter with you. Low spirits! Pooh! pooh! Go to Covent Garden to-night, and see Liston perform; if that has no effect, go again to-morrow: that will do it. Two doses of Liston will restore a melancholy madman. There—go—go."

Liston was taken aback—tipped his guinea—and made a most theatrical exit.

899. UNREMITTING KINDNESS.

An English comedian went to America, and remained there two years, leaving his wife dependent on her relatives. Mrs. F———t expatiating, in the greenroom, on the cruelty of such conduct, the comedian found a warm advocate in a well-known dramatist.

"I have heard," says the latter, "that he is the kindest of men; and I know he writes to his wife every packet."

"Yes, he writes," replied Mrs. F., "a parcel of flummery about the agony of absence, but he has never remitted her a shilling. Do you call that kindness?"

"Decidedly," replied the author, "unremitting kind-

900. MR. AND MRS. J.

Mr. and Mrs. J., when in the Glasgow company, lived, unfortunately, very much after the fashion in which Mr. and Mrs. Milton, Dr. and Mrs. Sherlock, and many other great personages, are said to have existed; with the exception that Mr. J. adopted the permission accorded by Judge Buller, and generally silenced Mrs. J. by the argumentum baculinum. One evening, after certain fastigatory performances at home, Mr. and Mrs. J. performed the duke and duchess in Toby's Honeymoon, in one of the scenes of which Juliana has to say that she presumes, if she disobey his orders, he will beat her; to which the duke replies, —

"I'll talk to you; but I'll not beat you.
He that lays his hand upon a woman,
Fave in the way of kindness, is a wretch,
Whom 'twere base flattery to call a coward."

Mr. J. had scarcely begun this commonplace clap-trap, when his spouse, dismissing the recollection of her scenic character, and smarting with her wrongs, darted a look at him, accompanied by an undercurrent exclamation, thus: —

Mr. J. as Duke. — He that lays his hand upon a woman — [Mrs. J. gives an indescribable glance, and exclaims, — Ugh!
you brute!]

Mr. J. [Proceeding.] — Save when she richly deserves it — is a wretch,
Whom 'twere base flattery to call a coward.

901. THE FOULTERER AND KING LEAR.

About the time when Murphy so successfully attacked the stage-struck heroes, in the pleasant farce of the Apprentice, an eminent poulterer went to a spouting club in search of his servant, who, he understood, was that evening to make his début in Lear; and, entering the room at the moment Dick was exclaiming, "I am the king—you cannot touch me for coining," "No, you dog," cried the enraged master, catching the mad monarch by the collar, "but I can for not picking the ducks!"

902. A HUSBAND'S SPITE.

The French actors have generally, both in comedy and tragedy, the great defect of looking at the audience, rather than each other; but this arises from their little disagreements; and, besides, from their living so much together, it is very natural that they should wish to see other faces. Madame Belmont long quarrelled with her husband; and, being in great vogue and very affluent circumstances, she often took the liberty of treating the poor man with great contempt. Unfortunately, however, as he was the lover of the troupe, and she what is called the premiere amoureuse, they generally acted in the same piece, and were very often obliged to appear smitten with each other. He was, upon one of these occasions, so enraged with her, for having refused that very morning to be his security for a gaming debt, that, instead of kissing her hand in the part required, he bit it, to the no small discomposure of the lady's smiles, and the laughter of the audience.

903. FAWCETT AND COOKE.

"How are you this morning?" said Fawcett to Cooke. "Not at all myself," says the tragedian. "Then I congratulate you," replied Fawcett; "for be whoever else you will, you will be a gainer by the bargain."

§ 93. MISCELLANEOUS.

904. MRS. SIDDONS AND THE BAS BLEU.

At the time when Mrs. Siddons had just reached her high theatrical fame, and had acted some of her principal characters to the admiration of all who beheld her, a formal assembly of learned ladies, consisting of Mrs. Montague, Mrs. Carter, Miss Hannah More, and sundry other members of the bas bleu, met, and prevailed upon Mrs. Siddons to be of the party. Their object was to examine her, and to get from her the secret how she could act with such wonderful effect. Mrs. Montague was deputed to be the prolocutress of this female convocation. "Pray, madam," said she to Mrs. Siddons, addressing her in the most formal manner, "give me leave to interrogate you, and to request you will tell us, without duplicity or mental reservation, upon what principle you conduct your dramatic demeanor. Is your mode of acting, by which you obtain so much celebrity, the result of certain studied principles of art? Have you investigated, with profound research, the rules of elocution and gesture, as laid down by the ancients and moderns, and reduced them to practice? or do you suffer nature to predominate, and only speak the untutored language of the passions?"

"Ladies," said the modern Thalia, with great diffidence, but without hesitation, "I do not know how to answer so learned a speech; all I know of the matter, and all I can tell you, is, that I always act as well as I can."

905. A GREAT MAN IN DISGUISE.

Many years ago, it happened that the elder Vernet, the painter, was travelling from Marseilles to Paris in the Coché voiturin, an extra-heavy diligence, which performed the journey in three weeks. Among the passengers packed up in its ample cavities, Vernet took particular notice of a fat man, with a red and vulgar face, whose wits seemed as thick as his body; and, resolving to amuse himself with this grotesque creature, he showed him a great deal of politeness, which the fat man returned awkwardly, but good-humoredly. They soon came to a hill; and as the poor jades would have been totally unable to drag up the Coché voiturin, with its fat and lean cargo, the passengers got out. As they were walking, they passed near a ditch of no great width, and Vernet, who was a good leaper, offered to bet that he would clear it.

"What!" cries the fat man, much surprised, "could you clear that?"

"To be sure I could; it is not wide."

"I should like to see you set about it."

"Why so?" says Vernet, clearing it.

"You have done it, sure enough," said the fat man; "I should like to try it, too; you have put me in spirits, and I think I could get over it."

"You!" cried the painter, bursting into a loud laugh; "I should like to see you set about it. I will bet our dinner that you tumble in."

"Come, now, don't frighten me beforehand! Let me see; our dinner — that comes to a good deal."

"Three francs, I believe."

"That's a good bit of money; never mind, I'll try it. Done."

After cutting half a dozen queer faces, the fat man leaped, and plumped down a foot further than Vernet had gone.

"I must have revenge," cries Vernet, rather piqued; "you won't refuse me, I hope."

"O, no! It was a mere chance, and may not happen again; at any rate, people must play fairly, and to-morrow we will leap for our dinner once more."

The next day another opportunity of trying their agility presented itself, and the fat man won, by a trifle, as he had done the day before, and was again delighted with his astonishing luck; while Vernet, more and more mortified at the triumph of his antagonist, renewed the contest every day, and lost every day, without exception. But every thing must have an end, and our travellers had arrived at their last stage; on which the fat man went up to Vernet, and said, "Sir, I owe you a thousand thanks for your kindness in paying for my dinner almost all the way from Marseilles here; and I wish to show you my gratitude. If you should like to have orders for Nicolet's Theatre, I shall be happy to present you with them; for I am engaged as clown there, and am to come out in two days, which may console you for being beaten. You leap beautifully; but if you did it twice as well, I should have won just the same, for I have some master strokes in reserve, which I should have made use of to exemplify the proverb (which, of course, you know) that says, 'From good to better, as they do at Nicolet's.'"

906. A FINANCIER.

Gilfert, the actor, like Sheridan, was in the habit of borrowing money from every body, very little of which was ever paid back; but he always intended to return it at the time he promised. He was a visionary man, and did not make the best calculations in the world. We heard of his meeting a friend in the Bowery, one day, when the following conversation took place: "Ah," said Gilfert, "you are the very man I wanted to see; lend me two hundred dollars." "I would in a moment," replied his friend, "but it is impossible. I have a note to pay, and I don't know where to get the money." "A note?" said Gilfert; "so have I. Let me see your notice." The gentleman produced it from his pocket-book. "Well, how much are you short?" "About two hundred dollars," said his friend. To his utter surprise, Gilfert handed him the money. "There," said he, "go and pay your note. I'll let mine be protested, as they can't be both taken up. If your note laid over, it might hurt your credit; but with me it don't matter, as I am used to that sort of business."

907. GARRICK AND GOLDSMITH.

In his Inquiry into the State of Polite Learning, Goldsmith had given offence to David Garrick, at that time the autocrat of the drama, and was doomed to experience its effect. A clamor had been raised against Garrick for exercising a despotism over the stage, and bringing forward nothing but old plays, to the exclusion of original productions. Walpole joined in this charge. "Garrick," said he, "is treating the town as it deserves and likes to be treated; with scenes, fireworks, and his own writings. A good new play I never expect to see more; nor have seen since the Provoked Husband, which came out when I was at school." Goldsmith, who was extremely fond of the theatre, and felt the evils of this system, inveighed in his treatise against the wrongs experienced by authors at the hands of managers. "Our poet's performance," said he, "must undergo a process truly chemical before it is presented to the public. It must be tried in the manager's fire, strained through a licenser, suffer from repeated corrections, till it may be a mere caput mortuum when it arrives before the public." Again: "Getting a play on even in three or four years is a privilege reserved only for the happy few who have the arts of courting the manager as well as the muse; who have adulation to please his vanity, powerful patrons to support their merit, or money to indemnify disappointment. Our Saxon ancestors had but one name for a wit and a witch. I will not dispute the propriety of uniting those characters then; but the man who, under present discouragements, ventures to write for the stage, whatever claim he may have to the appellation of a wit, at least has no right to be called a conjurer." But a passage which perhaps touched more sensibly than all the rest on the sensibilities of Garrick was the following:—

"I have no particular spleen against the fellow who sweeps the stage with the besom, or the hero who brushes it with his train. It were a matter of indifference to me, whether our heroines are in keeping, or our candle-snuffers burn their fingers, did not such make a great part of public care and polite conversation. Our actors assume all that state off the stage which they do on it; and, to use an expression borrowed from the greenroom, every one is up in his part. I am sorry to say it; they seem to forget their real characters."

These strictures were considered by Garrick as intended for himself, and they were rankling in his mind when Goldsmith waited upon him and solicited his vote for the vacant secretaryship of the Society of Arts, of which the manager was a member. Garrick, puffed up by his dramatic renown and his intimacy with the great, and knowing Goldsmith only by his budding reputation, may not have considered him of sufficient importance to be conciliated. In reply to his solicitations, he observed that he could hardly expect his friendly exertions after the unprovoked attack he had made upon his management. Goldsmith replied that he had indulged in no personalities, and had only spoken what he believed to be the truth. He made no further apology nor application, failed to get the appointment, and considered Garrick his enemy. In the second edition of his treatise he expunged or modified the passages which had given the manager offence; but though the author and actor became intimate in after years, this false step at the outset of their intercourse was never forgotten.

908. SCHILLER'S ROBBERS.

In 1781, Schiller published his Robbers, composed, it is said, some years before, at the age of nineteen, but concealed, for fear of offence, until he had completed his studies. This juvenile effort is, in every point of view, a wonderful production. Considered as a specimen of precocious genius, it is one of the most remarkable extant. Moreover, it stands decidedly at the head of that class of writings to which it belongs—a class characterized by stormy force and passionate extravagance of sentiment and diction, "a savageness of unreclaimed blood." The "Satanic school," it is denominated by Mr. Carlyle. Most of Byron's works rank in this rubric. Even the Sorrows of Werter, though with some latitude of interpretation, has been thus classed. Schiller's drama stands preëminent among works of this description, surpassing every thing of the sort in that peculiar power of fervid declamation which constitutes one of its distinguishing features. The Corsair and Giaour are milk-and-water idylls compared with it. The Robbers forms an era in literature. It was soon translated into most of the languages of Europe, and every where welcomed as the word which all men were waiting to hear. Not only did the pent volcano in the author's own breast find vent in those "power words," but he appeared as the spokesman of his time—the voice of that muttered uneasiness and impatience of existing institutions which marked the epoch immediately preceding the French revolution. In strong and terrible accents it spoke the hoarded wrath of long centuries of misrule and oppression. It was an angry scream which pierced every soul from the Rhine to the Baltic, and startled the eagles of dominion on their ancient sceptres—a prophecy of that tempest which soon after burst upon the world and changed the face of empires. Popular as it was with the public, and on the stage, it is doubtful if the real merits of the Robbers, to this day, have been duly appreciated by the critics. Its extravagances and puerilities, unhappily but too prominent, have thrown a shade over its great excellences, and biased the judgment of less mature and inflammable readers. It is not, as sometimes represented, a new farrago of power, words, and rhodomontade. It is far more than that. It is a genuine work of genius, a work unsurpassed, with the exception of Faust, by any thing since Shakespeare, in imaginative power, in the vivid delineation of vice and passion, and in tragic interest. Schiller has produced many things far superior to the Robbers, as works of art, but nothing that equals it in vigor and effect. The promise implied in this first effort, which the author himself has stigmatized as a "monster born of the unnatural union of Genius with Thralldom," was never quite realized in his subsequent productions.

Meanwhile the publication of this tragedy was attended with some disagreeable consequences to the author. He drew down upon himself the wrath of the people of the Grisons by an offensive allusion, aspersing the reputation of that district; he incurred the suspicion of the grand duke by becoming an author, as well as by the specific character of his drama; and finally subjected himself to repeated arrests for going to Manheim "without leave" to witness its performance in the theatre in that city. The result was, that Schiller made his escape from surgery and persecution at Stuttgart, and fled to Manheim, where he found a temporary support by writing for the stage. After a short residence in this city, he went to Mayence, then to Dresden, then to Leipzig. He also resided for a while at the estate of the Frau Von Wolzogen. In 1784 he was made counsellor by the Duke of Weimar, and in 1787 took up his residence in that city. At Weimar, about 1787, Schiller and Goethe, the two great poets of their age, first met. After some hesitation and coyness, and overcoming of prejudice on both sides, Schiller became acquainted and finally intimate with Goethe, whose nature, in most respects the antipodes of his own, acted with decisive effect on Schiller's genius and destiny. Indeed, his acquaintance with Goethe seems to have been the most powerful influence to which his riper years were subjected. Goethe has given an account of the formation of this acquaintance, from which it appears how difficult it was for these two spirits, the idealist and the realist,—each so determined in his way,—to amalgamate or even to converse. The unbroken friendship subsisting between them for nearly twenty years is a rare and beautiful passage in literary history, and highly creditable to both parties. In Goethe it required a severe struggle with fixed views and purposes, and some magnanimity, to make the first advances to the young poet, whom, on his return from Italy, he found in full possession of the popular ear and heart, and threatening to reinduce a style and tendency which he, for his part, had laid aside with the crudities of his youth, and was every way endeavoring to counteract and supplant. Schiller himself thought they should never come together, and writes thus of their first interview: "Though it did not at all diminish the idea, great as it was, which I had previously formed of Goethe, I doubt if we shall ever come into close communication with each other. Much that still interests me has already had its epoch with him; his whole nature is from its very origin otherwise constructed than mine; his world is not my world; our modes of conceiving things appear to be essentially different." Goethe, on the other hand, relates that Schiller, during this interview, in which the conversation turned on the metamorphosis of plants, said many things which pained him excessively, but that he determined to take no notice of them, and to discover, if possible, something which was common to both, and which might serve as the basis of an harmonious relation. Long after Schiller's death, he remarks of their intimacy, "There was something providential in my connection with Schiller; it might have happened earlier or later without so much significance; but that it should occur just at this time, when I had my Italian journey behind me, and Schiller began to be weary of his philosophical speculations, led to very important consequences for both." Mr. Carlyle remarks, "If we regard the relative situation of the parties, and their conduct in this matter, we must recognize in both of them no little social virtue; at all events, a deep disinterested love of worth. In the case of Goethe, more especially, who, as the elder and every way greater of the two, has little to expect in comparison with what he gives, this friendly union, had we space to explain its nature and progress, would give new proof that, as poor Jung Stilling also experienced, 'the man's heart, which few know, is as true and noble as his genius, which all know.'"

909. A STAR GONE OUT.

The Parisian monde dramatique has just lost one of its stars, which, some twenty years ago, shone with peculiar lustre, soon after declined from its zenith, and whose light is now forever extinguished in death.

Perlet was an actor little known to the youth of the present day. An excellent man he was, gifted with finesse, taste, and sang froid; full of heart and soul, but cursed with a servility so delicate, and a disposition so shy, that he became suddenly, in the very meridian of his success, a misanthrope, in comparison to whom Alceste was a mere Roger Goodfellow.

Gloomy and taciturn, musing incessantly on the miseries of mankind, and the deceptions of life, Perlet, notwithstanding, took it into his head to marry, and fixed his misanthropic eyes on the daughter of Tiercelin, the famous comic actor of the Variétés who was as melancholy, morose, and eccentric as himself.

An interview between the young actor and the old comedian was arranged by some mutual friends. Tiercelin invited Perlet to dinner. There were but two covers. The actors seated themselves at table, and dinner was served.

Tiercelin didn't open his lips; neither did Perlet. The repast continued in silence; at dessert neither had yet uttered a word. Tiercelin folded his napkin, arose from table, and extending his hand to Perlet, said to him,—

"You are just the son-in-law I want."

910. GOLDSMITH'S GOOD-NATURED MAN.

After making all arrangements for its performance, Goldsmith's comedy of the Good-natured Man was doomed to experience delays and difficulties to the very last. Garrick, notwithstanding his professions, had still a lurking grudge against the author, and tasked his managerial arts to thwart him in his theatrical enterprise. For this purpose he undertook to build up Hugh Kelly, Goldsmith's boon companion of the Wednesday Club, as a kind of rival. Kelly had written a comedy called False Delicacy, in which were embodied all the meretricious qualities of the sentimental school. Garrick, though he had decried that school, and had brought out his comedy of the Clandestine Marriage in opposition to it, now lauded False Delicacy to the skies, and prepared to bring it out at Drury Lane with all possible stage effect. He even went so far as to write a prologue and epilogue for it, and to touch up some parts of the dialogue. He had become reconciled to his former colleague, Colman, and it is intimated that one condition in the treaty of peace between these potentates of the realms of pasteboard (equally prone to play into each other's hands with the confederate potentates on the great theatre of life) was, that Goldsmith's play should be kept back until Kelly's had been brought forward.

In the mean time, the poor author, little dreaming of the deleterious influence at work behind the scenes, saw the appointed time arrive and pass by without the performance of his play; while False Delicacy was brought out at Drury Lane, (January 23, 1768,) with all the trickery of managerial policy. Houses were packed to applaud it to the echo; the newspapers vied with each other in their venal praises, and night after night seemed to give it a fresh triumph.

While False Delicacy was thus borne on the full tide of fictitious prosperity, the Good-natured Man was creeping through the last rehearsals at Covent Garden. The success of the rival piece threw a damp upon author, manager, and actors. Goldsmith went about with a face full of anxiety; Colman's hopes in the piece declined at each rehearsal; as to his fellow-proprietors, they declared they had never entertained any. All the actors were discontented with their parts, excepting Ned Shuter, an excellent low comedian, and a pretty actress named Miss Walford, both of whom the poor author ever after held in grateful recollection.

Johnson, Goldsmith's growling monitor and unsparing castigator in times of heedless levity, stood by him at present with that protecting kindness with which he ever befriended him in time of need. He attended the rehearsals; he furnished the prologue according to promise; he pished and pshawed at any doubts and fears on the part of the author, but gave him sound counsel, and held him up with a steadfast and manly hand. Inspired by his sympathy, Goldsmith plucked up new heart, and arrayed himself for the grand trial with unusual care. Ever since his elevation into the polite world, he had improved in his wardrobe and toilet. Johnson could no longer accuse him of being shabby in his appearance; he rather went to the other extreme. On the present occasion there is an entry in the books of his tailor, Mr. William Filby, of a suit of "Tyrian bloom, satin grain, and garter blue silk breeches, £8 2s. 7d." Thus magnificently attired, he attended the theatre, and watched the reception of the play, and the effect of each individual scene, with that vicissitude of feeling incident to his mercurial nature.

Johnson's prologue was solemn in itself, and, being delivered by Brinsley in lugubrious tones suited to the ghost in Hamlet, seemed to throw a portentous gloom on the audience. Some of the scenes met with great applause, and at such times Goldsmith was highly elated; others went off coldly, or there were slight tokens of disapprobation, and then his spirits would sink. The fourth act saved the piece; for Shuter, who had the main comic character of Croaker, was so varied and ludicrous in his execution of the scene in which he reads an incendiary letter, that he drew down thunders of applause. On his coming behind the scenes, Goldsmith greeted him with an overflowing heart; declaring that he exceeded his own idea of the character, and made it almost as new to him as to any of the audience.

On the whole, however, both the author and his friends were disappointed at the reception of the piece, and considered it a failure. Poor Goldsmith left the theatre with his towering hopes completely cut down. He endeavored to hide his mortification, and even to assume an air of unconcern while among his associates; but, the moment he was alone with Dr. Johnson, in whose rough but magnanimous nature he reposed unlimited confidence, he threw off all restraint, and gave way to an almost childlike burst of grief. Johnson, who had shown no want of sympathy at the proper time, saw nothing in the partial disappointment of overrated expectations to warrant such ungoverned emotions, and rebuked him sternly for what he termed a silly affectation, saying that "no man should be expected to sympathize with the sorrows of vanity."

When Goldsmith had recovered from the blow, he, with his usual unreserve, made his past distress a subject of amusement to his friends. Dining one day, in company with Dr. Johnson, at the chaplain's table at St. James's Palace, he entertained the company with a particular and comic account of all his feelings on the night of representation, and his despair when the piece was hissed; how he went to the literary club; chatted gayly, as if nothing had been amiss; and, to give a greater idea of his unconcern, sang his favorite song about an old woman tossed in a blanket seventeen times as high as the moon. "All this while," added he, "I was suffering horrid tortures, and, had I put a bit in my mouth, I verily believe it would have strangled me on the spot, I was so excessively ill. But I made more noise than usual to cover all that; so they never perceived my not eating, nor suspected the anguish of my heart; but, when all were gone except Johnson, here, I burst out a-crying, and even swore that I would never write again."

The Good-natured Man was performed for ten nights in succession; the third, sixth, and ninth nights were for the author's benefit; the fifth night it was commanded by their majesties; after this, it was played occasionally, but rarely, having always pleased more in the closet than on the stage.

911. FAVOR AND SODORINI.

Soon after M. Favor was appointed first ballet master of the Opera, (towards the conclusion of the last century,) Signor Sodorini, another performer there, came one day upon the stage, after the rehearsal, and said to him, "Allow me, my dear sir, to introduce myself to you. You are the dearest friend I have on earth. Let me thank you a thousand times for the happiness you have conferred upon me by coming amongst us. Command me in any way; for whatever I do for you, I can never sufficiently repay you." The ballet master, who had never seen or heard of Sodorini before, was astounded. At last he said, "Pray, sir, to what peculiar piece of good fortune may I attribute the compliments and professions with which you favor me." "To your unparalleled ugliness, my dear sir," replied Sodorini; "for before your arrival, I was considered the ugliest man in Great Britain." The ballet master, strange to say, took this joke in good part; and the two were ever after warm friends.

912. DR. JOHNSON'S OPINION OF MRS. SIDDONS.

When Mrs. Siddons visited Dr. Johnson, he paid her two or three very elegant compliments. When she retired, he said to Dr. Glover, "Sir, she is a prodigious fine woman." "Yes," replied Dr. Glover, "but don't you think she is much finer on the stage, when she is adorned by art?" "Sir," said Johnson,

"on the stage art does not adorn her; nature adorns her there, and art glorifies her."

913. FOOTE'S WOODEN LEG.

George Colman the younger notes, "There is no Shakspeare or Roscius upon record who, like Foote, supported a theatre for a series of years by his own acting, in his own writings, and for ten years of the time upon a wooden leg! This prop to his person I once saw standing by his bedside, ready dressed in a handsome silk stocking, with a polished shoe and gold buckle, awaiting the owner's getting up; it had a kind of tragic, comical appearance, and I leave to inveterate wags the ingenuity of punning upon a Foote in bed, and a leg out of it. The proxy for a limb thus decorated, though ludicrous, is too strong a reminder of amputation to be very laughable. His undressed supporter was the common wooden stick, which was not a little injurious to a well-kept pleasure-ground. I remember following him after a shower of rain, upon a nicely-rolled terrace, in which he stumped a deep round hole at every other step he took, till it appeared as if the gardener had been there with his dibble, preparing, against all horticultural practice, to plant a long row of cabbages in a gravel walk."

914. HAMLET AND GUILDENSTERN.

On one occasion, when John Kemble played Hamlet in the country, the gentleman who acted Guildenstern was, or imagined himself to be, a capital musician. Hamlet asks him, "Will you play upon this pipe?" "My lord, I cannot." "I do beseech you." "Well, if your lordship insists on it, I shall do as well as I can." And to the confusion of Hamlet, and the great amusement of the audience, he played "God save the King."

915. TILLOTSON'S INQUIRY OF BETTERTON.

Archbishop Tillotson was very well acquainted with Betterton, and continued that acquaintance even after he was in that high station. One day when Betterton came to see him at Lambeth, that prelate asked him how it came about that after he had made the most moving discourse that he could, was touched deeply with it himself, and spoke it as feelingly as he was able, yet he could never move people in the church near so much as the other did on the stage. "That," says Betterton, "I think is easy to be accounted for; it is because you are only telling them a story, and I am showing them facts."

916. MATHEWS AND THE KING.

Previous to Mathews's leaving England for America, he exhibited a selection from his popular entertainments, by command of his majesty, at Carlton Palace. A select party of not more than six or eight persons were present, including the Princess Augusta and the Marchioness of Conyngham. During the entertainment, (with which the king appeared much delighted,) Mathews introduced his imitations of various performers on the British stage, and was proceeding with John Kemble, in the Stranger, when he was interrupted by the king, who, in the most affable manner, observed that his general imitation was excellent, and such as no one who had ever seen the characters could fail to recognize; but he thought the comedian's portrait of John Kemble somewhat too boisterous. "He is an old friend, and, I might add, tutor of mine," observed his majesty: "when I was Prince of Wales, he often favored me with his company. I will give you an imitation of John Kemble," said the good-humored monarch. "May I request your attention," said the king to his attendants, peers and lords, who stood near the sofa on which he and the ladies were seated. Mathews was electrified; the lords of the bed-chamber eyed each other with surprise. The king rose, and prefaced his imitations by observing, "I once requested John Kemble to take a pinch of snuff with me, and for this purpose placed my box on the table before him, saying, 'Kemble, oblige (obleege) me by taking a pinch of snuff.' He took a pinch, and then addressed me thus: [here his majesty assumed the peculiar carriage of Mr. Kemble:] 'I thank your royal highness for your snuff; but in future do extend your royal jaws a little wider, and say oblige.'" The anecdote was given with the most powerful similitude to the actor's voice and manners, and had an astonishing effect upon the party present. It is a circumstance equally worthy of the king and scholar. Mathews, at the conclusion, requested permission to offer an original anecdote of Kemble, which had some affinity to the foregoing. Kemble had been for many years the intimate friend of the Earl of Aberdeen. On one occasion he had called on that nobleman during his morning ride, and left Mrs. Kemble in the carriage at the door. John and the noble earl were closely engaged on some literary subject a very long time, while Mrs. Kemble was shivering in the carriage at the door, it being very cold weather. At length, her patience being exhausted, she directed her servant to inform his master that she was waiting, and feared the cold weather would bring on an attack of the rheumatism. The fellow proceeded to the door of the earl's study, and delivered his message, leaving out the final letter in rheumatism. This he had repeated several times, at intervals, by directions of his mistress, before he could obtain an answer; at length Kemble, roused from his subject by the importunities of the servant, replied somewhat petulantly, "Tell your mistress I shall not come; and, fellow, do you in future say tism!"

917. ANECDOTE OF FINN.

Finn was once a witness for the prosecution in a case before the Common Pleas, in Boston, and his testimony was so direct and conclusive that the counsel for the defence thought it necessary to discredit him. The following dialogue ensued:—

"Mr. Finn, you live in — Street; do you not?"

"Yes; I do."

"You have lived there a great while?"

"Several years."

"Does not a female live there under your protection?"

"There does."

"Does she bear your name?"

"She is certainly known in the neighborhood by the name of Mrs. Finn"

"Is she your wife?"

"No; we were never legally married."

"That will do, sir; I have no more to ask."

"But I have something more to answer, sir," replied Finn, with spirit. "The Mrs. Finn, of whom you have been pleased to speak with such levity, is my mother; and I have known but one man base enough to breathe aught against her. You, sir, can guess who he is. True, she is under my protection. She protected me through my infancy and childhood, and it is but paying a small part of the debt I owe her to do as much for her in her old age."

The baffled counsellor had not another word to say.

918. HARRY SIMPSON AND MEDICINE.

Harry Simpson would never take any medicine; and his medical man was often obliged to resort to some stratagem to impose a dose upon him. There is a piece—I do not recollect the name—in which the hero is sentenced, in prison, to drink a cup of poison. Harry Simpson was playing this character one night, and had given directions to have it filled with Port wine; but what was his horror, when he came to drink it, to find it contained a dose of senna! He could not throw it away, as he had to hold the goblet upside down, to show his persecutors he had drained every drop of it. Simpson drank the medicine with the slowness of a poisoned martyr; but he never forgave his medical man this trick, as was fully proved at his death, for he died without paying him his bill.

919. ESTIMATES OF KEAN.

Kean once played young Norval to Mrs. Siddons's Lady Randolph. After the play, as Kean used to relate, Mrs. Siddons came to him, and patting him on the head, said—

"You have played very well, sir, very well. It's a pity, but there's too little of you to do any thing."

Coleridge said of this "little" actor, "Kean is original; but he copies from himself. His rapid descents from the hyper-tragic to the infra-colloquial, though sometimes productive of great effect, are often unreasonable. To see him act is like reading Shakspeare by flashes of lightning. I do not think him thorough-bred gentleman enough to play Othello."

920. AUTHORS TURNING ACTORS TO GIVE LEIGH HUNT A BENEFIT.

"About a dozen years ago," says Leigh Hunt, "in consequence of disappointments, some friends renewed an application to Lord Melbourne, which they had made in the reign previous. It was thought that my sufferings in the cause of reform, and my career as a man of letters, rendered me not undeserving a pension. His lordship received both the applications with a courtesy which he does not appear to have shown in quarters where the interest might have been thought greater; but the pension was not granted. Perhaps the courtesy was on that account. Perhaps he gave my friends these and other evidences of his good will towards me, knowing that he should advise nothing further; for I had twice during his administration received grants from the royal bounty fund of two hundred pounds each, once during the reign of King William, and the second after the accession of her majesty. It subsequently turned out that Lord Melbourne considered it proper for no man to have a pension given him by one sovereign, who had been condemned in a court of law for opposing another. I will not say 'libelling,' for Lord Melbourne's friends, and perhaps himself, when a young wit, had plentifully libelled sovereign people. The reason, in fact, was so futile, and, indeed, so dangerous to royalty itself, and its hold upon the affections, considering that a man may oppose one sovereign out of the very feelings which render him the devoted subject of another, (which was the case in this very instance,) that a more reflecting minister did not choose to abide by it, and the pension was subsequently given me.

"Simultaneous with the latest movement about the pension was one on the part of my friend Dickens and others, who, combining a kindly purpose with an amateur inclination for the stage, had condescended to show to the public what excellent actors they could have been, had they so pleased; what excellent actors, indeed, some of them were. They were of opinion that a benefit for myself at one of the metropolitan theatres would be a dishonor on neither side. A testimonial of a different sort, which had been proposed by some other friends, was superseded by this form of one; and preparations were being accordingly made, when the grant of the pension seemed to render it advisable that the locality of the benefit should be transferred from London to a provincial stage, in acknowledgment to the superior boon, and for the avoidance of all appearance of competing with it. The result was still of great use to me, and my name was honored in a manner I shall never forget, by an address from the pens of Mr. Sergeant (now Justice) Talfourd, and Sir Edward Bulwer, and the plaudits of Birmingham and Liverpool. If any thing had been needed to show how men of letters include actors, on the common principle of the greater including the less, these gentlemen would have furnished it; and this, too, to a negative as well as positive extent, of which they were probably not aware; for where they failed most, except from pure inexperience, was in the imitation which they condescended to make of actors themselves; while, in their own peculiar merits, they not only equalled the best reigning actors, but sometimes surpassed them. Part of Mr. Dickens's Bobadil had a spirit in it of intellectual apprehension beyond any thing the existing stage has shown; his farce throughout was admirable—quite rich, and filled up; and Mr. Forster delivered the verses of Ben Jonson with a musical flow, and a sense of their grace and beauty, absolutely unknown to existing stage recitation. At least, I have never heard any thing like it since Edmund Kean's. The lines came out of his lips as if he loved them—not hacked and hewed into fragments, in order to conceal insensibility to their beauty with shows of passion. I allude particularly, in this instance, to his performance of the Younger Brother. But he did it always, when sweet verse required it."

921. KEAN'S LAST APPEARANCE ON THE STAGE.

"I was," says James H. Hackett, "in one of the boxes of Covent Garden Theatre, on Monday, the twenty-fifth of March, 1833, the last night that great actor, Edmund Kean, appeared on the stage. His health, for months, had been so rapidly declining, and his physical energies become so visibly impaired by those long-indulged irregularities, which had broken down a naturally vigorous but abused constitution, that his acting was rendered generally feeble, unsatisfactory, and often painful; and even his inability to appear at all when announced was by no means a rare occurrence. The last effort he made, at all worthy of his former fame, was in the early part of the winter, when the importance of having his Othello brought, for the first time, in conjunction with the rival talents of Macready, in Iago, gave a stimulus to his powers of body and mind, sufficient to sustain him throughout the character. It was universally admitted, that never did his genius display itself more triumphantly. On this occasion, however, he was advertised for the same favorite part, to the Iago of his son Charles, who, having never before acted with him on the London boards, was warmly greeted on his entrée by a tolerably numerous audience; but when, in the second scene, the father entered, as Othello, followed by the son, as Iago, the house rung with reiterated acclamations. The father continued bowing for a considerable time, without producing any diminution in the enthusiastic and loud cheering which prevailed, when, as if suddenly awakened to a sense of the circumstance, he turned, and taking his son by the hand, led him a step or two forward, and, with a graceful bow, and one of his most fascinating and characteristic smiles, presented him to the audience. The waving of hats and handkerchiefs, and the doubly-redoubled plaudits which ensued, checked, for an unusually long period, every attempt made by them to proceed with their parts. There was nothing distinguishable in Kean's performance of the first and second acts from his usual personification of Othello, except a more than ordinary feebleness in his voice, action, and gait; which, as he had not many weeks previous broken down in the midst of the part, was imputed to a designed reservation, or perhaps the fear of too early exhausting what physical strength he might otherwise be enabled to call up in order to sustain the third and latter acts: when, however, he came to that memorable apostrophe, 'Now, forever, farewell!' &c., the whole of it was breathed forth with all that melodious melancholy so noted in his brighter days, and so happily described by the critic Hazlett, as 'striking upon the heart and imagination like some divine music,' only mingled with a far greater degree of feeling than I had ever before observed; in fact, so deeply affecting were his tones, that, as he half sobbed out the last line, 'Farewell! — Othello's — occupation's — gone!' I remarked to a friend near me, 'Poor fellow! I fear that a consciousness of Othello's despairing moans, being applicable to himself personally, has touched his own feelings.' I seldom remember Kean's failing, in this particular point, to elicit less than three hearty rounds on ordinary occasions; but on this, they were increased in number and duration. He remained abstracted and motionless, his chin resting on his breast, and his eyes fixed on the ground for many seconds after every murmur of applause had subsided; then raising his head from his chest, as from a forgetful slumber, he seemed partially roused into a sense of his situation with the audience, and the necessity of proceeding; but instead of that sudden and infuriate alternation, — that towering passion which used to threaten the destroyer of his peace with irresistible and immediate annihilation, — he turned slowly and feebly, tottered a few steps towards Iago, (who, seeing his sinking state, approached him,) and leaning on his arm for support, and unable to seize him by the throat, he uttered in disjointed accents, only audible to those quite near him, "Villain — be — sure — you — prove;" then throwing himself upon his son's neck, in a faint and faltering voice, added, 'O God! I am dying! speak to them, Charles!' The house, though somewhat prepared for a result of the kind, did not anticipate such a decided prostration of his faculties, and kept up their applause for nearly a minute, endeavoring to cheer him by showing every mark of indulgence. At length Charles made an attempt to assist his father forward, when, his look and manner indicating the most pitiable helplessness, it became evident he could no longer stand alone, and the audience, with one accord, rose and cried, 'Take him off!' whereupon one of the performers came on from the wing, and poor Kean, who was trying to bow, was borne off, and carried to a house in the vicinity for the night, and the next day removed to his own residence at Richmond, where he lingered about six weeks before he expired. Thus terminated the fitful career of an actor. Take him for all in all, 'we ne'er shall look upon his like again!'"

922. GARRICK'S COMPLAINT AGAINST FOOTE.

When Garrick once complained to Sir Joshua Reynolds of the daily sarcasms with which he was annoyed from Foote, the comedian, Sir Joshua answered, that Foote, in so doing, gave the strongest proofs possible of sensibly feeling his own inferiority; as it was always the lesser man who condescended to become malignant and abusive.

923. BARRY, THE ACTOR.

It was said of Barry, the player, that he had a voice which might lure a bird from a tree, and, at the same time, an address and manner the most prepossessing and conciliating. Of the justice of the latter remark, the subsequent anecdote is a testimony. The Dublin Theatre, of which Mr. Barry was then proprietor, failed, and he was considerably indebted to his actors, musicians, &c. Among others, the master carpenter called at Barry's house, and was very clamorous in demanding his money. Barry, who was ill at the time, came to the head of the stairs, and asked what was the matter.

"Matter enough," replied the carpenter; "I want my money, and can't get it."

"Don't be in a passion," said Barry. "Do me the favor to walk up stairs, if you please, and we will speak upon the business."

"Not I, Mr. Barry!" cried the carpenter, "you owe me a hundred pounds already, and, if I come up, you will owe me two before I leave you."

924. ROYAL PERFORMERS.

Once, at Marie Antoinette's private theatre, the little comic opera of Rose and Culas was performed by the royal family and court. The queen had a part in it; and, just as she finished one of the songs, a sharp hiss was heard. The spectators looked at each other in surprise; but Marie Antoinette, who felt at once that in all the crowd of grandes and courtiers there was but one person who would venture to take such a liberty, came forward to the front of the stage, and, addressing herself to the king, after saluting the audience, —

"Sir," said she, "since you are not satisfied with my acting, if you will take the trouble to step out, your money will be returned at the entrance."

A thunder of applause greeted this sally, in which the king joined most heartily.

925. EDMUND KEAN AT PORTSMOUTH.

During the recess which followed Kean's first triumphant season at Drury Lane, he accepted an offer to play at Portsmouth. He had then become the "great Kean," travelled in his own chariot, gave splendid dinners, and was an honored guest at the board of every manager. On the morning of the day on which he was to make his appearance at the Portsmouth Theatre, the manager and two or three friends invited Mr. Kean to take a glass of Madeira and a biscuit at one of the principal hotels. The party entered the hotel and seated themselves. The wine and biscuit were brought, and the landlord (albeit "a great man") could not do less for such a guest as Mr. Kean than to await upon him in person. Kean had no sooner perceived the landlord, than, darting upon him one of those soul-searching looks for which he was so celebrated, he exclaimed,—

"Stop! Is not your name ——?"

"Yes, sir," said the landlord, astonished at the tone in which he addressed him.

"Then," said Mr. Kean, "I will not eat or drink in your house. Eight years ago I went into your coffee-room, and modestly requested a glass of ale. You surveyed me from top to toe, and, having done so, I heard you give some directions to your waiter, who presented me with the glass in one hand, holding the other for the money. I paid it, sir, and then he relinquished his hold of the glass. I am better dressed now; I can drink Madeira; I am waited upon by the landlord in person; but I am the same Edmund Kean that I was then. And had not Edmund Kean then the same feelings that he has now? Away with you, sir! Away! your sight pains me!" And, having said this, he took his hat, and hastily left the apartment.

"Now," said Kean, when they had quitted the house, "I will take you to an honest fellow, who was kind to me in my days of misfortune."

They entered a third-rate house, and, having ordered some wine desired to see the landlord. He came; but it was not the host of Kean's recollection. He was dead. There was, however, a sort of half waiter, half pot-boy, who had lived at the house when Kean frequented it, and was a great favorite of his master. Kean, with a tear in his eye, inquired about the family of the deceased landlord; and, on leaving the house, asked the waiter what o'clock it was.

"I will see, sir," running to the stairs, at the head of which stood a clock.

"Have you a watch?" said Kean.

"No, sir."

"Take that, and buy one, and, whenever you look at it, think of your late master."

The noble-hearted actor put five pounds in the hands of the waiter, who remained mute with astonishment.

926. ELKANAH SETTLE.

Elkanah Settle, in the latter part of his life, was so reduced as to attend a booth at Bartholomew

Fair, the keepers of which gave him a salary for writing drolls. He also was obliged to appear, in his old age, as a performer in these wretched theatrical exhibitions; and in a farce called St. George of England acted a dragon, enclosed in a case of green leather of his own invention. To this circumstance Dr. Young refers in the following lines in his epistle to Mr. Pope:—

"Poor Elkanah! all other changes past,
For bread, in Smithfield dragons hiss'd at last;
Spit streams of fire to make the butchers gape,
And found his manners suited to his shape," &c.

In the end, he obtained admission into the Charter-house, where he died.

927. EXPRESSION.

Hylas, the scholar of Pylades, and almost sufficiently advanced in his art to rival his master, one day played in a piece of which the last words were, "the great Agamemnon." Hylas, to express the idea of greatness, stretched out his whole body, as if he meant to indicate the measure of a very great man. Pylades, placed in the middle of the audience, could not contain himself, but cried aloud, "You represent length, not grandeur." The people, excited by this critique, insisted that Pylades should get upon the stage, and act the same part himself. Pylades obeyed; and, when he came to the passage in question, he represented Agamemnon as pensive; since nothing, in his opinion, was so characteristic of a great king as thought for all.

928. THE ORIGINAL BLACK-EYED SUSAN.

Gay wrote the well-known ballad, called Black-eyed Susan, upon Mrs. Montford, a celebrated actress, contemporary with Cibber. After her retirement from the stage, love, and the ingratitude of a bosom friend, deprived her of her senses, and she was placed in a receptacle for lunatics. One day, during a lucid interval, she asked her attendant what play was to be performed that evening, and was told that it was Hamlet. In this tragedy, whilst on the stage, she had ever been received with rapture in Ophelia. The recollection struck her; and, with that cunning which is often allied to insanity, she eluded the care of her keepers, and got to the theatre, where she concealed herself under the scene in which Ophelia enters in her insane state. She then pushed on the stage, before the lady who had performed the previous part of the character could come on, and exhibited a more perfect representation of madness than the utmost exertions of mimic art could effect. She was, in truth, Ophelia herself, to the amazement of the performers, and the astonishment of the audience. Nature having made this last effort, her vital powers failed her. On going off, she exclaimed, "It is all over!" She was immediately conveyed back to her late place of security, and in a few days after,—

"Like a lily drooping, Bowed her head and died."

929. THE ACTOR'S RETORT.

A bad actor, who had been accustomed to be hissed in every town he played in, finding himself one day even worse treated than usual, turned quietly round, as he made his exit, and said to the pit, "Gentlemen, you will tire by and by, as others have." The coolness and natveté of the remark occasioned a laugh, and the actor in future was favorably received.

§ 94. DRAMATIC MANAGEMENT AND MANAGERS.

930. FEEDING ON RAIN.

A manager of a company of strolling players found himself in a woful predicament. His pieces would not draw in the quiet New England village where he had temporarily set up shop; he and his company were literally starving; the men moodily pacing the stage; the women, who had kept up their spirits to the last, sitting silent and sorrowful; and the children, little sufferers! actually crying for food. "I saw all this," says the manager, "and I began to feel suicidal. It was night, and I looked about for a rope. At length I spied just what I wanted; a rope dangled at the prompt-side, and near a steep flight of stairs, which led to a dressing-room. 'That's it,' said I, with gloomy satisfaction. 'I'll mount those stairs, noose myself, and drop quietly off in the night; but let me see if it is firmly attached. I accordingly approached, gave a pull at the rope; when, whisk! I found I had set the rain a-going. And now a thought struck me. I leaped, danced, and shouted madly for joy! 'Where did you get your liquor?' growled some. 'He's gone mad,' said Mrs. —. 'Poor fellow! hunger has made him a maniac! Heaven shield us from a like fate!' 'Hunger!' shouted I, 'we shall be hungry no longer. Here's food from heaven, manna in the wilderness, and all that sort of thing! We'll feed on rain!' I seized a hatchet, and mounting by a ladder, soon brought the rain box tumbling to the ground. My meaning was now understood. An end of the box was pried off, and full a bushel of dried beans and peas were poured out, to the delight of all. Some were stewed immediately, and, though rather hard, I never relished any thing better. But while the operation of cooking was going on below, we amused ourselves with parching some beans upon the sheet iron, (the thunder of the theatre.) set over an old furnace, and heated by rosin from the lightning bellows. Thus we fed upon rain, cooked by thunder and lightning!"

931. SHERIDAN AND THE PLAYWRIGHT.

A playwright had sent a comedy to Mr. Sheridan for perusal, and of course approval, and afterwards heard nothing of his comedy. He waited six months patiently; the season was then over, and he therefore resolved to wait on till the next season began: he did so; he then called at Mr. Sheridan's, who at that time lived in George Street, Hanover Square — not at home, of course; he then despatched a note — no answer; another — ditto; another call — still the same result. At last, however, the author hit upon the expedient of posting himself in the hall on a day in the evening of which there was to be an important debate in the House of Commons. This was a blockade which even the ingenuity of the wit could not evade; the author was therefore admitted.

His inquiries were respectful, but earnest.

"My comedy, Mr. Sheridan — I —"

"Yes — to be sure — clearly — the —"

"Fashionable Involvements, in five acts," said the author, helping his great friend to the name of his work, which he hoped might recall the name of his recollection — a hope most vain.

"Upon my word," said Sheridan, "I — I'm in a great hurry — I really don't remember — I am afraid your play has been somehow mislaid."

"Mislaid," exclaimed the anxious parent of the lost bantling. "My dear sir, if it is, I am ruined — I have no copy of it."

"It is very unfortunate," said Mr. Sheridan, "very — I'm sure I regret — I —"

"But what can I do, sir?" said the author.

"I tell you what, my dear friend," replied Mr. Sheridan, "I cannot promise you your own play back, because I don't know where any of the last year's pieces are; but if you will open that table drawer, you will find a great number that have been sent me this year — you may take any three of those in exchange, and do what you like with them."

932. WHITELY'S EPISODE.

Mr. Whitely, manager of a country theatre, having constantly an eye to his interest, one evening, during the performance of Richard III., gave a tolerable proof of that being his leading principle. Representing the "crook-backed tyrant," he exclaimed, —

"Hence, babbling dreams! you threaten here in vain! Conscience, avaunt! (That man in the brown wig there has got into the pit without paying!) Richard's himself again!"

933. SHERIDAN AND LEWIS.

Sheridan never gave Lewis any of the profits of the Castle Spectre. One day, Lewis, being in company with him, said, "Sheridan, I will make you a large bet." Sheridan, who was always ready to make a wager, however inconvenient he might find it to pay, if lost, asked eagerly, "What bet?" "All the profits of my Castle Spectre," replied Lewis. "I will tell you what," said Sheridan, who never found his match at repartee, "I will make you a very small one — what it is worth."

934. A SHARP-WITTED SHAVER.

A grand melo-dramatic spectacle was being rehearsed in the Park Theatre a few years since, in which a magnificent car, drawn by horses, was to make its appearance on the stage through a trap door. Mr. Manager S. supervised in person the rehearsals. The period arrived when the horses should appear dragging the gilded car — the stage was detained — the actors impatient — the manager wrathful, demanding in a loud voice of the boy whose business it was to see all right below, in the regions of mystery and enchantment, why he delayed the car.

"Somebody is cut the traces, sir."

"Cut the traces?" asked the manager. "Why, nobody's had access there to-day but yourself."

"They wasn't cut with axes, sir; they vas cut with a knife!"

935. SHERIDAN AND HIS DUNS.

There was a singular plan, first adopted by Sheridan, of getting rid of untimely visitors; but then his visitors were creditors. They came early, at seven in the morning, to prevent the possibility of being tricked with the usual answer, "Not at home," and of course they would not go away. One was shut up in one room, and another in another. By twelve o'clock in the day there was a vast accumulation; and at that hour the master of the house would say, "James, are all the doors shut?" "All shut, sir." "Very well, then open the street door softly." And Sheridan walked quietly out between the double line of closed doors.

936. SEYMOUR AND THE BEER BOTTLE.

"Seymour, the stage manager at Worcester," says Dyer, the actor, "was on the scene with me at a time when some jovial fellows in the pit attempted to open a bottle of ginger-beer without disturbing us or the audience. Our energies were somewhat damped by hearing a suppressed titter, and whizzing accompaniment, with a distinct whisper of 'It's coming.' I very hastily passed over my scene, and left Seymour on the stage, when the whizzing increased, and a voice said, 'Now!' which Seymour thought a signal for disapprobation against him; and stepping forward, to the amazement of the public, he said, 'Why do you hiss me, ladies and gentlemen? I have served you to the best of my ability, and it grieves me that my efforts should end in——' At this moment the cork, impatient of coaxing, flew up with a loud explosion, and Seymour's speech ended in 'Pop!'"

937. AN ANSWER.

Sheridan, scholar, wit, and spendthrift, being dunned by a tailor to pay at least the interest on his bill, answered, that it was not his interest to pay the principal, nor his principle to pay the interest.

938. SHERIDAN IN THE COAL CELLAR.

Sheridan is reported to have once fallen into a coal cellar on his way home after a good supper at Drury Lane; and his abuse of the vender for not keeping a light at the cellar door was warmly retorted by the wife. "Hang it," cried Sheridan, who was not much hurt, "do you think I want to pocket your coals?" "No," retorted the wench, "but your nose may set the coals on fire."

939. DECLINING A CHALLENGE.

At one time Gilfert owed Conrad, the printer, a bill. Conrad grew tired of dunning him for it, and one day wrote Gilfert a letter, which put the manager in a towering fury. Down he sat, and challenged Conrad to fight, declaring that if he refused, he would horsewhip him in the public streets the next day. Conrad returned for answer that he would not fight until his bill was paid, as no man in his senses would go out to shoot at his own money. Some few weeks after this occurrence, Gilfert had an unexpected windfall. Conrad received a letter from him, couched in something like the following terms:—

"My dear Conrad: I was wrong, but you had no right to insult me. Yet I ought to have paid you the money before. I enclose it to you now, principal and interest. Come and dine with me. Tout à vous. GILFERT."

940. HOPKINS OBJECTED TO BY GARRICK.

When Hopkins, the Drury Lane prompter, once recommended a man to be a mechanist in preparing a new pantomime, Garrick made the following objections to employing him: "This man will never answer the purpose of the theatre. In the first place he cannot make a moon; I would not give him three-pence a dozen for all the moons he showed me to-day. His *sun*s are, if possible, worse; besides, I gave him directions about the clouds, and such heavy clouds were never seen since the flood. Desire the carpenter to knock the rainbow to pieces, and roll up the blue sky, for we cannot hang it up in our firment."

941. MADAME LINGUET.

Madame Linguet was an actress of the Italian Theatre in Paris. Her husband, who was cashier of the theatre, employed a party to hiss every actress but Madame Linguet, and to applaud her to the skies. This went on famously for some time, till the secret was found out by a sad mistake. Linguet, in his instructions to the men, said, "To-morrow night you must hiss the first actress that appears, and applaud the second; now mind you make no mistake: hiss the first, and applaud the second." They obeyed orders, but, unfortunately for Madame Linguet, the play was changed, and in the new piece she appeared first, when she was completely hissed, to the great amusement of all the audience. M. Linguet, to be revenged, ran off with all the money of the theatre in his hands, and took refuge in the Temple, then an asylum where a person could not be arrested.

942. A USELESS CLAUQUEUR.

The Clauquetin of the French theatre receives a ticket on condition that he will leave at the end of the first act, that his check may be sold for the benefit of the entrepreneur de succès, (the undertaker of success.) Perdition to the individual that dares to infringe this obligation! The whole Roman legion would precipitate him to the bottom of the Tarpeian rock. There was, on one occasion, much laughter at the opera about a trick played upon the chef de claque.

A person enveloped in a cloak presented himself at the Café de la Place Fuvart, and asked for a ticket to see Guillaume Tell.

"Will you applaud Duprez?" he was asked.

"As well as I am able."

He is enrolled—he is well made—they put him in the middle of the pit. But our man does not compromise himself. Vain is it for them to attempt to stimulate him; he applauds not—not even once. On leaving, they apostrophize him:—

"You did not applaud!"

"Yes, I did, as well as I was able."

"How's that?"

Here the claqueur, showing his arms, made a late revelation — there were no hands at the ends of them.

943. BEHIND THE SCENES.

The following amusing picture of the manner in which poetical illusion may be "murdered" worse than any play, by going behind the scenes of a playhouse, is from the World we Live in. The writer is on his way to the greenroom of a London theatre.

"Saluting with profound respect a group of gentlemen with pallid and rather sallow faces, in whom we thought we saw kings, ghosts, bandits, conspirators, and what not, in undress, we entered the house. Groping our way through a series of dark, labyrinthine passages, sprinkled with sawdust, and draped with festoons of cobwebs, fancifully disposed, we came at length upon a strange, portentous vault, fitted with racks, wheels, pulleys, hawsers, and divers instruments of torture. 'Surely,' thought we, 'these are the Tartarean shades of the theatre, which ghosts, dramatic and melo-dramatic, sprites, bottle and other imps, are condemned to inhabit.' While pondering upon the uses of the intricate machinery, an ethereal being, clothed in white, who, we were informed, represented an attendant spirit, entered, engaged in conversation with a gnome in a blue pasteboard head-piece, with saucer eyes, who was engaged busily in eating bread and cheese, with radishes, of which the attendant spirit readily partook. Going up stairs, we were detained by a violent altercation between Jupiter, who was gorgeously dressed with a magnificent gilt-paper crown and gems of real paste, and one of the carpenters, charged with having fastened a bunch of shavings to the Thunderer's rear, thereby exposing the majesty of Olympus to the mockery of vulgar mortals. The culprit, to our unfeigned horror, addressed the father of the gods in a most irreverent manner, inviting him to proceed immediately to a certain place which we had till now understood was tenanted, not by the gods, but by gentlemen of the opposite benches! At the top of the stair stood Mercury, his caduceus in one hand, and a pot of porter in the other. We have heard of "—— the herald Mercury, Now lighted on a heaven-kissing hill;"

but Mercury with a pot of porter was a novelty. Endeavoring to pass between the messenger of Jove and the wall, we happened to strike against the thunder, a thin plate of sheet iron hanging to a nail in the wall, emitting at our touch an awful sound; close by, an imp was grinding a white substance, which we were told was powdered lightning. Passing towards the flat, by which you are to understand the scene crossing the middle of the stage, those at either side being termed wings, a carpenter tapped our shoulder, expressing his pleasure at our arrival, and intimating his readiness to accept the customary 'footing,' as he called it, of a gallon of beer."

944. DEALING WITH A SINGER.

The original Zerlina of the opera was Signora Bondini, daughter of the manager. In rehearsing that part of the finale of the first act where she is seized by Don Giovanni, there was some difficulty in getting her to scream in the right manner and place. It was tried repeatedly, and failed. At length, Mozart, desiring the orchestra to repeat the piece, went quietly on the stage, and, awaiting the time that she was to make the exclamation, grasped her so suddenly and so forcibly, that, really alarmed, she shrieked out in good earnest. He was now content.

"That's the way," said he, praising her; "you must cry out just in that manner."

945. RICHMOND PLAYED BY KING.

When Charles Kean was playing Richard, a Mr. King played Richmond; the audience did not like him, and so hissed every night. Bunn remarked that he had Shakspeare's authority for putting him in the part, —

"Henry the Sixth Did prophesy that Richmond should be King."

946. BOYS MAKING BILLOWS.

In a certain theatre there were sixty boys, who stood on the stage under a very large canvas, painted to represent the sea. Now, these boys were placed alternately, and were to rise and fall, first gradually, and then violently, to represent the motion of the waves in a storm; and in the first three nights of the piece it had a powerful effect; but, after that, the manager reduced the water rate, that is to say, he lowered the salary of each wave to sixpence per night. The boys took their places under the canvas sea; and when the prompter gave the signal for the storm, the water was stagnant: instead of the ship striking, it was the waves that struck. The sub-manager, in a fury, inquired the cause, when the principal billow said, "We won't move a peg unless you pay us a shilling a night, for it wears out our corduroys so."

947. THE MANAGER'S APOLOGY.

On the last night of Kean's performance, previous to his departure for America, Richard was the play, Elliston acting Richmond. Before the fifth act, both were in a state almost as bad as that of Clarence in his butt of malmsey. Elliston, as he was going on in the last scene, said, "Bring me a battle-axe." "Here's your sword, sir; you don't want a battle-axe." Elliston was peremptory, and the battle-axe was brought, with which he rushed on the stage, and struck at Kean in a style by no means consistent with the laws of chivalry. The blow brought them both to the ground, where the contest was very unceremoniously continued, the manager vociferating, "You shan't go to America — I'll give you fifty pounds a night," and the other, more weakened with previous exertion, responding at intervals, "Don't be a fool!" The audience hissed from every part of the theatre, when Elliston, suddenly recovering himself, rose, staggered to the front of the stage, assumed his usual attitude, glanced round the house, and, as if nothing at all had happened, proceeded to address the audience, now silently awaiting the apology. This was the speech: "Ladies and gentlemen, as proprietor of this magnificent establishment, I have the honor to announce to you that it is my intention to appropriate the entire receipts of to-morrow evening's entertainments in aid of the widows and orphans of the gallant sufferers at Waterloo."

Of course, nobody heard a word about Waterloo and its widows, the next morning; but the audience went away in raptures with his generosity.

948. THE "MAKING UP" OF AN ACTRESS.

An amusing theatrical case was decided in the city of Paris. The manager of a royal theatre was summoned by an actress, who prayed that he might be ordered to put up two gas burners in her dressing-room.

"I cannot do without two lights," exclaimed the fair one, who was her own counsel; "I must have one on each side of the glass before which I make my arrangements for the stage. There is only one at present, so that I can only see the effect on a single side, and this subjects me to all manner of annoyances. Sometimes I have one cheek too pale, while the other is too red; at others, the left eyebrow is darker than the right; then I have one shoulder whiter than the other; I make myself twenty years old on one side, and thirty on the other; on the right I look like a boarding-school miss, while I am a finished coquette on the other cheek. This is insufferable."

The court ordered the manager to supply the nymph with the two gas burners she petitioned for.

949. YANKEE THEATRICAL REVENGE.

At a small theatre in Vermont, the Forty Thieves was being performed to an audience of seven. The pit took offence at the miserable acting of a performer, and hissed him energetically; whereupon the manager brought his company of "thieves" on the stage, and out-hissed the visitors. Silence succeeding the hubbub, the manager held up a cowhide to the audience. Said he, "I have given to each of my thieves one of these."

The manager retired, and the drop curtain was lowered. In about five minutes it was drawn up, and the manager found, as he had expected, that the audience had all scampered.

§ 95. DRAWING.

950. A FOX'S SANG FROID.

N Cottle's reminiscences of Samuel Taylor Coleridge and Robert Southey is the following anecdote —

"When Charles Fox's house was on fire, he found all efforts to save it useless; and being a good draughtsman, he went up the next hill to make a drawing of the fire! — the best instance of philosophy of which I ever heard." Such a peculiar act of an artist may well be illustrated by his own art.

We know of no good reason why the virtue of heroism should be denied to artists more than to other men, nor why philosophy should be denied to a Fox. The anecdote, however, is a good one — too good to be lost, in a world where heroism, philosophy, and presence of mind are all rare virtues.

entered the kitchen, walked up stairs, where, as he expected, he found the gentleman quite alone and helpless. "I am sorry to see you in such a situation," said the rogue; "you cannot move, and the servant is out." The gentleman started. "It is excessively careless of you to leave yourself so exposed; for, behold the consequences! I take the liberty of removing this watch and seals off the table, and putting them into my own pocket, and as I perceive your keys are here, I shall unlock these drawers, and see what suits my purpose." "Pray, help yourself," replied the gentleman, who was aware that he could do nothing to prevent him. The rogue did so accordingly: he found the plate in the sideboard, and many other things that suited him; and in ten minutes, having made up his bundle, he made the gentleman a low bow and decamped. But the gentleman had the use of his hands, and had not been idle; he had taken an exact likeness of the thief with his pencil; and, on his servant's returning, soon after, he despatched him immediately to Bow Street, with the drawing and an account of what had happened. The likeness was so good, that the man was immediately identified by the runners, and was captured before he had time to dispose of a single article. He was brought to the gentleman two hours afterwards, identified, the property found on him sworn to, and in six weeks was on his way to Botany Bay.

951. A ROGUE OUTWITTED.

A curious incident occurred some time back, in which a rascal was completely outwitted. A bachelor gentleman, who was a very superior draughtsman and caricaturist, was laid up in his apartments with the gout in both feet. He could not move, but sat in an easy-chair, and was wheeled in and out of his chair to the sitting-room. A well-known vagabond, ascertaining the fact, watched till the servant was sent upon a message. The area door communicating with the kitchen, down went the vagabond, 952. HOGARTH AND BISHOP HOADLY.

Upon pulling down the bishop's palace at Chelsea, many years ago, a singular discovery was made. In a small room, near the north front, were found, on the plaster of the walls, nine figures as large as life, three men and six women, drawn in outline, with black chalk, in a bold and animated style. Of these correct copies have been published. They display much of the manner of Hogarth, who, it is well known, lived on intimate terms with Bishop Hoadly, and frequently visited his lordship at this palace; and it is supposed that these figures apply to some incident in the bishop's family, or to some scene in a play. His lordship's partiality for the drama is well known. His brother, who resided in Chelsea, at Cremorne House, wrote one of the best comedies in the English language.

953. STATE OF THE FINE ARTS IN GENEVA.

M. Decandolle, professor of botany at Geneva, but whose reputation is European, made use, in a course of lectures, of a very valuable collection of drawings of American plants, intrusted to him by a celebrated Spanish botanist, who, having occasion for this collection sooner than was expected, sent to have it returned. M. Decandolle having communicated the circumstances to his audience, with the expression of his regrets, some ladies, who attended the lectures, offered to copy, with the aid of their friends, the whole collection in a week, and the task was actually performed. The drawings, eight hundred and sixty in number, and filling thirteen folio volumes, were executed by one hundred and fourteen female artists; one of the ladies, indeed, did forty of them. In most cases, the principal parts only of each plant are colored, the rest only traced with accuracy. The execution in general was very good, and in some instances quite masterly. There is not, perhaps, another town of twenty-three thousand souls, where such a number of female artists, the greater part, of course, amateurs, could be found. Notwithstanding the wide dispersion of the drawings, there were not any lost; and one of them, having been accidentally dropped into the street, and picked up by a girl ten years old, was returned to M. Decandolle, copied by the child, and is no disparagement to the collection. On another occasion, several drawings were carried to the same house, but they found artists able and willing to do their part. This taste for the arts, and for knowledge in general, is universal in Geneva.

954. ABBE MALOTRIO AND M. DE LASSON.

A Norman priest, who lived in the middle of the seventeenth century, named the Abbé Malotrio, was remarkably deformed in his figure, and ridiculous in his dress. One day, while he was performing mass, he observed a smile of contempt on the face of M. de Lasson, which irritated him so much, that the moment the service was over, he instituted a process against him. Lasson possessed the talent of caricature drawing; he sketched a figure of the ill-made priest, accoutred, as he used to be, in half a dozen black caps, over one another, nine waistcoats, and as many pairs of breeches. When the court before whom he was cited urged him to produce his defence, he suddenly produced his Abbé Molotrio, and the irresistible laughter which it occasioned insured his acquittal.

§ 96. DULNESS, JUVENILE.

955. LUDOVICO CARRACCI AND TINTORETTO.

What has been told of others happened to Ludovico Carracci, the great artist, in his youth; he struggled with a mind tardy in its conceptions, so that he gave no indications of talent, and was apparently so inept as to have been advised, by two masters, to be satisfied to grind the colors he ought not otherwise to meddle with.

Tintoretto, from friendship, exhorted him to change his trade. "This sluggishness of intellect did not proceed," observes the sagacious Lanzi, "from any deficiency, but from the depth of his penetrating mind."

956. DOMENICHINO, GOLDSMITH, FARQUHAR, AND OTHERS.

Domenichino, the great painter, was at first heavy and unpromising, and the young painters, to ridicule the persevering labors of Domenichino in his youth, honored him by the title of "the great ox;" and Passeri expresses his surprise at the accounts he received of the early life of this great artist. "It is difficult to believe," he says, "what many assert, that from the beginning this great painter had a ruggedness about him which entirely incapacitated him from learning his profession, and they have heard from himself that he quite despaired of success. Yet I cannot comprehend how such vivacious talents, with a mind so finely organized, and accompanied with such favorable dispositions for the art, would show such signs of utter incapacity. I rather think that is a mistake in the proper knowledge of genius, which some imagine indicates itself most decisively by its sudden vehemence, showing itself like lightning, and like lightning passing away."

Goldsmit passed through an unpromising youth; he declares that he was never attached to the belles-lettres till he was thirty, that poetry had no peculiar charms for him till that age, and indeed to his latest hour he was surprising his friends by productions which they had imagined he was incapable of composing.

Hume was considered, for his sobriety and assiduity, as competent to become a steady merchant.

Johnson, it was said, would never offend in conversation.

Of Boileau it was said, that he had no great understanding, but would speak ill of no one.

Farquhar at college was a heavy companion, and afterwards combined with great knowledge of the world a light, airy talent. Even a discerning parent or master has entirely failed to develop the genius of the youth who has afterwards ranked among eminent men; and we ought as little to infer from early unfavorable appearances as from inequality of talent.

The great Isaac Barrow's father used to say, that if it pleased God to take from him any of his children, he hoped it might be Isaac, as the least promising; and during the three years Barrow passed at the Charter-house, he was remarkable only for the utter negligence of his studies and his person.

The mother of Sheridan, herself a literary female, pronounced early that he was the dullest and most hopeless of her sons.

Bodmer, at the head of the literary class in Switzerland, who had so frequently discovered and animated the literary youths of his country, could never detect the latent genius of Gesner : after a repeated examination of the young man, he put his parents in despair with the hopeless award that a mind of so ordinary a cast must confine itself to mere writing and accounts.

957. WALTER SCOTT.

Walter Scott carried with him to school such knowledge as we may suppose a youth of seven years of age capable of acquiring from a father entirely devoted to his little favorite. In fact, he could read well, and had such a propensity for drawing that all his books were scribbled over with rude figures of men, houses, and trees, whenever he could get a pen or pencil. At this early age we may mark this fact as the dawning of this poetical genius : poetry and painting are as closely allied as music and love. This taste for drawing did not advance with his advancing years, though we have seen his sketch of the port of Loch Lomond, taken from the west side, in 1803, very well executed ; it is done on a blank leaf of Hector Macneill's poems, and is now in Captain Fullerton's possession. Like Milton, Swift, and other great geniuses, he was, as the latter said of himself, at school "very justly celebrated for his stupidity." Perhaps much of his stupidity was owing to he want of talent in his master, or rather his want of method in the art of teaching. Be that as it may, young Scott certainly did not shine in his early career as a scholar. He learnt to read, write, and attained a tolerable knowledge of mathematics. In Latin he did not advance far until his tenth year, when Dr. Paterson, a clergyman of the church of Scotland, succeeded to the school at Musselburgh, and he progress of young Scott became rapid. Dr. Blair, on a visit at Musselburgh shortly after Dr. Paterson took charge of the school, accompanied by some friends, examined several of the pupils ; he paid particular attention to young Scott. Mr. Paterson thought it was the youth's stupidity that occupied the doctor's mind, and said, "My predecessor tells me that boy has the thickest skull in the school." "May be so," replied Dr. Blair, "but enough that thick skull I can discern many bright rays of future genius."

958. AQUINAS, DRYDEN, AND OTHERS.

St. Thomas Aquinas exhibited little liveliness or genius in his youth, but he afterwards shone as a star of the first magnitude.

St. Augustine, as a lad, had no inclination for learning.

Dryden never wrote poetry until he was a man. Winckelman, the author of the History of Art, lived in ignorance and obscurity until the prime of his life, when he became eminent.

959. SHERIDAN.

Richard Brinsley Sheridan gave almost no promise, in his childhood, of those splendid talents by which he was afterwards distinguished. When about seven years of age, he was committed, along with his brother, to the care of Mr. Samuel Whyte, who with these two boys commenced an academy which afterwards became celebrated. When Mrs. Sheridan carried the boys to the house of Mr. Whyte, she took occasion to advert to the necessity of patience in the arduous profession which he had embraced ; adding, "These boys will be your tutors in that respect. I have hitherto been their only instructor, and they have sufficiently exercised mine ; for two such impenetrable dunces I never met with."

It was the illustrious Samuel Parr, who, when under twenty years of age, and an undermaster at Harrow School, first discovered the latent genius of Sheridan, and by judicious cultivation ripened it into maturity.

960. GOLDSMITH'S CHILDHOOD.

Oliver Goldsmith.

Oliver Goldsmith's education began when he was about three years old, that is to say, he was gathered under the wings of one of those good old motherly dames, found in every village, who cluck together the whole callow brood of the neighborhood, to teach them their letters and keep them out of harm's way. Mistress Elizabeth Delap — for that was her name — flourished in this capacity for upwards of fifty years ; and it was the pride and boast of her declining days, when nearly ninety years of age, that she was the first that had put a book (doubtless a hornbook) into Goldsmith's hands. Apparently he did not profit much by it, for she confessed he was one of the dullest boys she had ever dealt with, inasmuch that she had sometimes doubted whether it was possible to make anything of him ; a common case with imaginative children, who are apt to be beguiled from the dry abstractions of elementary study by the picturings of the fancy.

961. CLAVIUS.

There was once a boy put under the care of the Jesuits, who was noted for nothing but his stupidity. These teachers tried him abundantly, and could make nothing of him. How little did they think that the honor of having instructed him was to raise their order in view of the world ! At length one of the fathers tried him in geometry, which so suited his genius, that he became one of the first mathematicians of his age. This was Clavius, who died 1612, aged seventy-five.

§ 97. EDITING AND EDITORS.

962. THE TRIAL AND ACQUITTAL OF JOHN BOYLE.

One of the most remarkable personages in Cork, for a series of years, was a sharp-witted little fellow named John Boyle, who published a periodical called the Freeholder. As Boyle did not see that any peculiar dignity hedged the corporation of Cork, his Freeholder was remarkable for severe and satirical remarks upon its members, collectively and personally. Owing to the very great precautions as to the mode of publication, it was next to impossible for the corporation to proceed against him for libel: if they could have done so, his punishment was certain; for in those days there were none but corporation juries, and the fact that Boyle was hostile to the municipal clique was quite enough for these worthy administrators of justice. It happened on the occasion of a crowded benefit, that Boyle and one of the sheriffs were coming out of the pit of the theatre at the same moment. A sudden crash drove the scribe against the sheriff, and the concussion was such that the latter had two of his ribs broken. There could be no doubt that the whole was accidental; but it was too lucky not to be taken advantage of. Mr. Boyle was prosecuted for assault. O'Connell (who was personally inimical to the corporation) scarcely cross examined a witness, and called none in defence. He proceeded to reply. After some hyperbolical compliments on the "well-known impartiality, independence, and justice of a Cork jury," he proceeded to address them thus:—

"I had no notion that the case is what it is; therefore I call no witnesses. As I have received a brief, and its accompaniment, a fee, I must address you. I am not in the vein for making a long speech; so, gentlemen, instead of it, I shall tell you a story. Some years ago, I went specially to Clonmell as-sizes, and accidentally witnessed a trial which I never shall forget. A wretched man, a native of that county, was charged with the murder of his neighbor. It seemed that an ancient feud existed between them. They had met at a fair, and exchanged blows: again that evening, they met at a low pot-house, and the bodily interference of friends alone prevented a fight between them. The prisoner was heard to vow vengeance against his rival. The wretched victim left the house, followed soon after by the prisoner, and was found next day on the roadside, murdered, and his face so barbarously beaten in by a stone, that he could only be identified by his dress. The facts were strong against the prisoner; in fact, it was the strongest case of circumstantial evidence I ever met with. As a form,—of his guilt there was no doubt,—the prisoner was called on for his defence. He called—to the surprise of every one—the murdered man. And the murdered man came forward. It seemed that another man had been murdered—that the identification by dress was vague, for all the peasantry of Tipperary wear the same description of clothes—that the presumed victim had got a hint that he would be arrested under the White Boy act—had fled, and only returned with a noble and Irish feeling of justice, when he found that his ancient foe was in jeopardy on his account. The case was clear; the prisoner was innocent. The judge told the jury that it was unnecessary to charge them. They requested permission to retire; they returned in about two hours, when the foreman, with a long face, handed him the verdict 'guilty.' Every one was astonished. 'Good God!' said the judge, 'of what is he guilty? Not of murder surely!' 'No, my lord,' said the foreman, 'but if he did not murder that man, sure he stole my gray mare three years ago.'"

The Cork jurors laughed heartily at this anecdote; ere the mirth had time to cool, O'Connell continued, with marked emphasis, "So, gentlemen of the jury, if Mr. Boyle did not wilfully assault the sheriff, he has libelled the corporation: find him guilty by all means!" The application was so severe, that the jury, shamed into justice, instantly acquitted Mr. Boyle.

963. EDITORS' MISFORTUNES.

During the eighteen years of Louis Philippe's reign, fifty-seven journals were obliged to discontinue publication. Their writers and contributors were sentenced, in the aggregate, to an imprisonment of 3141 years.

964. EDWARD MILLIGAN.

"By a note now before us," says the Athenæum, "we see, with sorrow, that a self-taught and very able man, Edward Milligan, is dead. When we tell our learned readers that he was the editor of the last, and best edition of Celsus, they will know how to estimate his loss; and, when we add, that twelve years ago he was a country shoemaker, and made shoes for the peasantry of the Scottish dales, they will feel that he could be no common person. Like Gifford and Bloomfield, he grew weary of the last and the awl; he then went to Edinburgh, attended the college, became an instructor in his turn, amassed some property, and was distinguished among the learned and polite. When last in London, we had the pleasure of his company; he was lively and entertaining, and, like most of his countrymen, knew a vast deal more than what belonged to his immediate duties. He was a native of the parish of Kirkbean, on the Solway Firth, and died in the fiftieth year of his age."

965. WHAT'S GOING ON?

One sunny morning, a quidnunc and a bore was sauntering down Regent Street, seeking whom he might devour with his interminable twaddle. At length he espies, approaching in hot haste, the witty and no less busy Douglass Jerrold. He stops and fastens on him. The quidnunc puts his usual question, "Well, my dear Jerrold, what's going on?" Relensing himself, the wit strides hastily away, exclaiming, "I am."

966. A SEVERE CUT.

A young would-be poet, with more pretensions than genius, happened to meet in a large party, one evening, an editor who had rejected a number of his contributions. The witling was exceedingly disposed to sneer and run the editor upon his sapient criticism, until at length the latter, in perfect good humor, cut him short with, "Look here, my fine spark, if you carry your joking much further upon me, I will take ample revenge by publishing one of your pieces of poetry, without altering or correcting it!" The shout of laughter that followed was terrific.

967. EDITORIAL PERPLEXITY.

During the dead season, the editor of a country paper, being much distressed for matter, ransacked every hole and corner for intelligence, and, after having, as he thought, completed his task, sat down to dinner with what appetite he might. In the middle of it he was interrupted by the entrance of his familiar, alias "the devil," demanding "more copy." "The vexing fellow! More copy!" said he. "Why, have you put in the story of the tremendous mushroom found in Mr. Jones's field?" "Yes, sir." "And the account of the prodigious crop of apples gathered from Mr. Timms's tree?" "Yes, sir." "And about Mr. Thompson's kitten being suckled by a hedgehog?" "Yes, sir." "And Mr. Smith's dreadful accident with his one-horse chaise as he passed down Holborn Hill?" "Yes, sir." "About the men who stole the corn out of the stacks in the farm-yard?" "Yes, sir, it is all up, but there is still a line and a half wanting." "Then add," said he, with the utmost dignity, "that they most audaciously took and threshed it out on the premises!"

968. EDITORIAL PERTINACITY.

The following dialogue once occurred in an editor's sanctum in England. A distinguished editor was in his study. A long, thin, and ghostly visaged gentleman was announced. With an asthmatic voice, but in a tone of civility, — for otherwise the editor would have transfixed him with a fiery paragraph the next morning, — the stranger said, —

"Sir, your journal of yesterday contained false information."

"Impossible, sir. But tell me to what you allude."

"You said that Mr. M. had been tried."

"True."

"Condemned."

"Very true."

"Hung."

"Most true."

"Now, sir, I am the gentleman himself."

"Impossible."

"I assure you it is a fact; and now I hope that you will contradict what you have alleged."

"By no means, sir."

"Now, what do you mean? You are deranged."

"I may be so, sir, but I will not do it."

"I will complain to a magistrate."

"As you please; but I never retract. The most that I can do for you, is to announce that the rope broke, and that you are now in perfect health. I have my principles, sir; I never deceive."

969. SIBBALD, EDITOR OF CHRONICLES OF SCOTTISH POETRY.

Mr. James Sibbald, editor of the Chronicles of Scottish Poetry, was a man of eccentricity and humor. For three or four years he resided in London, without ever letting his Scotch friends know any thing of his proceedings, or even where he lived. At last, his brother, a Leith merchant, found means to get a letter conveyed to him, the object of which was to inquire into his circumstances, and to ask where he resided. Sibbald sent the following laconic reply: —

"Dear Brother:

"I live in So-ho, and my business is so-so.

"Yours,

"JAMES SIBBALD."

970. AN EDITOR'S CUNNING.

When the John Bull newspaper was first issued, many gentlemen felt offended with the freedom of its remarks. A gallant colonel, a near relation of an illustrious house, taking amiss some freedom of the editor, determined to curb his wit by a smart application of the horsewhip. Well, the colonel, full of martial fury, walked himself off to the John Bull office, in Fleet Street, burning with revenge. grasping in his right hand the riding-master's whip of the regiment. Intimating his wish to see the editor, he was politely shown into a room, and informed that the editor would wait on him instantly. Like a chafed lion he walked up and down the room during the interval, flourishing his weapon of vengeance; when the door opened, and in marched an individual of the Brobdingnag species, clad in a thick white fuzzy great-coat, his chin buried in a red cotton handkerchief, with a broad oil-skin hat upon his head, and a most suspicious looking oak stick under his arm. "What might you want with me, sir?" asked this engaging-looking individual. "I wished to see the editor." "I am the editor, sir, at your service," said the Brobdingnag, taking from his vest his stick of about the thickness and size of a clothes prop. "Indeed!" ejaculated the colonel, edging away towards the door; "O, another time." "Whenever you please, sir." And the parties separated.

971. BENJAMIN RUSSELL.

The worthy editor of the Columbian Centinel was always a model of enterprise and industry. For years after the publication of that paper, he not only acted as the sole editor and reporter, but also worked considerably at case, in setting type, and performed a goodly share of the press work. It is related of him, that once having published an article which was considered personal, and highly offensive, by a certain individual of high standing in the community, the aggrieved person visited the unfortunate printer, armed with a cowskin, and fully determined to give him a sound threshing. According to the custom of the time, he was arrayed in white kerseymere small clothes, white silk stockings, and white vest. Mr. Russell was at the time busily engaged, with his coat off and shirt sleeves rolled up, in handling the press balls for distributing ink — rollers were not known in those days — and his astonishment may be easily imagined when he saw a well-dressed gentleman enter the office abruptly, in a towering passion, and aim a blow at him with a cowskin.

The printer fronted his antagonist, and very naturally made a pass at him with his press balls, which took effect, one on his snowy vest, the other on his left cheek and forehead. Another blow with the cowskin — another thrust with the balls — which served admirably well the purpose of both sword and shield. In a few minutes the advocate of Lynch law, who, when he entered the office, looked as neat and trim as if he had just been taken from a band-box, was covered with ink—printer's ink—black and oily from head to foot—his hat was knocked off in the mêlée, his gay costume was transformed into a suit of mourning, and his face was as black and glossy as a native citizen of Tombuctoo. He soon found he was playing a losing game, and beat a retreat, followed by the printer, who had now got his hand in, and gave his assailant a last furious push between the shoulders, as he sprang into the street, mentally resolving never again to molest a printer when engaged in his calling.

972. DIGNITY OF THE PRESS.

"Some of our contemporaries," says the Columbian, of Cincinnati, "are just finding out that a work advertised by a publisher in Boston, and a stereotyped puff of which has appeared in almost every paper in the Union, is an imposture, and with great seeming indignation exposing the fraud and cautioning the public against being gulled by it.

"It is a great pity that they had not made the discovery earlier, thus not only saving their own credit, but the dear people's money. The puff alluded to was published as editorial in almost every paper with which we exchange; in many of the leading literary papers appearing prominently among their book notices, or otherwise conspicuously displayed.

"Now, our object in noticing the affair at all is not to join in the hue and cry against the poor publisher, for we are not of those who aided to give the production its notoriety, but simply to condemn the newspaper press for debasing itself by the insertion of any thing in the shape of a literary notice, or patent medicine puff, and giving it the editorial sanction without examination into the merits of the article, and simply because it is accompanied by a dollar note or two.

"The whole system of throwing open the editorial columns of a public print to any one disposed to employ them at ten or twenty cents a line is a disgrace to the American newspaper press, and we hope the present exposition may have some effect in correcting the evil.

"The system of praising books and other articles beyond their merit, or when ignorant of their merits, for money, is a most censurable one, and calculated to bring the press into well-merited contempt."

"For our own part," says the Saturday Evening Post, "we look upon the offers of advertisers to pay us for commending articles of which we know nothing, or for praising them beyond their due merits, as so many insults. Our advertising columns are open to all advertisements not of an immoral character, but our editorial columns are our own, and we speak in them only what we know or believe to be true."

973. FLOGGING AN EDITOR.

Some years ago, a populous town, located towards the interior of Mississippi, was infested by a gang of blacklegs, who amused themselves at times, when they could find nobody else to pluck, by preying upon each other. A new importation of these sporting gentry excited some alarm among the inhabitants lest they should be completely overrun: they determined, therefore, on their expulsion. A poor wretch of a country editor, who was expected, by virtue of his vocation, to take upon himself all the responsibilities from which others might choose to shrink, was peremptorily called upon by his "patrons"—that is, those who paid him two dollars a year for his paper, and therefore presumed they owned him, soul and body—to make an effort towards the extermination of the enemy. The unfortunate editor, like most editors, being gifted with just about as much brains as money,—skull and purse both empty,—said at once that he would indite a "flasher," one that would undoubtedly drive the obnoxious vermin into some more hospitable region. And when his paper appeared, it was a "flasher" sure enough. In the course of his observations he gave the initials of several of the fraternity, whom he desired to leave town as speedily as possible, if they had the slightest desire to save their bacon.

The next morning, while the poor scribe was comfortably seated in his office, listlessly fumbling over a meagre parcel of exchanges, he heard footsteps on the stairs; and presently an individual, having accomplished the ascent, made his appearance. His first salutation was slightly abrupt.

"Where is the editor of this dirty, lying paper?"

Now, aside from the rudeness of this opening interrogatory, there were other considerations that induced the editor to believe there was trouble on foot. The personage who addressed him bore a cowhide in his hand, and, moreover, seemed to be exceedingly enraged. This was not all; he recognized in him a distinguished leader of the sporting fraternity, with whose cognomen he had taken very irreverent liberties. It was without the slightest hesitation, therefore, that he replied to the introductory query,—

"I don't know."

"Do you belong to the concern?"

"No, indeed, but I presume the editor will soon be"

"Well," said the visitor, "I will wait for him." And suiting the action to the word, he composedly took a chair, picked up a paper, and commenced reading.

"If I meet him," said the frightened knight of the scissiors and quill, "I will tell him there is a gentleman here wishes to see him."

As he reached the foot of the stairs, in his hasty retreat, he was accosted by another person, who thus made himself known:—

"Can you tell me where I can find the sneaking rascal who has charge of this villanous sheet?" producing the last number of "Freedom's Echo and the Battle Axe of Liberty?"

"Yes," replied the editor, "he is up there in the office now, reading, with his back to the door."

"Thank you," exclaimed the stranger, as he bounced up stairs.

"I've got you, have I?" ejaculated he, as he made a grasp at his brother in iniquity and they came crashing to the floor together.

As the combatants, notwithstanding the similarity of their vocation, happened to be unacquainted with each other, a very pretty quarrel ensued. First one was at the top, then the other; blow followed blow, kick followed kick, and oath followed oath, until bruised, exhausted and bloody, with faces and features resembling Deaf Burke after a two hours' pugilistic encounter, there was by mutual consent a cessation of hostilities. As the warriors sat on the floor contemplating each other, the first comer found breath enough to ask,—

"Who are you? What did you attack me for?"

"You abused me in your paper, you scoundrel."

"Me! I'm not the editor. I came here to flog him myself!"

Mutual explanations and apologies ensued, and the two mistaken gentlemen retired to "bind up their wounds." As the story comes to us, the distinguished individual whose vocation it was to enlighten the world by the aid of that great engine, the public press, escaped scot free.

"We can beat this," says the Louisiana Traveller, "in the south. Two weeks ago, the famous Parson Howe, of the Mississippi Pine Knot, was in this city. On his return home, Mrs. Howe issued a number of the Pine Knot, remarkably racy and piquant, having acted in the capacity of editor, compositor, publisher, pressman, and carrier, with only the assistance of a young daughter, and a promising little typo, her son, eight years old. This is a wife worth bragging about."

974. LADY EDITORS.

"Mrs. C. H. J. Nichols," says the Vermont Register, "her husband being in ill health, is officiating as editress of the Brattleboro' Democrat. She wields the pen editorial with force, and at the same time attends to her domestic duties."

975. MEANS TAKEN TO SECURE A SITUATION.

In 1849, a man in New York, who wished to obtain office under the government, sent to the New York Courier and Enquirer a puff of himself, with a promise of fifty dollars in case he succeeded. The editors of the paper very properly published both puff and promise.

EDUCATION.

§ 98. DIFFICULTIES MASTERED.

976. WILLIAM POSTEL

William Postel, a celebrated French writer of the sixteenth century, was only eight years of age when he lost his father and mother, who died of the plague. Want and misery driving him from his native village, La Dolorie, at this early age he commenced the profession of schoolmaster in the village of Pontoise. Here he continued until his fourteenth year; when, fired with a passion for letters, which neither thirst, hunger, nor fatigue could subdue, he collected the little money he had been able to save, and set out for Paris in the pursuit of knowledge. On his arrival in the capital, he almost wished himself back in the circle of the rustics he had deserted, whom he now looked upon as the happiest people upon earth. He could read nothing but avarice, dissipation, and hypocrisy, in every countenance he met. Young as he was, however, he knew that he would be laughed at if he returned, by those who deemed themselves wiser than others, because they happened to be more fortunate in the enjoyment of the good things of this life. He was resolved, at all events, that the malice and pride of that sordid race of beings should not be gratified at his expense. He hired a garret, and as every day made his little less, he passed his moments in digesting plans to recruit the consumption of his slender purse. One morning, when he thought he had hit on one that would immediately snatch him from the jaws of despair, he started in a transport of pleasure out of bed; but this transport was of momentary duration; for, alas! some unrelenting thief had stolen his clothes, and all the money he possessed along with them. He was going to throw himself out of the window; but an early sense of religion arrested the impulse of the moment, and admonished him, that, if deserted by man, he was not deserted by Heaven. He sank into his wretched bed. The sudden transition from the bright hope he had indulged, to the most dreadful misfortune and disappointment, brought on a dysentery, and he was obliged to be conveyed to the hospital, where he remained two years before he recovered his strength. As soon as he was able to walk, he quitted Paris. Poverty, which chased him full in view, drove him to the necessity of gleaning during the harvest time in Beauvais. His industry furnished him with the means of purchasing a plain suit of clothes, and he hastened back to Paris. He now became a servitor in one of the colleges of the university; and so rapid was his progress, that he had soon acquired almost universal knowledge. Francis I., touched with hearing that so much merit was struggling with indigence, sent him to the East, whence he brought many valuable manuscripts; and on his return he was rewarded with the chair of professor of mathematics and languages, with several other considerable appointments.

977. SKETCH OF HORNE.

Bishop Horne, when a student, was very desirous of purchasing the Hebrew Concordance of Marius de Calasio; but, not knowing how to purchase it out of his allowance, or to ask his father, in plain terms, to make him a present of it, he told him the following story, and left the moral of it to speak for itself:—

In the last age, when Bishop Walton's Polyglot was first published, there was at Cambridge a Mr. Edwards, passionately fond of Oriental learning, who afterwards went by the name of Rabbi Edwards. He was a good man, and a scholar; but, being rather young in the university, and not very rich, Walton's great work was far above his pocket. Nevertheless, not being able to sleep well without it, he sold his bed and some of his furniture, and made the purchase; in consequence of which he was obliged to sleep in a large chest, originally made to hold his clothes. But getting into his chest one night, rather incautiously, the lid of it, which had a bolt with a spring, fell down upon him, and locked him in, past recovery; and there he lay well nigh smothered to death. In the morning, Edwards, who was always an exact man, not appearing, it was wondered what had become of him; till, at last, his bedmaker, or the person who in better times, had been his bedmaker, being alarmed, went to his chambers in time to release him; and, the accident getting air, came to the ears of his friends, who soon redeemed his bed for him.

This story Mr. Horne told his father, and it had the desired effect. His father sent him the money, for which he returned him abundant thanks, promising to repay him in the only possible way, viz. that of using the books to the best advantage. They were, without question, diligently turned over while he worked at his Commentary on the Psalms and yielded him no small assistance.

978. SAMUEL LEE.

The early life of Professor Lee will be read by the young with interest. The following account is abridged from a statement furnished by himself:—

He received the first rudiments of learning at a charity school, at Longnor, in Shropshire, where he was born. Here he remained till he was twelve years old, when he was placed apprentice to a carpenter and joiner, in which situation he endured great hardships.

About the age of seventeen he formed a determination to learn the Latin language, to which he was instigated by the following circumstances:—

He had been in the habit of reading such books as happened to be in the house where he lodged but, meeting with Latin quotations, he found himself unable to comprehend them. Being employed about this time in the building of a Roman Catholic chapel for Sir Edward Smith, of Actonburnel, where he saw many Latin books, and frequently heard that language read, his resolution was confirmed. He immediately bought Ruddiman's Latin Grammar, at a book stall, and learned it by heart throughout. He next purchased Corderius's Colloquies, by Logan, which he found a very great assistance to him, and afterwards obtained Entick's Latin Dictionary; also, soon after, Beza's Testament, and Clarke's Exercises. There was one circumstance, however, which, as it had some effect on his progress, we shall mention in this place. He one day asked a priest, who came frequently to them, to give him some information of which he was then in want, who replied, that charity began at home. This was very mortifying, but it only served as a stimulus to his endeavors; for, from this time, he resolved, if possible, to excel even the priest. There was another evil, however, more powerful in opposing him, and that was poverty. He had at that time but six shillings a week to subsist on, and to pay the expenses of washing and lodging; out of this small sum he spared something to gratify his desire for learning, though it was not done without curtailing himself of proper support. His wages were, however, soon after raised one shilling a week, and the next year a shilling more; during which time he read the Latin Bible, Florus, some of Cicero's Orations, Cæsar's Commentaries, Justin, Sallust, Virgil, Horace's Odes, and Ovid's Epistles. He never had all these books at once, but generally read one, and sold it; the price of which, with a little added to it, enabled him to buy another, and this, being read, was sold to procure the next.

He was now out of his apprenticeship, and determined to learn Greek. He bought, therefore, a Westminster Greek Grammar, and soon afterwards procured a Greek Testament, which he found not very difficult, with the assistance of Schrevelius's Lexicon. He bought next Huntingford's Greek Exercises, which he wrote throughout; and then, in pursuance of the advice laid down in the Exercises, read Xenophon's Cyropædia, and soon after Plato's Dialogues, some part of the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer, Pythagoras's Golden Verses, with the Commentary of Hierocles, Lucian's Dialogues of the Dead, and some of the Poetæ Minores, with the Antigone of Sophocles.

He now thought he might attempt the Hebrew, and accordingly procured Bythner's Grammar, with his Lyra Prophetica; and soon after obtained a Psalter, which he read by the help of the Lyra. He next purchased Buxtorf's Grammar and Lexicon, with a Hebrew Bible; and now he seemed to be drawing fast towards the summit of his wishes, but was far from being uninterrupted in these pursuits. A frequent inflammation in his eyes, with every possible discouragement from those about him, were certainly powerful opponents; but habit, and a fixed determination to proceed, had now made study his greatest happiness; and he every day returned to it as a source of rest from manual labor; and though he felt many privations in consequence, it amply repaid him in that solitary satisfaction, which none but a mind actuated as his was could feel. Chance had thrown in his way the Targum of Onkelos; and he had a Chaldaic Grammar in Bythner's Lyra, with the assistance of which, and of Schindler's Lexicon, he soon read it. He next proceeded to the Syriac, and read some of Gutbir's Testament, by the help of Otho's Synopsis and Schindler's Lexicon. He had also occasionally looked over the Samaritan; but as the Samaritan Pentateuch differs little from the Hebrew, except in a change of letter, he found no difficulty in reading it in quotations, wherever he found it; and only in quotations could he read it, as books in that language were then entirely out of his reach.

After many difficulties and changes, he became a schoolmaster, and was ultimately called to fill the very important station he now (1839) occupies in the University of Cambridge, (England.)

979. CHIEF JUSTICE SAUNDERS.

Roger North gives the following curious account of Sir Edmund Saunders, chief justice of the King's Bench: "His character and beginning were equally strange. He was at first no better than a poor beggar boy, if not a parish foundling, without known parents or relations. He had found a way to live by obsequiousness, in Clement's Inn, as I remember, and courting the attorney's clerks for scraps. The extraordinary observance and diligence of the boy made the society willing to do him good. He appeared very ambitious to learn to write; and one of the attorneys got a board knocked up at a window on the top of a staircase, and that was his desk, where he sat and wrote after copies of court and other hands the clerks gave him. He made himself so expert a writer that he took in business, and earned some pence by hackney writing. And thus, by degrees, he pushed his faculties, and fell to forms, and, by books that were lent him, became an exquisite entering clerk, and, by the same course of improvement of himself, an able counsel, first in special pleading, and then at large. And after he was called to the bar, he had practice in the King's Bench Court equal with any there."

980. ALEXANDER MURRAY.

Alexander Murray was born in the parish of Minnigaff, in the shire of Kirkcudbright, Scotland, on the 22d of October, 1775. His father was at this time nearly seventy years of age, and had been a shepherd all his life, as his own father, and probably his ancestors for many generations, had also been. It was from his father that Alexander received his first lessons in reading. This was in his sixth year, and he gives an amusing account of the process. The old man, he tells us, bought him a catechism, which in Scotland is generally printed with a copy of the alphabet, in a large type, prefixed; but "as it was too good a book," he proceeds, "for me to handle at all times, it was generally locked up; and he, throughout the winter, drew the figures of the letters to me in his written hand, on the board of an old wool card, with the black end of an extinguished heather stem, or root snatched from the fire. I soon learned all the alphabet in this form, and became a writer as well as reader. I wrought with the board and brand continually. Then the catechism was presented, and in a month or two I could read the easiest parts of it. I daily amused myself with copying, as above, the printed letters. In May, 1782, he gave me a small psalm-book, for which I totally abandoned the catechism, which I did not like, and which I tore into two pieces, and concealed in a hole of a dike. I soon got many psalms by memory, and longed for a new book. Here difficulties arose. The Bible used every night in the family I was not permitted to open or touch. The rest of the books were put up in chests. I at length got a New Testament, and read the historical parts with great curiosity and ardor. But I longed to read the Bible, which seemed to me a much more pleasant book; and I actually went to where I knew an old, loose-leaved Bible lay, and carried it away in piecemeal. I perfectly remember the strange pleasure I felt in reading the histories of Abraham and David. I liked mournful narratives, and greatly admired Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Lamentations. I pored on these pieces of the Bible in secret for many months, but I durst not show them openly; and as I read them constantly, and remembered them well, I soon astonished all our honest neighbors with the large passages of Scripture I repeated before them. I have forgotten too much of my biblical knowledge, but I can still rehearse all the names of the patriarchs, from Adam to Christ, and various other narratives seldom committed to memory."

981. EXAMPLE OF LITERARY SUCCESS.

The literary career of Rev. Edward Hitchcock, LL. D., the distinguished president of Amherst College, like that of his venerable predecessor, affords an illustrious, though entirely unassuming example to all young men, without property, aspiring to usefulness. As the result of quiet, persevering effort, without the advantage of a college course, he has, in his varied spheres of professional duty, shown himself eminent in every department of literature and science, as well as theology; has been awarded the highest honors of Harvard and Yale; and for his publications has frequently received the grateful testimony of the learned in other countries, as well as our own. The example of such men is the common property of the human family, the appropriate "light of the world," not, surely, from a false delicacy, to be "put under a bushel," or reserved for posterity, but to be distinctly held forth, for enlightening and quickening the selfish and indolent, and stimulating the wise to become still wiser and better. Did the youth of our land generally know and feel their power, their privilege, their duty, instead of here and there one such rising above the mass, and adorning his age, we should soon see many thousands steadily aiming at the same elevation of character, daily enlarging their sphere of knowledge, enjoyment, and usefulness, blessing their country, and becoming, in the best sense, in every profession, "princes in all the world."

982. SKETCH OF WINCKELMANN.

The celebrated Winckelmann, one of the most distinguished writers on classic antiquities and the fine arts that modern times have produced, was the son of a shoemaker. His father, after vainly endeavoring for some time, at the expense of many sacrifices, to give him a learned education, was at last obliged, from age and ill health, to retire to a hospital, where he was, in turn, supported for several years, in part by the hard labors of his son, who, aided by the kindness of his professors, contrived to keep himself at college, chiefly by teaching some of his younger or less advanced fellow-students.

983. A NOBLE EXAMPLE.

Many years ago, in an obscure country school in Massachusetts, a humble, conscientious boy was to be seen; and it was evident to all that his soul was beginning to act and thirst for some intellectual good. He was alive to knowledge. Next we see him put forth on foot to settle in a remote town in this state, and pursue his fortunes there as a shoemaker, his tools being carefully sent on before him. In a short time, he is busied in the post of county surveyor for Litchfield county, being the most accomplished mathematician in that section of the state. Before he is twenty-five years old, we find him supplying the astronomical matter of an almanac, published in New York. Next he is admitted to the bar, a self-fitted lawyer. Now he is found on the bench of the Superior Court. Next he becomes a member of the Continental Congress. Then he is a member of the committee of six to frame the Declaration of Independence. He continued a member of Congress for nearly twenty years, and was acknowledged to be one of the most useful men and wisest counsellors of the land. At length, having discharged every office with a perfect ability, and honored in every sphere the name of a Christian, he dies regretted and loved by his state and nation. This man was Roger Sherman.

984. OLIVER EVANS.

Oliver Evans, "the Watt of America," was born in Newport, Delaware, some time in the year 1755 or 1756. Little is preserved of his early history. His parents were agriculturists of respectable standing, who gave their son the advantages common to people in their station. At the age of fourteen, Evans was apprenticed to a wheelwright or wagon-maker. An anecdote is preserved which displays in his character, even at this period, that ardent desire for knowledge, and that determination ever evinced not to let any obstacle interfere with the object of his pursuits. His master, an illiterate man, observing his apprentice employing his leisure evenings in study, through motives of parsimony forbade him using candles; but young Evans was not to be discouraged; for, collecting, at the close of each day, the shavings made from his work, he would take them to the chimney corner, and, by their uncertain light, pursue his evening studies.

§ 99. PARENTAL FAITHFULNESS.

985. HORACE, VITRUVIUS AND GIBBON.

If Horace was dear to his friends, he declares they owed him to his father,— “purus et insons

(Ut me collaudem) si vivo et curus amicis,
Causa fuit pater his.”—Lib. i. Sat. vi. v. 79.

“If pure and innocent, if dear (forgive
These little praises) to my friends I live,
My father was the cause.”—Francis.

This intelligent father, an obscure tax-gatherer, discovered the propensity of Horace's mind; for he removed the boy of genius from a rural seclusion to the metropolis, anxiously attending on him to his various masters.

Vitruvius pours forth a grateful prayer to the memory of his parents, who had instilled into his soul a love for literary and philosophical subjects.

The father of Gibbon urged him to literary distinction, and the dedication of the Essay on Literature to that father, connected with his subsequent labor, shows the force of the excitement.

986. MR. PHILLIPS.

Many years since, when the late Lieutenant Governor Phillips, of Andover, Massachusetts, was a student at Harvard College, owing to some boyish freak, he left the university, and went home. His father was a very grave man, of sound mind, strict judgment, and of few words. He inquired into the business, but deferred expressing any opinion until the next day. At breakfast he said, speaking to his wife, “My dear, have you any cloth in the house suitable to make Sam a frock and trousers?” She replied, “Yes.” “Well,” said the old gentleman, “follow me, my son.” Samuel kept pace with his father, as he leisurely walked near the common, and at length ventured to ask, “What are you going to do with me, father?” “I am going to bind you an apprentice to that blacksmith,” replied Mr. Phillips. “Take your choice, return to college, or you must work.” “I had rather return,” said the son. He did return, confessed his fault, was a good scholar, and became a respectable man. If all parents were like Mr. Phillips, the students at our colleges would prove better students, or the nation would have a plentiful supply of blacksmiths.

987. JOHN ADAMS.

John Adams, father of John Quincy Adams, says, “When I was a boy, I had to study the Latin grammar; but it was dull, and I hated it. My father was anxious to send me to college, and therefore I studied the grammar till I could bear it no longer; and going to my father, I told him I did not like study, and asked for some other employment. It was opposing his wishes, and he was quick in his answer. ‘Well, John,’ said he, ‘if Latin grammar does not suit you, you may try ditching; perhaps that will: my meadow yonder needs a ditch, and you may put by Latin, and dig.’ This seemed a delightful change, and to the meadow I went, but soon found ditching harder than Latin, and the first forenoon was the longest I ever experienced. That day I ate the bread of labor, and glad was I when night came on. That night I made some comparison between Latin grammar and ditching, but said not a word about it. I dug the next forenoon, and wanted to return to Latin at dinner, but it was humiliating, and I could not do it. At night, toil conquered pride, and I told my father—one of the severest trials of my life—that if he chose, I would go back to Latin grammar. He was glad of it, and if I have since gained any distinction, it has been owing to my two days’ labor in that abominable ditch.”

§ 100. EDUCATION NEGLECTED.

988. YOUTHFUL NEGLECT.

Walter Scott, in a narrative of his personal history, gives the following caution to youth:—

“If it should ever fall to the lot of youth to peruse these pages, let such readers remember that it is with the deepest regret that I recollect in my manhood the opportunities of learning which I neglected in my youth; that through every part of my literary career I have felt pinched and hampered by my own ignorance; and I would at this moment give half the reputation I have had the good fortune to acquire, if, by doing so, I could rest the remaining part upon a sound foundation of learning and science.”

989. LOUIS XIV.

Louis XIV, when, in his intercourse with the accomplished society of France, he felt his own deficiencies, often upbraided the foolish indulgence which had left his youth without instruction, exclaiming, “Was there not birch enough in the forest of Fontainebleau?”

101. HAPPY EFFECTS.

990. THE BISHOP AND THE BIRDS.

A bishop, who had for his arms two fieldfares, with the motto, "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing?" thus explains the matter to an intimate friend:—

"Fifty or sixty years ago, a little boy resided at the village near Dillingen, on the banks of the Danube. His parents were poor, and almost as soon as the boy could walk, he was sent into the woods to pick up some sticks for fuel. When he grew older, his father taught him to pick the juniper berries, and carry them to a neighboring distiller, who wanted them for making Hollands. Day by day the poor boy went to his task, and on his road he passed by the open windows of the village school, where he saw the schoolmaster teaching a number of boys, of about the same age as himself. He looked at these boys with feelings of envy, so earnestly did he long to be among them. He was quite aware it was in vain to ask his father to send him to school, for he knew that his parents had no money to pay the schoolmaster; and he often passed the whole day thinking, whilst he was gathering the juniper berries, what he could possibly do to please the schoolmaster, in the hope of getting some lessons. One day, when he was walking sadly along, he saw two of the boys belonging to the school trying to set a bird trap; and he asked one what it was for. The boy told him that the schoolmaster was very fond of fieldfares, and that they were setting the trap to catch some. This delighted the poor boy, for he recollected that he had often seen a great number of these birds in the juniper wood, where they came to eat the berries, and he had no doubt but he could catch some.

"The next day the little boy borrowed an old basket of his mother, and when he went to the wood he had the great delight to catch two fieldfares. He put them in the basket, and tying an old handkerchief over it, he took them to the schoolmaster's house. Just as he arrived at the door, he saw the two little boys who had been setting the trap, and with alarm he asked them if they had caught any birds. They answered in the negative; and the boy, his heart beating with joy, gained admittance into the schoolmaster's presence. In a few words he told how he had seen the boys setting the trap, and how he had caught the birds to bring them as a present to the master.

"A present, my good boy!" cried the schoolmaster; 'you do not look as if you could afford to make presents. Tell me your price, and I will pay it to you, and thank you besides.'

"I would rather give them to you, sir, if you please," said the boy.

"The schoolmaster looked at the boy, who stood before him with bare head and feet, and ragged trousers that reached only half way down his naked legs.

"You are a very singular boy," said he; 'but if you will not take money, you must tell me what I can do for you, as I cannot accept your present without doing something for it in return. Is there any thing I can do for you?'

"O, yes," said the boy, trembling with delight, 'you can do for me what I should like better than any thing else.'

"What is that?" asked the schoolmaster, smiling. "Teach me to read," cried the boy, falling on his knees. "O, dear, kind sir, teach me to read."

"The schoolmaster complied. The boy came to him at his leisure hours, and learned so rapidly that the schoolmaster recommended him to a nobleman residing in the neighborhood. This gentleman, who was as noble in mind as in birth, patronized the poor boy, and sent him to school at Katisbon. The boy profited by his opportunities; and when he rose, as he soon did, to wealth and honors, he adopted the two fieldfares as his arms.

"What do you mean?" cried the bishop's friend. "I mean," returned the bishop, with a smile, 'that the poor boy was myself!'

991. CURRAN'S EARLY LIFE.

Mr. Curran used thus to relate his first introduction into life: "I was then," he said, "a little ragged apprentice to every kind of idleness and mischief, all day studying whatever was eccentric in those older, and half the night practising it, for the amusement of those who were younger than myself. Heaven only knows where it would have ended. But, as my mother said, I was born to be a great man. One morning I was playing at marbles in the village ball alley, with a light heart and a lighter pocket. The gibe, and the jest, and the plunder went gayly round; those who won laughed, and those who lost cheated; when suddenly there appeared amongst us a stranger of a very venerable and very cheerful aspect. His intrusion was not the least restraint upon our merry little assemblage; on the contrary, he seemed pleased, and even delighted; he was a benevolent creature, and the days of infancy (after all, the happiest we shall ever see) perhaps rose upon his memory. God bless him! I see his fine form at the distance of half a century, just as he stood before me in the little ball alley, in the days of my childhood! His name was Boyse; he was the rector of Newmarket. To me he took a particular fancy. I was winning, and was full of waggers, thinking every thing that was eccentric, and by no means a miser of my eccentricities; every one was welcome to share them, and I had plenty to spare, after having freighted the company. Some sweetmeats easily bribed me home with him. I learned from poor Boyse my alphabet and my grammar, and the rudiments of the classics; he taught me all he could, and then he sent me to the school at Middleton: in short, he made a man of me. I recollect, it was about five and thirty years afterwards, when I had risen to some eminence at the bar, and when I had a seat in Parliament, and a good house in Ely Place, on my return one day from court, I found an old gentleman seated alone in the drawing-room, his feet familiarly placed on each side of the Italian marble chimney-piece, and his whole air bespeaking the consciousness of one quite at home. He turned round—it was my friend of the ball alley! I rushed instinctively into his arms. I could not help bursting into tears. Words cannot describe the scene which followed. 'You are right, sir; you are right; the chimney-piece is yours, the pictures are yours, the house is yours: you gave me all I have, my friend—my father!' He dined with me, and in the evening I caught the tear glistening in his fine blue eye, when he saw his poor Jacky, the creature of his bounty, rising in the House of Commons to reply to a right honorable. Poor Boyse! he is now gone! and no suitor had a larger deposit of practical benevolence in the court above."

992. THE LOG-ROLLER.

"That fellow had better staid and rolled logs a little longer," said a gentleman, as he saw one of our rough-looking Green Mountain boys approaching a literary institution. The remark produced a smile at the time; but I consoled myself by saying, let us "judge nothing before the time." The young man entered the institution, and was soon put to the task with his companions. What his particular history was there I pretend not to know, but I presume he proved himself worthy of his origin.

Two years had passed away, and the yearly examination had arrived. Passing into the large room where the classes were displayed, I found a large number of pupils assembled, with their blackboards suspended from the wall, and ready to proceed to the demonstration of the various knowledge which they had acquired. The class exhibited a high degree of animation; and a numerous and highly-respectable auditory witnessed with deep interest and repeated tokens of approbation the scene transpiring before them. "Who," said a gentleman that sat by, "is this teacher?" "Why," said I, "this is Mr. —, the young man of whom it was remarked, two years ago, that he had better have staid and rolled logs a little longer." Such indeed had been his proficiency, and such his ability not only to acquire but to impart knowledge, that he had been raised to the office of a teacher, and was then conducting his class with singular skill through some of the more difficult propositions in algebra.

Now, how many tough and hardy sons of our mountains are there detained at home to roll logs just because they are not considered capable of that mental cultivation which is necessary in order to preach the gospel! There are many sad mistakes in this matter. There are many young men in our churches who might be rendered useful in the ministry, if they were only encouraged to come forward. Let the churches see to it. The field is the world. The harvest is great. The laborers are few. That youth who is now rolling logs may yet thunder in the senate, or hold a world in rapture upon the theme of redeeming love.

§ 102. EDUCATORS AND THEIR PUPILS.

993. DR. PARR.

While Parr wielded the ferule, his invariable rule was, never to punish lads of stunted capacity, nor try to extort from mediocrity of talent treasures which nature had not been prodigal enough to bestow. No, the really talented he attacked; to those nature had been bountiful, and resolute Parr was to make her gifts be cultivated. There is a distinguished divine of the day, justly respected for his attainments and merits, who was mainly indebted to Parr's instruction for his celebrity. For some time after he entered the seminary, over which the great scholar ruled, the lad was classed as a "mediocre," and enjoyed in consequence the comparative amnesty extended to that grade. It happened, however, that one evening, after school hours, the head assistant called to acquaint Parr with the momentous discovery, from some recent observations, he was to conclude * * * was a lad of genius. "Say you so?" roared out Parr in one of his delighted chuckles, "then begin to flog to-morrow morning!" The distinctive birch was not forgotten. The eclipse of genius speedily wore off.

994. HUMOR.

Professor C—, of — College, says, "I once called upon a pupil for a recitation in logic, and asked a question. The nonplused student stammered and hemmed, and at last said, 'I have forgotten that part, sir.' Professor C. stroked his nose, as was habitual with him, and then replied, 'We forget that which we once knew.'"

At another time he had run a line down the side of an entire page of the composition of a student, whom we will call Williams. When the piece was examined, Williams said, "I didn't exactly understand the meaning of that line, but presume it was made because you found fault with the idea." "Iden!" answered the professor, dryly laughing, "there's no idea there, Williams."

On another occasion, a student had written his composition in blank verse. It was Professor C.'s custom to mark all mistakes, and criticize the piece when they had been corrected by the student. In this case, the composition was brought up, and the professor said, "Don't you know that you shouldn't begin every line with a capital letter?" "That is blank verse poetry," answered the student. "O, ho!" exclaimed the professor, with apparent surprise, "poetry! ah—I didn't notice that."

995. THE SECRET EXPLAINED.

Dr. Bushy was asked how he contrived to keep all his preferences, and the head mastership of Westminster school, through the successive but turbulent reigns of Charles I. Oliver Cromwell, Charles II., and James. He replied,—

"The fathers govern the nation, the mothers govern the fathers, the boys govern the mothers, and I govern the boys."

996. NO EXCUSE.

A few years since there was a professor at a neighboring college, with whom punctuality formed a part of his religion. Among other things, he was particular that every member of his class should be present at the recitation of every term; and if any were absent, he called upon their classmates to state, if they could, the cause thereof. It once happened that one of his pupils had died during the vacation, of which the old man was not aware; and noticing that his seat was vacant, when the class had assembled, he inquired after his whereabouts. Being a little deaf, he misunderstood the person who answered, "He is dead, sir," and proceeded with his customary remark:—

"Not a sufficient excuse, sir; and I am astonished that any student should render such a one in my recitation-room."

997. A NEW WAY TO PAY OLD DEBTS.

The master of the grammar school in a burgh in the central district of Scotland, about seventy years ago, was a worthy Trojan of the name of Hacket, a complete specimen of the threshing pedagogues of the last age. Modern ears would scarcely credit the traditional stories which are told of this man's severity, or believe that such merciless punishments could have been allowed to take place in a country so far civilized as ours then was. Heavy and repeated applications of a striped thong called the taws, to the open hands of delinquents, were matters of familiar occurrence. Skulks, as these were called, were nothing. But Hacket would also, twenty times a day, lay victims across the end of the table, and thresh as long as he could hold with the one hand, and lop on with the other. Horsing was one of his highest indulgences or luxuries, and he had an ingenious mode of torture peculiar to himself, by causing the boy to stride between two distant boards, while he endeavored to excite the thinking faculties by bringing a force to bear from behind. Thomas Lord Erskine, and his brother Henry, were brought up at this school, and remembered Hacket's severity through life, complaining particularly that it was all one whether you were a dull or a bright boy; for if the former, you were threshed for your own proper demerits; and if you were bright, you had a monitorial charge assigned to you over the rest, and suffered for all the shortcomings of your inferiors. We wonder at all this now; but the wonder is very superfluous. The whole system was based on a prevalent notion that severity to children was salutary and beneficial, nay, indispensable, and that, if you loved your son or your pupil, it was your first and most solemn duty towards him, to give him a sound chastising on all possible occasions. Flogging was simply one of the bigotries of our grandfathers.

Amongst Hacket's pupils was a boy who had come from a distance, and who boarded with a family in the town. His name for the present is Anderson. This youth, placed far from his friends, felt the ruthless severity of Hacket very bitterly, and, as he was by no means a genius, he was both well punished himself, and probably the cause of much punishment to others. Naturally of a reserved and reflecting character, he said little of his sufferings to any of his companions; but the stripes sunk into his very soul, and, secretly writhing under a sense of the injustice and indignity with which he was treated, he conceived the most deadly sentiments of revenge against his master. To get these executed in present circumstances was impossible; but he determined to take the first opportunity that occurred, and in the mean time to nurse his wrath, so that time should not interfere in favor of a tyrant, who seemed to him to deserve the utmost vengeance that could be inflicted.

Anderson, like many other Scottish youth, was drafted off at an early age to India, where he served for twenty-five years, during which he was not able to revisit his native shores. Having now attained a competency, and settled his affairs, he returned to Scotland, in order to spend there the remainder of his life. It will scarcely be believed that he still cherished his scheme of vengeance against Hacket; but the fact is, that he did so, and this indeed is what gives any value to the anecdote we are relating; it is curious only as a genuine instance of a feeling persevered in much beyond the term usually assigned to human passions. He came home; he journeyed to the town where he had been educated, and, establishing himself in the inn, sent a polite message to Hacket, (who was still in the vigor of life, though retired from active duty,) inviting him to dine that afternoon with a gentleman who had once been his pupil. All seemed now in train for a retributory visitation upon the epiderm of the old gentleman; and the reader may be trembling for the consequences of a revenge so much beyond the limit of all common resentments.

Old Hacket dressed himself that day in his best, — ruffles at the wrists, and silver buckles in his shoes, — expecting, from the appearance of the man servant who delivered the message, an entertainment of a recherché kind from one who, no doubt, felt a difficulty in expressing his gratitude for the unspeakable benefits of a sound flagellatory education. He was ushered into a room where he saw a table prepared for dinner. A gentleman presently entered, and, to his surprise, turned and deliberately locked the door, putting the key into his pocket. Then, taking down a whip from the mantel-piece, this gentleman came sternly up to the venerable schoolmaster, and asked if he had any recollection of him. "No," said the teacher. "Then, sir, I shall insure that you remember me forever after. Do you recollect a boy at your school, twenty-five years ago, of the name of Walter Anderson?" "I dare say I do." "Then, sir, I am that Walter Anderson. I have now come to punish you for the many unmerited threshings which you gave me at school. They were savage, sir, and only something of the same kind can expiate them. All the time I was in India, I never allowed this design to lie dormant for a moment, and now the time for its execution is come. Strip, sir, this moment, and let me do full justice upon you. Resistance is altogether in vain, for the people here are all in my pay. Entreaty is equally vain, for nothing on earth could induce me to let you escape."

Hacket, it may well be believed, was in a dreadful panic, for he saw that he was in the hands of a man not to be trifled with. He was, however, shrewd in human nature, and possessed plenty of presence of mind. "Well, well," said he, "this is a bad business; but I suppose it is true that I was rather severe long ago with my boys, and so I must submit. I see, however, that preparations have been made for dinner, and as I believe you to be a gentleman, I cannot suppose that you invited me here to that meal without intending to give it me. Now, if it is the same thing to you, I should much prefer having dinner first, and the licking afterwards. Come, shall it not be so?"

The man of vengeance was taken by surprise, assented, though inwardly resolving that nothing should in the long run balk him of his purpose. They sat down, and the dinner and wine proved excellent. Hacket began to talk of old times, and of other boys who had been fellow-pupils with his host; also of many sports and frolics in which Anderson, amongst others, had indulged. He told what he had learnt of the subsequent fortunes of many of these youths, and gradually engaged Anderson into a relation of his own history. The whole bearing of the old man was so cheerful, so sympathizing, and so entertaining, that Anderson, like the gloomy sultan, felt himself gradually dispossessed of the spirit which so long animated him. It became evidently an absurdity to think of lashing a neatly-dressed old gentleman, who seemed to be the very pink of good humor. Once or twice he spasmodically endeavored to reawaken the flagging emotions of destructiveness, but it would not do; another droll chatty story from the pedagogue stilled them down again at once. By and by he gave way entirely to the spirit of the hour, and ceased to think of his whip, or its intended performances.

Hackett got home that night in perfect safety, for Mr. Anderson insisted upon escorting him to his own door.

998. THE RULING PASSION.

We scarcely know of a more touching instance of "the ruling passion strong in death" than is afforded in the last words of a schoolmaster who had gone in and out before successive little flocks in the same place for upwards of thirty years. When the film of death was gathering over his eyes, which were soon to open in the presence of Him who took little children in his arms and blessed them, he said, — "It is getting dark—the boys may go out—school's dismissed!"

999. DR. JEGGON.

When Dr. Jeggon, afterwards Bishop of Norwich, was master of Benedict College, Cambridge, he punished all the under-graduates for some general offence; and because he disdained to convert the penalty money into private use, it was expended on new whitening the hall of the college. A scholar hung the following lines on the screen:—

"Dr. Jeggon, Bene't College master, Broke the scholars' heads, and gave the walls a plaster."

The doctor, perusing the paper, wrote underneath, ex tempore,—

"Knew I the wag that writes these lines in bravery, I'd commend him for his wit, but whip him for his knavery."

§ 103. MISCELLANEOUS,

1000. PILGRIM FATHERS.

Within ten years after our Pilgrim Fathers first stepped upon the rock at Plymouth, they made an appropriation, out of their scanty funds, for the establishment of a college, "Christo et ecclesie," (for Christ and the church.)

1001. EDUCATION TO BE ADAPTED TO THE INDIVIDUAL.

The great secret of education is to develop the faculties of the individual; for it may happen that his real talents may lie hidden and buried under his education. A decided character, however, is repugnant to a particular pursuit, delighting in another; talents, languid and vacillating in one profession, we might find vigorous and settled in another; an indifferent lawyer might be an admirable architect. At present all our human bullion is sent to be melted down in a university, to come out, as if thrown into a burning mould, a bright physician, a bright lawyer, a bright divine; in other words, to adapt themselves for a profession, preconceived by their parents. By this means we may secure a titular profession for our son; but the true genius of the avocation, the bent of the mind, as a man of great original powers called it, is too often absent. Instead of finding fit offices for fit men, we are perpetually discovering, on the stage of society, actors out of character.

A laughing philosopher, the Democritus of our day, once compared human life to a table pierced with a number of holes, each of which has a pin made exactly to fit it, but which pins being stuck in hastily, and without selection, chance leads inevitably to the most awkward mistakes. "For how often do we see," the orator pathetically concluded,—"how often, I say, do we see the round man stuck into the three-cornered hole!"

Tobie Matthews, Archbishop of York in James I.'s reign, met with a great disappointment in the disposition of his sons. The cause, indeed, is not uncommon, as was confirmed by another great man, to whom the archbishop confessed it. The old Lord Thomas Fairfax one day found the archbishop very melancholy, and inquired the reason of his grace's pensiveness. "My lord," said the archbishop, "I have great reason of sorrow with respect of my sons; one of whom has wit and no grace, another grace but no wit, and the third neither grace nor wit." "Your case," replied Lord Fairfax, "is not singular. I am also sadly disappointed in my sons: one I sent into the Netherlands to train him up a soldier, and he makes a tolerable country justice, but a mere coward at fighting; my next I sent to Cambridge, and he proves a good lawyer, but a mere dunce at divinity; and my youngest I sent to the Inns of Court, and he is good at divinity, but nobody at the law." The relater of this anecdote adds, "This I have often heard from the descendant of that honorable family, who yet seems to mince the matter because so immediately related."

1002. AIDS IN CHOOSING AN EMPLOYMENT.

The difficulty of discerning the aptitude of a youth for any particular destination in life will, perhaps, even for the most skillful parent, be always hazardous. Many will be inclined, in despair of anything better, to throw dice with fortune; or adopt the determination of the father who settled his son by a whimsical analogy which he appears to have formed of their dispositions or aptness for different pursuits. The boys were standing under a hedge in the rain, and a neighbor reported to the father the conversation he had overheard. John wished it would rain books, for he wished to be a preacher; Bezaleel, wool, to be a clothier, like his father; Samuel, money, to be a merchant; and Edmund, plums, to be a grocer. The father took these wishes as a hint; and we are told, in the Life of John Angier, the eldest son, a Puritan minister, that he chose for them these different callings, in which it appears that they settled successfully.

1003. EARLY INSTRUCTION.

Dr. Johnson was extremely adverse to the present foppish mode of educating children, so as to make them what foolish mothers call "elegant young men." He said to some lady who asked him what she should teach her son in early life, "Madam, to read, to write, to count; grammar, writing, and arithmetic; three things which, if not taught in early life, are seldom or never taught to any purpose, and without the knowledge of which no superstructure of learning or of knowledge can be built."

1004. "HE DIDN'T MEAN TO BE MEAN."

A writer in the Burlington Sentinel says that in one of the back towns of a neighboring state, where it is the custom for the district school teacher to "board round," the following incident occurred, and is vouched for by the highest authority. A year or two ago, an allotment being made in the usual manner for the benefit of the schoolmistress, it happened that the proportion of one man was just two days and a half. The teacher sat down to dinner on the third day, and was beginning to eat, when the man of the house addressed her as follows: "Madam, I suppose your boarding time is out when you have eaten half a dinner; but as I don't want to be mean about it, you may eat, if you choose, about as much as usual."

1005. ROUTINE EDUCATION.

It is related by Miss Edgeworth, that a gentleman, while attending an examination of a school, where every question was answered with the greatest promptness, put some questions to the pupils which were not exactly the same as found in the book. After numerous ready answers to their teacher on the subject of geography, he asked one of the pupils where Turkey was. She answered rather hesitatingly, "In the yard, with the poultry."

1006. READING AND EATING.

Lord Brougham hoped to see the day when every man in the United Kingdom could read Bacon. "It would be much more to the purpose," said Cobbett, "if his lordship could use his influence to see that every man in the kingdom could eat bacon."

§ 104. ELOCUTION.

1007. IMPORTANCE OF RIGHT EMPHASIS.

A stranger from the country, observing one of Carpenter's Roller Counting-house Rules, lifted it, and, inquiring the object, was answered, "It is a rule for counting houses." Too well bred, as he construed politeness, to ask unnecessary questions, he turned it over and over, and up and down repeatedly, and at last, in a paroxysm of baffled curiosity, inquired, "How in the name of nature do you count houses with this?" There is another good story on the subject of emphasis. "Boy," said a visitor at the house of a friend to his little son, "step over the way and see how old Mrs. Brown is." The boy did the errand, and on his return reported that Mrs. Brown did not know how old she was, and that she said he might find out by his own learning.

1008. SERMON TWICE PREACHED.

A young man in New England had pursued a regular course of preparation for the ministry. But he had passed through the college and theological seminary, deeply absorbed in the pursuit of the regular routine studies; and though destined for a public speaker, he had paid little attention to elocution. And thus, at the close of his studies, though possessed of a mind copiously furnished, well disciplined, and wielding an able pen, yet he labored under the great deficiency of an awkward and uninteresting delivery.

Some time after leaving the seminary, he married the daughter of an able and eloquent clergyman, in one of our eastern cities.

On a certain occasion his father-in-law invited him to occupy his pulpit a part of the Sabbath. He accepted the invitation; but though his father-in-law was delighted with the great excellences of the discourse, the congregation soon grew dull and listless, and seemed glad when the preacher had done. This the senior clergyman saw; and sundry hints from the hearers convinced him that his son-in-law had made a perfect failure. He solicited of the young man the loan of his sermon, and, several weeks afterwards, delivered it, with all his elocutionary excellences, to the same congregation. They did not recognize it; and they listened with the highest interest and gratification. They pronounced it one of the best sermons their pastor had ever preached.

1009. CORRECT AND GRACEFUL PRONUNCIATION.

Hooke read some passages of his Roman History to Onslow, the speaker of the House of Commons, who piqued himself upon his reading, and begged him to give his opinion of the work. The speaker answered, as if in a passion, "I cannot tell what to think of it; it may be nonsense, for any thing I know, since your manner of reading has bewitched me."

The same must have been the case with the celebrated singer Senesino; for those who had no knowledge of the Italian language, nor the least relish for music, were fascinated with his recitations, his modulated tones, and his expressive gestures.

Mrs. Oldfield, whose excellent taste and discernment, and whose long acquaintance with the stage, rendered her well able to discriminate, used to say, the best school she had ever known was hearing Rowe read her part in his tragedies. And the late Isaac Hawkins Brown declared, that he never felt the charms of Milton until he heard his exordium read by Sheridan.

Virgil pronounced his own verses with such an enticing sweetness and enchanting grace, that Julius Montanus, a poet who had often heard him, used to say that he could steal Virgil's verses, if he could steal his voice, expression, and gesture; for the same verses, that sounded so rapturously when he read them, were not always excellent in the mouth of another.

Pliny the younger, writing to a friend, who entreated him carefully to examine whether a certain poem was worth publishing, says that, without opening it, he is sure it is beautiful from what he had heard him read; "provided," he adds, "your pronunciation hath not imposed upon me; for you do, indeed, read with exquisite sweetness and art; yet I trust I am not so far led aside by my ears, that the charming cadence has entirely blunted the edge of my judgment."

1010. WELL-TIMED SPEECH BY A MECHANIC.

At the time when Sir Richard Steele was preparing his great room in York Buildings for public orations, he happened to be pretty much behindhand in his payments to the workmen; and coming one day among them to see what progress they made, he ordered the carpenter to get into the rostrum and make a speech, that he might observe how it could be heard. The fellow mounted, and, scratching his poll, told Sir Richard that he knew not what to say, for he was no orator. "O," cries the knight, "no matter for that; speak any thing that comes uppermost." "Why, then, Sir Richard," says the fellow, "here have we been working for your honor these six months, and cannot get one penny of money. Pray, sir, when do you design to pay us?" "Very well, very well," said Sir Richard, "pray come down. I have heard quite enough. I cannot but own you speak very distinctly, though I don't much admire your subject."

1011. CLEARNESS AND DISTINCTNESS OF SPEECH.

Mr. Jones, in his Life of Bishop Horne, speaking of Dr. Hinchcliffe, Bishop of Peterborough, says, that in the pulpit he spoke with the accent of a man of sense, such as he really was in a superior degree; but it was remarkable, and, to those who did not know the cause, mysterious, that there was not a corner of the church in which he could not be heard distinctly. The reason which Mr. Jones assigned was, that he made it an invariable rule to do justice to every consonant, knowing that the vowels would speak for themselves. And thus he became the surest and clearest of speakers; his elocution was perfect, and never disappointed his audience.

1012. THE POWER OF CALM DELIVERY.

A celebrated divine, who was remarkable in the first period of his ministry for a boisterous mode of preaching, suddenly changed his whole manner in the pulpit, and adopted a mild and dispassioned mode of delivery. One of his brethren, observing it, inquired of him what had induced him to make the change. He answered, "When I was young, I thought it was the thunder that killed the people; but when I grew wiser, I discovered that it was the lightning; so I determined in future to thunder less, and lighten more."

1013. EFFECT OF MANNER.

"The Duke of Argyle," says Lord Chesterfield, "though the weakest reasoner, was the most pleasing speaker I ever heard in my life. He charmed, he warmed, he forcibly ravished the audience; not by his matter, certainly, but by his manner of delivering it. A most genteel figure, a noble air, an harmonious voice, an elegance of style, and a strength of emphasis, conspired to make him the most affecting, persuasive, and applauded speaker I ever heard. I was captivated like others; but when I came home, and coolly considered what he had said, stripped of all those ornaments in which he had dressed it, I often found the matter flimsy, the arguments weak, and I was convinced of the power of these adventitious concurring circumstances, which it is ignorance of mankind to call trifling."

1014. WHITEFIELD'S "O."

Garrick said he would give a hundred guineas if he could say "O!" as Whitefield did.

1015. PECULIARITIES OF GREAT SPEAKERS.

A Washington letter-writer, in describing the peculiarities of some distinguished public men, says, —

"It is interesting, sometimes, to see the different ways in which different individuals get out of the same dilemma. Mr. Calhoun is not often at a loss for a word, but occasionally one sticks in his throat, in the pronunciation, like Macbeth's 'Amen.' In such a case, he gives a petulant twitch or two at his shirt collar, and runs his bony fingers through his long gray hair, till it fairly bristles again. Webster, when bothered for a word, or snarled up in a sentence, almost invariably scratches the inner corner of his left eye, carefully, with the third finger of his right hand. Failing in this, he rubs his nose quite fiercely with the bent knuckle of his thumb. As a dernier resort, he springs his knees apart until his legs resemble an ellipsis, then, plunging his hands deep into his pockets, he throws the upper section of his body smartly forward, and the word is 'bound to come.' General Cass, in a similar predicament, passes his hand rapidly along the lower edge of his vest. Mr. Benton sinks his voice, so that the remainder of his sentence is unintelligible. Mr. Mangum is violent, and the obdurate word is supplied by 'Oeck-hock-shoo!' Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, Crittenden, and Mr. Hannegan, are never bothered; they 'speak right on,' and their drafts upon the president's English are never dishonored."

1016. RAPIDITY OF SPEAKING.

Some of the reporters state that Daniel Webster speaks at the rate of from eighty to one hundred and ten words per minute; Gerrit Smith, from seventy to ninety; Dr. Tyng, from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and forty; Mr. Botts, from one hundred to one hundred and twenty; Mr. Clay, one hundred and thirty to one hundred and sixty; Mr. Choate and Mr. Calhoun, from one hundred and sixty to two hundred. We know a public speaker who can double any of these numbers, and still not tire himself.

ELOQUENCE, ORATORY, AND ORATORS

§ 105. POWER OF ELOQUENCE DEMONSTRATED.

1017. DEMOSTHENES'S PERSEVERANCE.

DEMOSTHENES was extremely affected with the honors which he saw paid to the orator Callistratus, and still more with the supreme power of eloquence over the minds of men; and not being able to resist its charms, he gave himself up to it. From thenceforth he renounced all other studies and pleasures, and during the continuance of Callistratus at Athens, he never quitted him, but made all the improvement he could from his precepts. The first essay of his eloquence was against his guardians, whom he obliged to refund part of his fortune. Encouraged by this success, he ventured to speak before the people. but with very ill success. He had a weak voice, a thick way of speaking, and a very short breath: notwithstanding which, his periods were so long, that he was often obliged to stop in the midst of them for respiration. This occasioned his being hissed by the whole audience. As he withdrew, hanging down his head, and in the utmost confusion, Satyrus, one of the most excellent actors of those times, who was his friend, met him; and having learned from himself the cause of his being so much dejected, he assured him that the evil was not without remedy, and that the case was not so desperate as he imagined. He desired him to repeat some of the verses of Sophocles or Euripides to him, which he accordingly did. Satyrus spoke them after him, and gave them such graces, by the tone, gesture, and spirit with which he pronounced them, that Demosthenes himself found them quite different from what they were in his own manner of speaking. He perceived plainly what he wanted, and applied himself to the acquiring of it.

His efforts to correct his natural defect of utterance, and to perfect himself in pronunciation, of which his friend had made him understand the value, seemed almost incredible, and proves that an industrious perseverance can surmount all things. He stammered to such a degree, that he could not pronounce some letters; among others, that with which the name of the art he studied begins; and he was so short breathed that he could not utter a whole period without stopping. He overcame these obstacles at length, by putting small pebbles into his mouth, and pronouncing several verses in that manner without interruption; and with walking, and going up steep and difficult places, so that at last no letter made him hesitate, and his breath held out through the longest periods. He went also to the seaside; and whilst the waves were in the most violent agitation, he pronounced harangues, to accustom himself, by the confused noise of the waters, to the roar of the assembly, and the tumultuous cries of the people.

Demosthenes took no less care of his actions than his voice. He had a large looking-glass in his house, which served to teach him gesture, at which he used to declaim, before he spoke in public. To correct a fault which he had contracted by an ill habit of shrugging up the shoulders, he practised standing upright in a kind of narrow pulpit, or rostrum, over which hung a halbert, in such a manner, that if, in the heat of the action, that motion escaped him, the point of the weapon might serve at the same time to admonish and correct him.

His application to study was no less surprising. To be the more removed from noise, and less subject to distraction, he caused a small room to be made for him under ground, in which he shut himself up sometimes for whole months, shaving, on purpose, half his head and face, that he might not be in a condition to go abroad. It was there, by the light of a small lamp, he composed the admirable orations which were said, by those who envied him, to smell of the oil, to imply that they were too elaborate.

"It is plain," replied he, "yours did not cost you so much trouble." He rose very early in the morning, and used to say that he was sorry when any workman was at his business before him. We may further judge of his extraordinary efforts to acquire excellence of every kind, from the pains he took in copying Thucydides's History eight times with his own hand, in order to render the style of that great man familiar to him.

His pains were well bestowed; for it was by these means that he carried the art of declaiming to the highest degree of perfection of which it was capable; whence it is plain he well knew its value and importance. As to Demosthenes, Cicero tells us that his success was so great, that all Greece came in crowds to Athens to hear him speak; and he adds, that merit so great as his could not but have the desired effect.

1018. SUCCESSFUL ORATORY OF ZENO ELEATES.

The report of the miserable state of slavery into which the Agrigentines had fallen under the tyrant Phalaris so affected Zeno Eleates, that he resolved to leave his native country, and make a journey to Agrigentum, in order to try whether he could not by his counsels effect some amelioration in its condition. The philosopher made his first overtures to Phalaris himself; but finding the ear of the despot deaf to all wholesome counsel, he turned his attention to the patrician youth, whom he endeavored by every effort to animate with a love of liberty, and a determination to free their country from bondage. Phalaris, being informed of the proceedings of Zeno, ordered him to be arrested, and calling the people together into the forum, he put the philosopher into the rank before their faces, and repeatedly called upon him to point out who among those around him had lent a favorable ear to his counsels. Zeno observed on this point the most obstinate silence; but turning to the citizens, he began to reproach them, in such glowing terms, with their abject submission to such a tyrant, that all at once they were filled with an impulse of indignation not to be repressed, and stoned the tyrant Phalaris on the very spot which he had designed for the martyrdom of a philosopher and friend of liberty.

1019. CARACTACUS, THE BRITISH GENERAL.

His army being defeated, Caractacus fled to Cartesmandua, Queen of the Brigantes, who, jealous of the glory he had acquired, treacherously delivered the unfortunate monarch into the hands of the Romans. Claudius, being desirous of beholding a prince of whom such extraordinary exploits had been rumored, ordered him to be conducted into his presence, when, according to Tacitus, he delivered the following memorable oration:—

"If, in my prosperity, the moderation of my conduct had been equal to my birth and fortune, I should have entered this city rather as a friend than a prisoner; nor would you, Cæsar, have disdained the alliance of a prince descended from illustrious ancestors, and ruler over many nations. My present fate is to me dishonorable; to you magnificently glorious. I once had horses, I once had men, I once had arms, I once had riches; can you wonder that I should part with them reluctantly? Though you, as Romans, may aim at universal empire, it does not follow that all mankind must tamely submit to be your vassals. If I had yielded without resistance, neither the perverseness of my fortune, nor the glory of your triumph, would have been famous. Punish me with death, and I shall soon be forgotten; suffer me to live, and I shall remain a perpetual monument of your clemency."

This magnanimous but heart-rending speech affected the whole assembly, and Claudius himself shed tears. The emperor immediately ordered the chains of Caractacus and his family to be taken off, and they were restored to the possession of perfect liberty. Caractacus in viewing the city of Rome, and captivated with the splendor of that imperial city, exclaimed, "How astonishing that the Romans, who have such magnificent palaces of their own, should envy the wretched huts and cabins of the Britons!"

1020. JULIUS CÆSAR.

When Quintus Ligarius was prosecuted for bearing arms against Cæsar, and Cicero had undertaken to plead his cause, Cæsar is reported to have said, "Why may not we give ourselves a pleasure which we have not enjoyed so long,—that of hearing Cicero speak,—since I have already taken my resolution as to Ligarius, who is clearly a bad man, as well as my enemy?" But he was greatly moved when Cicero began; and his speech, as it proceeded, had such a variety of pathos, so irresistible a charm, that his color often changed, and it was evident that his mind was torn with conflicting passions. At last, when the orator touched on the battle of Pharsalia, he was so extremely affected, that his whole frame trembled, and he let fall some papers out of his hand. Thus conquered by the force of eloquence, he acquitted Ligarius.

1021. HORTENSIA.

The daughter of Hortensius inherited the eloquence of her father; and when the Roman women were required to render an oath on account of their property, preparatory to a heavy tax, she pleaded the cause of her sex with such force, that the decree was annulled.

The harangue which she delivered on this occasion before the triumviri, Anthony, Octavius, and Lepidus, was extant in the time of Quintilian, who speaks of it with great applause.

1022. ELOQUENCE OF THE PASSIONS.

Cromwell was one day engaged in a warm argument with a lady on the subject of oratory, in which she maintained that eloquence could only be acquired by those who made it their study in early youth, and their practice afterwards. The lord protector, on the contrary, maintained that there was an eloquence which sprang from the heart; since, when that was deeply interested in the attainment of any object, it never failed to supply a fluency and richness of expression, which would, in the comparison, render vapid the studied speeches of the most celebrated orators. It happened, some days after, that this lady was thrown into a state bordering on distraction, by the arrest and imprisonment of her husband, who was conducted to the Tower as a traitor to the government. The agonized wife flew to the lord protector, rushed through his guards, threw herself at his feet, and, with the most pathetic eloquence, pleaded for the life and innocence of her injured husband. His highness maintained a severe brow, till the petitioner, overpowered by the excess of her feelings, and the energy with which she had expressed them, paused; then his stern countenance relaxed into a smile, and, extending to her an order for the immediate liberation of her husband, he said, "I think all who have witnessed this scene will vote on my side of the question, in a dispute between us the other day, that the eloquence of the heart is far above that mechanically acquired by study."

1023. MR. SHERIDAN.

In the debate on the articles of impeachment against Warren Hastings, in the House of Commons, on the 7th of February, 1787, Mr. Sheridan spoke on the fourth or Oude charge, for the space of five hours and forty minutes. His speech, on that occasion, united the most convincing closeness and accuracy of argument with the most luminous precision and perspicuity of language, alternately giving force and energy to truth, by solid and substantial reasoning, and enlightening the most extensive and involved subjects with the purest clearness of logic, and the brightest splendor of rhetoric. It will be a permanent record of Mr. Sheridan's unrivalled abilities, that on this trying occasion, which of all others had divided not only the House of Commons, but the nation at large, into a variety of parties, this memorable speech produced almost universal union. When he described the sufferings of the Begums of Oude, an indescribable emotion was perceived to agitate the feelings of the audience. Alluding to the factious parties in the house, "But," said he, "when inhumanity presents itself to their observation, it finds no division among them; they attack it as their common enemy; and, as if the character of this land was involved in their zeal for its ruin, they leave it not till it is completely overthrown. It was not given to that house to be told the objects of their compassion and benevolence in the present extensive consideration, as it was to those officers who relieved, and who so feelingly describe the ecstatic emotions of gratitude in the instant of deliverance. They could not behold the workings of the hearts, the quivering lips, the trickling tears, the loud and yet tremulous joy of the millions whom their vote of this night would forever save from the cruelty of corrupted power. But though they could not directly see the effort, was not the true enjoyment of their benevolence increased by the blessing being conferred unseen? Would not the omnipotence of Britain be demonstrated to the wonder of nations, by stretching its mighty arm across the deep, and saving, by its fiat, distant millions from destruction? And would the blessings of the people thus saved dissipate in empty air? No! If I may dare," said Mr. Sheridan, "to use the figure, we shall constitute heaven itself for our proxy, to receive for us the blessings of their pious gratitude, and the prayers of their thanksgiving."

On the conclusion of Mr. Sheridan's speech, the whole assembly, members, peers, and strangers, involuntarily joined in a tumult of applause, and adopted a mode of expressing their approbation, new and irregular in that house, by loudly and repeatedly clapping their hands. A motion was immediately made and carried for an adjournment, that the members who were in a state of delirious insensibility from the talismanic influence of such powerful eloquence might have time to collect their scattered senses for the exercise of a sober judgment. The motion was made by Mr. Pitt, who declared that this speech "surpassed all the eloquence of ancient and modern times, and possessed every thing that genius or art could furnish to agitate and control the human mind."

1024. THELWALL'S LECTURES.

The years 1793, '4, and '5 presented to the British metropolis the phenomenon of Thelwall's political lectures, in a large room on the east side of Beaufort Buildings. The admission was one shilling, and such were the powers of the orator, that his auditory of twelve or fifteen hundred persons was complete in a few minutes after the opening of the doors. His topics were the necessity of reform, and the abuses of power; and these he handled with such effect, that it was deemed necessary to pass an act of Parliament for the special purpose of shutting up his rooms. His lectures were altogether ex tempore, and the powers of oratory were, perhaps, never carried to higher perfection, or exerted with more effect, on a continued succession of audiences.

1025. THE ROMANCE OF ROMANCE.

The history of the liaison of Mirabeau, the French revolutionist, with the Marchioness de Monnier, is more romantic than romance. The parties "saw, and looked, and loved."

Mirabeau seduced and carried her off; she was seized and thrown into a convent; he escaped into Switzerland; he was tried and convicted of contumacy, and sentenced to lose his head. The lady escaped and rejoined him; they passed into Holland; there, after a time, they were seized; she was again immured in a convent, and he was consigned to the Castle of Vincennes, where he remained three years and a half. After his liberation, he obtained a new trial; pleaded his own cause; produced a lock of her hair steeped in poison, of which she was in possession of a counterpart, for their mutual destruction should he fail; and, by the impassioned power of his all-commanding eloquence, he terrified the court and his persecutors, melted the audience into tears, obtained a reversal of his sentence, and even threw the cost of the suit upon the plaintiff.

1026. PATRICK HENRY AND THE REVOLUTION.

Patrick Henry.

Patrick Henry was the son of Colonel John Henry, a native of Aberdeen, in Scotland, and born at Studley, in the county of Hanover, and state of Virginia. In his youth he gave no signs of future greatness. No persuasions could induce him either to read or work; but he ran wild in the forest, and divided his time between the uproar of the chase and the languor of inaction.

When the question first came to be agitated concerning the rights of the British to tax America, he gave, as it has been truly remarked, "the first impulse to the revolution." Men who were on other occasions distinguished for intrepidity and decision hung back, unwilling to submit, yet afraid to speak out in language of open and bold defiance. In this hour of despondency, suspense, and consternation, Henry arose to cheer the drooping spirits of his countrymen, and to call forth all the energies of the Americans to contend for their freedom. When the House of Burgesses was within three days of its expected close, Henry produced and carried the far-famed resolutions concerning the stamp act, which formed the first firm opposition to the scheme of taxing America by the British Parliament.

1027. PATRICK HENRY AND JOHN HOOK.

The versatility of talent for which Patrick Henry, the American orator and patriot, was distinguished, was happily illustrated in a trial which took place soon after the war of independence. During the distress of the republican army consequent on the invasion of Cornwallis and Phillips, in 1781, Mr. Venable, an army commissary, took two steers for the use of the troops from Mr. Hook, a Scotchman, and a man of wealth, who was suspected of being unfriendly to the American cause. The act had not been strictly legal, and on the establishment of peace, Hook, under the advice of Cowan, a gentleman of some distinction in the law, thought proper to bring an action of trespass against Mr. Venable, in the District Court of New London. Mr. Henry appeared for the defendant, and is said to have conducted himself in a manner much to the enjoyment of his hearers, the unfortunate Hook of course excepted. After Mr. Henry became animated in the cause, he appeared to have complete control over the passions of his audience: at one time he excited their indignation against Hook; vengeance was visible in every countenance: again, when he chose to relax and ridicule him, the whole audience was in a roar of laughter. He painted the distress of the American army, exposed almost naked to the rigor of a winter's sky, and marking the frozen ground over which they marched with the blood of their unshod feet. "Where was the man," he said, "who had an American heart in his bosom, who would not have thrown open his fields, his barns, his cellars, the doors of his house, the portals of his breast, to have received with open arms the meanest soldier in that little band of famished patriots? Where is the man? There he stands; but whether the heart of an American beats in his bosom, you, gentlemen, are to judge." He then carried the jury, by the power of his imagination, to the plains around York, the surrender of which had followed shortly after the act complained of. He depicted the surrender in the most glowing and noble colors of his eloquence: the audience saw before their eyes the humiliation and dejection of the British, as they marched out of their trenches; they saw the triumph which lighted up every patriotic face; they heard the shouts of victory, the cry of "Washington and liberty!" as it rung and echoed through the American ranks, and was reverberated from the hills and shores of the neighboring river. "But, hark!" continued Henry; "what notes of discord are these which disturb the general joy, and silence the acclamations of victory? They are the notes of John Hook, hoarsely bawling through the American camp, 'Beef! beef! beef!'"

The court was convulsed with laughter; when Hook, turning to the clerk, said, "Never mind, you men; wait till Billy Cowan gets up, and he'll show him the la." But Mr. Cowan was so completely overwhelmed by the torrent which bore upon his client, that when he rose to reply to Mr. Henry, he was scarcely able to make an intelligible or audible remark. The cause was decided almost by acclamation. The jury retired for form sake, and instantly returned with a verdict for the defendant.

A striking example of the witchery of Henry's eloquence, even on common subjects, is related by the late Major Joseph Scott.

This gentleman had been summoned, at great inconvenience to his private affairs, to attend as witness at a distant court, in which Mr. Henry practised. The cause which had carried him thither having been disposed of, he was setting out in great haste to return, when the sheriff summoned him to serve on a jury. This cause was represented as a complicated and important one—so important as to have enlisted in it all the most eminent members of the bar. He was therefore alarmed at the prospect of a long detention, and made an unavailing effort with the court to get himself discharged from the jury. He was compelled to take his seat. When his patience had been nearly exhausted by the previous speakers, Mr. Henry rose to conclude the cause; and having much matter to answer, the major stated that he considered himself a prisoner for the evening, if not for the night. But, to his surprise, Mr. Henry appeared to have consumed not more than fifteen minutes in the reply; and he would scarcely believe his own watch, or those of the other jurymen, when they informed him that Mr. H. had, in reality, been speaking upwards of two hours! So powerful was the charm by which he would bind the senses of his hearers, and make even the most impatient unconscious of the lapse of time.

1028. LORD THURLOW

Charles Butler, in his Reminiscences, thus mentions a speech of Lord Thurlow's in reply to an attack of the Duke of Grafton, during the inquiry into Lord Sandwich's administration of Greenwich Hospital: "His grace's action and delivery, when he addressed the house, were singularly dignified and graceful; but his matter was not equal to his manner. He reproached Lord Thurlow with his plebeian extraction, and his recent admission into the peerage. Particular circumstances caused Lord Thurlow's reply to make a deep impression on the remembrance. His lordship had spoken too often, and began to be heard with a civil but visible impatience. Under these circumstances he was attacked in the manner we have mentioned. He rose from the wool-sack, and advanced slowly to the place from which the chancellor generally addresses the house; then, fixing on the duke the look of Jove, when he has grasped the thunder, 'I am amazed,' he said, in a level tone of voice, 'at the attack which the noble duke has made upon me. Yes, my lords,' considerably raising his voice, 'I am amazed at his grace's speech. The noble duke cannot look before him, behind him, or on either side of him, without seeing some noble peer, who owes his seat in this house to his successful exertions in this profession to which I belong. Does he not feel that it is as honorable to owe it to these, as to being the accident of an accident? To all these noble lords the language of the noble duke is as applicable and as insulting as it is to myself. But I do not fear to meet it single and alone. No one venerates the peerage more than I do; but, my lords, I must say that the peerage solicited me, not I the peerage. Nay, more; I can say, and will say, that as a peer of Parliament,—as speaker of this right honorable house,—as keeper of the great seal,—as guardian of his majesty's conscience,—as lord high chancellor of England,—nay, even in that character alone in which the noble duke would think it an affront to be considered,—but which character none can deny me,—as a man, I am at this moment as respectable,—I beg leave to add,—I am at this time as much respected, as the proudest peer I now look down upon.' The effect of this speech, both within the walls of Parliament and out of them, was prodigious. It gave Lord Thurlow an ascendancy in the house which no chancellor had ever possessed ; it invested him, in public opinion, with a character of independence and honor ; and this, although he was ever upon the unpopular side of politics, made him always popular with the people."

1029. STRIKING EFFECT OF A BRIEF SPEECH.

When Mr. Anthony Astley Cooper was member for Pool, in Dorsetshire, he gave a very singular instance of his humanity and integrity. Before the revolution, and for some time after, prisoners accused of high treason were not permitted to be heard by counsel, unless a special matter of law was stated to the court. A bill was at length presented to the House of Commons to abolish this prohibition ; and, notwithstanding the equity of such an intended law, it met with great opposition.

When the bill was brought into the house, Mr. Cooper had prepared a speech in support of it ; but when he stood up to read it, he was so agitated that he was unable to proceed. The speaker, observing his confusion, recommended him to take time, and not be discouraged ; upon which encouragement Mr. Cooper recovered himself, and spoke as follows :—

"Mr. Speaker: If I, who rise only to give my opinion upon the bill now depending, am so confounded that I am unable to express the least part of what I proposed to say, what must be the condition of that man, who, without any assistance whatever, is obliged to plead for his life, whilst under the dreadful apprehension of being deprived of it?"

This emphatic speech had such an effect upon the house, that the bill passed without opposition.

1030. ORATORY RENDERED EFFECTIVE BY A JEST.

Pitt and Fox were listened to with profound respect, and in silence broken only by occasional cheers ; but from the moment of Sheridan's rising, there was an expectation of pleasure, which, to his last days, was seldom disappointed. A low murmur of eagerness ran round the house ; every word was watched for, and his pleasantry set the whole assemblage in a roar. Sheridan was aware of this, and has been heard to say, that if a jester would never be an orator, yet no speaker could expect to be popular in a full house, without a jest ; and that he always made the experiment, good or bad ; as a laugh gave him the country gentlemen to a man.

1031. SHERIDAN AND THE TAX BILLS.

In prefacing a motion for the printing of a tax bill, a practice which, though not long adopted, has been of infinite service in preventing the blunders which formerly occurred, Mr. Sheridan proceeded to illustrate the style of a bill to remedy the defects of some bills already in being, by comparing it to the plan of a simple, but very ingenious, moral tale, that had often afforded him amusement in his early days, under the title of the House that Jack Built. "First, then, comes in a bill imposing a tax ; and then comes in a bill to amend that bill for imposing a tax ; and then comes in a bill to explain the bill that amended the bill ; next a bill to remedy the defects of a bill for explaining the bill that amended the bill ; and so on, ad infinitum." After parodying the story in this way to a still greater length, Mr. Sheridan entered upon a comparison of tax bills to a ship built in a dock-yard, which was found to be defective every voyage, and consequently was obliged to undergo a new repair : first it was to be calked, then to be new planked, then to be new ribbed, then again to be covered ; then, after all these expensive alterations, the vessel was generally obliged to be broken up and rebuilt.

The orator next pointed out several absurdities in the tax bills which had been recently passed, and which, he contended, might have been avoided, if the bills, by being printed, had undergone a full and public discussion. "In the horse-tax bill, for instance, there was a clause which required a stamp to be placed, not, indeed, on the animal, but on some part of the accoutrements. The clause, however, on a little consideration, was abandoned ; but another was inserted, so absurd, that it never was carried into execution ; namely, the one by which it was enacted, that the numbers and names of all the horses in each parish should be affixed on the church door. The church-wardens were also required, by the same act, to return lists of the windows, within their districts, to the commissioners of stamps, for the purpose of detecting those who had not entered their horses. Now," said Mr. Sheridan, "if horses were in the habit of looking out at windows, this might possibly have been a wise and judicious regulation ; but under present circumstances, there is some little occasion for wonder, how such ideas came to be associated in the minds of those who framed the bill, unless it was that they wished to sink the business of legislation into utter contempt."

1032. TRUE ELOQUENCE.

The following anecdote is told of an individual who listened to the splendid argument of Sheridan against Warren Hastings. At the expiration of the first hour, he said to a friend, "All this is mere declamation ;" when the second was finished, "This is a wonderful oration ;" at the close of the third, "Mr. Hastings has acted very unjustifiably ;" at the fourth, "Mr. Hastings is an atrocious criminal ;" and at the last, "Of all monsters of iniquity, the most enormous is Warren Hastings."

§ 106. ELOQUENCE OF VARIOUS ORATORS DESCRIBED OR EXEMPLIFIED.

1033. PROPER ADAPTATION OF ELOQUENCE.

Eloquence must be adapted to occasions and persons, or it is good for nothing. It may be judged by its effects. "What a charming speech have we heard!" said the Romans on leaving the forum where Cicero had been haranguing them. "What flowing periods! what brilliant images!" "Let us march instantly, and fight the invading tyrant," said the Athenians, immediately after Demosthenes had been thundering in their ears against Philip of Macedon. "That rhetoric," says Selden in his Table Talk, "is best, which is most seasonable and most catching." An instance we have in that blunt old commander at Cadiz, who showed himself a good orator. Being under the necessity of saying something to his soldiers which he was not used to do, he made them a speech to this purpose: "What a shame it will be to you Englishmen, that feed upon good beef and drink strong beer, to let those rascally Spaniards beat you, that eat nothing but oranges and lemons!" and so put more courage into his men than he could have done with a learned oration.

1034. ELOQUENCE OF HANNIBAL.

From the speech for peace which Livy makes Hannibal deliver to the senate of Carthage, he must, as Mr. Fox once observed, have been as eloquent a man as ever spoke. The figure which he made on that occasion was extraordinary. After all the warlike declarations he had made, he felt the singularity of his situation, and thus shortly expressed it: "Ego Hannibal, peto pacem!" 1035. PETER THE HERMIT.

It is difficult to fix limits to human achievements, when superstition or enthusiasm is aided by the power of eloquence. The celebrated Peter the Hermit, having made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, towards the close of the eleventh century, was deeply impressed with the oppression sustained by the Christians from the Turks, and resolved to make an effort to rouse the western nations to arms in their behalf. The appearance of Peter was mean, his stature small, his body meagre, and his countenance shrivelled; but, with these disadvantages, he had a keen and lively eye, and a ready eloquence. Being encouraged by Pope Urban II., he travelled as a missionary through the provinces of Italy and France. He rode on an ass; his head and feet were naked, and he bore a weighty crucifix. He prayed frequently, fed on bread and water, gave away in alms all that he received, and, by his saintly demeanor and fervid address, drew innumerable crowds of all ranks to listen to his preaching. When he painted the indignities offered to the true believers at the birthplace and sepulchre of the Savior, every heart was melted to compassion, and animated to revenge. His success was such as might be expected from the rude enthusiasm and martial spirit of the age; and Peter soon collected an army of sixty thousand followers, with which he proceeded towards Jerusalem.

1036. RODOLPH AGRICOLA.

Rodolph Agricola, who died in the flower of his age, in 1485, was a prodigy in literature and science. Vossius says he was a great philosopher; that he understood Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and was a great musician; Walther, that he not only set to music, in four parts, many hymns in his mother tongue, but played on the lute, and sung admirably. Erasmus, in a pompous eulogium, places him among the first of mortals. But Agricola himself thought little of his fame, and published none of his own works, which were, however, very numerous. Cardinal Bembo regarded him as the first man of his age; and Paul Jovius expressly says, that Agricola shamed the Jews for Hebrew, and the Athenians and Romans by his Greek and Latin. He was born at Baslon, a small town in Friesland, near Groningen, and died at forty-three. Melchior Adam extends his praises so far as to say, that in eloquence he had the cadence of Lactantius, the period of Pliny, the penetration of Socrates, the richness and variety of Cicero, the points and subtlety of Quintilian, and the vehemence and prejudices of St. Cyprian.

1037. FIRST SPEECH OF MR. PITT.

On the 26th of February, a circumstance of a very remarkable nature occasioned Mr. Pitt to make his first speech in the House of Commons. The subject of debate was Mr. Burke's bill for economical reform in the civil list. Lord Nugent was speaking against the bill; and Mr. Byng, member for Middlesex, knowing Mr. Pitt's sentiments upon the measure, asked him to reply to his lordship. Mr. Pitt gave a doubtful answer; but in the course of Lord Nugent's speech, he determined not to reply to him. Mr. Byng, however, understood that Mr. Pitt intended to speak after Lord Nugent; and the moment his lordship sat down, Mr. Byng and several of his friends, to whom he had communicated Mr. Pitt's supposed intention, called out, in the manner usual in the House of Commons, Mr. Pitt's name, as being about to speak. This probably prevented any other person from rising; and Mr. Pitt, finding himself thus called upon, and observing that the house waited to hear him, thought it necessary to rise. Though really not intending to speak, he was, from the beginning, collected and unembarrassed; he argued strongly in favor of the bill, and noticed all the objections which had been urged by the noble lord who immediately preceded him in the debate, in a manner which greatly astonished all who heard him. Never were higher expectations formed of any person upon his first coming into Parliament, and never were expectations more completely answered. They were, indeed, much more than answered: such were the fluency and accuracy of language, such the perspicuity of arrangement, and such the closeness of reasoning, and manly and dignified elocution,—generally, even in a much less degree, the fruits of long habit and experience,—that it could scarcely be believed to be the first speech of a young man not yet two and twenty.

"On the following day, Mr. Pitt, knowing my anxiety," says Bishop Tomline, "upon every subject which related to him, with his accustomed kindness, wrote to me at Cambridge, to inform me, that 'he had heard his own voice in the House of Commons,' and modestly expressed his satisfaction at the manner in which his first attempt at parliamentary speaking had been received. Before Mr. Pitt had a seat in Parliament, he had been a constant attendant in the gallery of the House of Commons, and near the throne in the House of Lords, upon every important debate; and whenever he heard a speech of any merit on the side opposite to his own opinions, he accustomed himself to consider, as it proceeded, in what manner it might be answered; and when the speaker accorded with his own sentiments, he then observed his mode of arranging and enforcing his ideas, and considered whether any improvement could have been made, or whether any argument had been omitted. To this habit, and to the practice, already mentioned, of reading Greek and Latin into English, joined to his wonderful natural endowments, may be attributed his talent for reply, and that command of language for which he was from the first so highly distinguished. At whatever length he spoke, he avoided repetition; and it was early and justly observed of him, that "he never failed to put the best word in the best place."

1038. EARL OF CHATHAM.

When Mr. Pitt, first Earl of Chatham, made his début in the House of Commons, he was, as every one knows, a cornet in the army. A country gentleman, who had been struck with his eloquence, told Sir Robert Walpole that he thought it would be to his interest to make young Pitt a captain. "My dear sir," said Sir Robert, "to let you see how much I think of you, if you will make him my friend, I will give him a regiment."

Sir William Young having once interrupted Mr. Pitt, while speaking, with the cry of "Question, question," he paused; then, fixing on Sir William a look of ineffable contempt, he exclaimed, "Pardon me, Mr. Speaker, this agitation, but whenever that honorable member calls for the question, I fancy I hear the knell of my country's ruin."

On another occasion, immediately after Mr. Pitt had finished a speech in the house, he walked out, as usual, with a very slow step. Silence continued, until the door was opened to let him into the lobby, when a member started up, saying, "I rise to reply to the right honorable member." Mr. Pitt immediately turned back; when the orator instantly sitting down, he hobbled to his seat, repeating the verses of Virgil, —

"*Aut Danaum progenies, Agamemnonique phalanges
Ut viderè virum, fulgentisque arma per umbras,
Ingenti trepidare metu, — pars vertere retro,
Sed quondam petèrè rate, — pars tollere v. com.
Et quam, — suscep' us cl. mor frustratur hiantes.*"

Then, placing himself on his seat, he exclaimed, "Now let me hear what the honorable member has to say to me, or to the house." The member was silent; and the house, instead of laughing at his embarrassment, were awed into pity.

When the Prussian subsidy, an unpopular measure, was discussed in the House of Commons, Mr. Pitt justified it with infinite address, insensibly subduing his audience, until a murmur of approbation was heard from every part of the house. Availing himself of this moment, he placed himself in an attitude of stern defiance, but perfect dignity, and exclaimed, in his loudest tone, "Is there an Austrian among you? If so, let him stand forth, and reveal himself."

Mr. Moreton, the chief justice of Chester, speaking in the House of Commons, made use of the phrase, "King, Lords, and Commons, or," directing his eyes towards Mr. Pitt, "as that right honorable member would call them, 'Commons, Lords, and King.'" Mr. Pitt rose with great deliberation, and called to order. "I have," he said, "frequently heard in this house doctrines which have surprised me; but now my blood runs cold. I desire the words of the honorable member may be taken down." The clerk of the house wrote down the words. "Bring them to me," said Mr. Pitt, in a voice of thunder. By this time, Mr. Moreton was frightened out of his senses. "Sir," he said, addressing himself to the speaker, "I am sorry to have given offence to the right honorable gentleman, or to the house. I meant nothing. King, Lords, and Commons; Lords, King, and Commons; Commons, Lords, and King; tria juncta in uno. I meant nothing! Indeed, I meant nothing." Mr. Pitt then rose, and said, "I do not wish to push the matter further; the moment a man acknowledges his error, he ceases to be guilty. I have a great regard for the honorable member, and, as an instance of that regard, I give him this advice — that whenever he means nothing, he will say nothing."

Lord Chatham, when minister, was so delicate on the subject of his measures, that his nearest friends frequently went down to the House of Commons, ignorant of the question to be proposed. On being remonstrated with on this subject, he said, he always trusted to the utility of his measures, and if his friends did not see it in that light, he did not want their support.

Indeed, Lord Chatham was so conscious of his own independence as a minister, that being one day told, in the House of Lords, of the strength of his majorities, he vehemently replied, "I know of no majority, but what the sense of the house occasionally gives me. If there are any other majorities, they belong to the Duke of Newcastle, and I trust he has come honestly by them."

1039. LORD YARBOROUGH'S REPLY TO BURKE.

The celebrated Edmund Burke was one of the members appointed by the House of Commons to enforce the charges of crime against Warren Hastings, and one day, when he had been pouring out all his splendid talents in a rich display of oratory against the accused, he addressed the splendid assembly of peers, ladies, and gentlemen before him, in the following language: "When I look round this glorious circle, bright with all that is high in rank, all that is powerful in talent, all that is amiable in virtue, all that is brilliant in beauty, and then turn my eyes to the criminal at the bar, my mind is convulsed with horror, and I sicken at the sight." The orator then placed his hands on the table before him, and dropped his head into them, as if overwhelmed with the dreadful contemplation. On coming out of Westminster Hall, after this splendid oration, Burke could not find his carriage, and Lord Yarborough's having just drawn up, the peer offered to take him home. The ebullition of Burke's mind had not subsided, and on the way, without considering the indelicacy of appealing to one who was ultimately to pronounce judgment in the case, he proceeded to reurge the arguments of his speech on his noble auditor, concluding with the eager inquiry, "Do you not think this man is a great criminal?" Lord Yarborough, whose correctness of intellect was known to all who had the opportunity of knowing him, immediately replied, "Burke, all I can say at present is, that either you or Hastings deserves to be hanged; but I cannot now tell which of the two."

1040. BURKE AT THE TRIAL OF HASTINGS.

Edmund Burke.

When the trial of Mr. Hastings commenced, in Westminster Hall, the first two days were taken up in reading the articles of impeachment against him; and four more were occupied by Mr. Burke in opening the case, and stating the grounds of the accusation. Never were the powers of that great man displayed to such advantage as on this occasion. The contrast which he drew between the ancient and the modern state of Hindostan was sketched with the hand of a master, and wrought up in a manner that could not fail to fix the attention, and to command admiration. When, at length, he came to speak of Mr. Hastings, no terms can describe the more than mortal vehemence with which he uttered his manifold accusations against him. He seemed, for the moment, as if armed to destroy with all the lightning of all the passions. The whole annals of judicial oratory contain nothing finer than his conclusion:—

"I impeach Warren Hastings," said he, "in the name of the Commons of Great Britain, in Parliament assembled, whose parliamentary trust he has abused.

"I impeach him in the name of the Commons of Great Britain, whose national character he has dishonored.

"I impeach him in the name of the people of India, whose laws, rights, and liberties he has subverted; whose properties he has destroyed; whose country he has laid waste and desolate.

"I impeach him in the name of human nature itself, which he has so cruelly outraged, injured, and oppressed. And I impeach him in the name and by the virtue of those eternal laws of justice, which ought equally to prevail in both sexes, every age, condition, rank, and situation in the world."

The agitation produced by this speech was such, that the whole audience appeared to have felt one convulsive emotion; and when it was over, it was some time before Mr. Fox could obtain a hearing.

Amidst the assemblage of concurring praises, which this speech excited, none was more remarkable than the tribute of Mr. Hastings himself. "For half an hour," said that gentleman, "I looked up at the orator in a reverie of wonder; and during that space I actually felt myself the most culpable man on earth." Had the sentiment concluded here, our readers would not believe that it was in the language or manner of Mr. Hastings. "But," continued he, "I recurred to my own bosom, and there found a consciousness which consoled me under all I heard, and all I suffered."

1041. SHERIDAN'S ELOQUENCE INFLUENCED BY EXCITING DRAUGHTS.

In the year 1805, on the day when the very animated debate took place upon the celebrated Tenth Report of the Commissioners of Naval Inquiry, the attention of a gentleman, who happened to enter a coffee-house near the House of Commons, was instantly fixed by another gentleman, whom he observed at one of the tables, with tea, and pen, ink, and paper before him. For some time the latter sat alternately drinking tea and taking down memoranda, and then called to the waiter to bring him some brandy; when to the observer's great surprise, a half pint tumbler full was brought. The gentleman placed it by him, continuing a while alternately to write and drink tea; when, at length, collecting his papers together, he put them in his pocket, and swallowing the half pint of brandy as if it had been water, went out of the coffee-house. The stranger was so much struck by all he had observed, particularly at the facility with which such a quantity of spirits was taken, that he could not forbear to ask the waiter who that gentleman was? The man replied, "Pshaw! don't you know him? Why, that's Sheridan; he's going now to the House of Commons." It will be remembered that in the course of this debate Mr. Sheridan made one of the finest speeches ever delivered by him, alike remarkable for keenness of argument and brilliancy of wit, and this under the influence of a potion that would wholly have deprived most men of their faculties.

1042. CURRAN'S ANSWER TO ROBINSON.

As an example of powerful, unpremeditated eloquence, may be given a short answer of Curran, the Irish orator, to a certain Judge Robinson, "the author of many stupid, slavish, and scurrilous political pamphlets," and by his demerits and servility raised to the eminence which he thus disgraced, who, upon one occasion, when the barrister was arguing a case before him had the brutality to reproach Curran with his poverty, by telling him that he suspected "his law library was rather contracted."

"It is true, my lord," said Curran, with dignified respect, "that I am poor, and the circumstance has certainly somewhat curtailed my library: my books are not numerous, but they are select, and I hope they have been perused with proper dispositions. I have prepared myself for this high profession rather by the study of a few good works than by the composition of a great many bad ones. I am not ashamed of my poverty; but I should be ashamed of my wealth, could I have stooped to acquire it by servility and corruption. If I rise not to rank, I shall at least be honest; and should I ever cease to be so, many an example shows me that an ill-gained reputation, by making me the more conspicuous, would only make me the more universally and the more notoriously contemptible!"

1043. COLERIDGE A UNITARIAN PREACHER.

Samuel Taylor Coleridge

During his residence at Nether Stoney, Coleridge officiated as Unitarian preacher at Taunton, and afterwards at Shrewsbury. Mr. Hazlitt has described his walking ten miles, on a winter day, to hear Coleridge preach. "When I got there," he says, "the organ was playing the one hundredth psalm, and, when it was done, Mr. Coleridge rose and gave out his text: 'He departed again into a mountain himself alone.' As he gave out his text, his voice rose like a stream of rich distilled perfume; when he came to the last two words, which he pronounced loud, deep, and distinct, it seemed to me, who was then young, as if the sounds had echoed from the bottom of the human heart, and as if that prayer might have floated in solemn silence through the universe. The idea of St. John came into my mind, of one crying in the wilderness, who had his loins girt about, and whose food was locusts and wild honey. The preacher then launched into his subject, like an eagle dallying with the wind. The sermon was upon peace and war—upon church and state; not their alliance, but their separation; on the spirit of the world and the spirit of Christianity; not as the same, but as opposed to one another. He talked of those who had inscribed the cross of Christ on banners dripping with human gore! He made a poetical and pastoral excursion; and, to show the fatal effects of war, drew a striking contrast between the simple shepherd boy driving his team a-field, or sitting under the hawthorn, piping to his flock, as though he should never be old, and the same poor country lad crimped, kidnapped, brought into town, made drunk at an alehouse, turned into a wretched drummer boy, with his hair sticking on end with powder and pomatum, a long cue at his back, and tricked out in the finery of the profession of blood.

'Such were the notes our once-loved poet sang;'

and, for myself, I could not have been more delighted if I had heard the music of the spheres."

1044. PATRICK HENRY AND THE BAPTISTS

The following very interesting narrative was drawn up by the Rev. J. M. Peck, from papers furnished to him by the Rev. Thomas S. Hinde, of Mount Carmel, in the State of Illinois:—

"It is known to our readers that the ecclesiastical hierarchy of Virginia, before the revolution, was exceedingly despotic and oppressive. A branch of the English Episcopal hierarchy was first established in the colony of Virginia in 1623. Each plantation or settlement was to have a house for the worship of God, and support by tithes a priest. In 1631, the legal stipend was ten pounds of tobacco and a bushel of corn from each taxable inhabitant, with every twentieth calf, kid, and pig. To preserve 'purity of doctrine, and unity of the church,' it was enacted that all ministers should conform to the church of England, and no other persons were allowed to teach or preach publicly or privately. All 'nonconformists' were required to depart from the colony.

"In 1665, a levy was made of fifteen pounds of tobacco on each poll, and provision was made for 'glebes' and 'parsonages.' No minister was allowed to preach unless he had received ordination from some bishop in England. In 1721, the colonial legislature enacted that every minister received into any parish by the vestry should have an annual salary of sixteen thousand pounds of tobacco, and glebes of not less than two hundred acres were to be provided in each parish. In 1757, a season of unusual failure in the tobacco crop, the staple of the colony, it was further enacted that the clergyman should receive, at his option, a substitute in cash, equal to eighteen shillings per hundred weight. This gave rise to the celebrated lawsuit in which Patrick Henry made his début at the bar.

"Most of the parish priests who occupied the glebes, and enjoyed the profits of the tobacco law, were any thing rather than ministers of the gospel of Christ. Many of them were lamentably immoral. They were frequently the second and third sons of decayed English and Irish families, who, in talents and moral character, were unfitted for a place in the army or navy, but, through the influence of their friends and some accommodating bishop, could obtain 'holy orders' on condition of becoming chaplains in the colonies, and accepting of the tobacco stipend. We need only refer to their own talented and impartial historian, in the Contributions to Ecclesiastical History, for proof of the character of a large proportion of these colonial clergy.

"The Baptists were the most numerous class of dissenters, and the first to resist the established hierarchy. Their ministers were generally poor men, warm-hearted, and affectionate, and spent much time in gratuitous services in promoting the spiritual welfare of their fellow-men. It is not certain that there was ever an existing law in the colony of Virginia that authorized the imprisonment of any person for preaching the gospel. The law for preserving peace and order, and to 'preserve the purity of doctrine and unity of the church,' was so construed, and whenever preachers were apprehended and imprisoned, it was done by virtue of a peace warrant.

"The first conviction and actual imprisonment under this construction of law was in Spotsylvania county, on the 4th of June, 1768, when John Waller, Lewis Craig, James Childs, and others were dragged before the magistrates, and bound over for trial. Three days after they were put on their trial as 'disturbers of the peace.' The prosecuting attorney made this formidable charge: 'May it please your worships, these men are great disturbers of the peace; they cannot meet a man in the road but they must ram a text of Scripture down his throat.' Elder Waller made an ingenious and able defence, and perplexed the judges to know what to do with these singular criminals. They offered to release them, if they would pledge themselves to preach no more in that county. Of course they refused this pledge, and were sent to jail, and closely imprisoned forty-three days, and finally liberated by the authority of the deputy governor, Hon. John Blair. Others were imprisoned in other counties, and at various times, from 1768 to 1775. From the time that Patrick Henry drove the clergy from the court house in Hanover, to the revolutionary war, he was not only the friend of liberty and foe to every form of oppression, but also a firm friend of the persecuted Baptists. Mr. Hinde, in his sketches, says, 'The parsons' case had but recently been disposed of, when Henry discovered that others also felt the heavy hand of oppression; that the rights of conscience, as well as of property, had been invaded by those who held the authority of law; that the Baptists (called by others Anabaptists) were afflicted; and that, for preaching the gospel contrary to the regulations of the established church, many were persecuted, arrested, imprisoned, and some almost starved to death on bread and water.'

"Mr. Hinde did not learn from his informers whether the successful defence of Mr. Henry was at the liberation from prison of Waller, Craig, and Childs, before referred to, or on another similar occasion. Mr. Ficklin's account, who lived near Fredricksburg, and was present on the occasion, gives the names of 'Lewis Craig, Joseph Craig, and Aaron Bledsoe.' Mr. Bennett, who also was present, and gave from memory the 'speech,' did not give the names of the persecuted preachers, but states 'three Baptist preachers.' Be this as it may, an indictment had been issued against them for 'preaching the gospel of the Son of God,' contrary to the statute in that case provided, and therefore disturbers of the peace. The clerk was reading the indictment in a slow and formal manner, and as he pronounced the crime with emphasis, 'for preaching the gospel of the Son of God,' a plain-dressed man, who had just rode up to the court house, entered and took his seat within the bar. He was known to the court and lawyers, but a stranger to the mass of spectators who had gathered on the occasion. This was Patrick Henry, who, on hearing of this prosecution, had rode some fifty or sixty miles from his residence in Hanover county, to volunteer his services in their defence. He listened to the further reading of the indictment with marked attention, the first sentence of which, that had caught his ear, was, 'for preaching the gospel of the Son of God.' When it was finished and the prosecuting attorney had submitted a few remarks, Henry arose, reached out his hand, and received the paper, and addressed the court:—

"May it please your worships: I think I heard read by the prosecutor, as I entered this house, the paper I now hold in my hand. If I have rightly understood, the king's attorney of this colony has framed an indictment for the purpose of arraigning and punishing by imprisonment the three inoffensive persons before the bar of this court, for a crime of great magnitude—as disturbers of the peace. May it please the court, what did I hear read? Did I hear it distinctly, or was it a mistake of my own? Did I hear an expression, as if a crime, that these men, whom your worships are about to try for a misdemeanor, are charged with—what? and continuing in a low, solemn, heavy tone, 'for preaching the gospel of the Son of God.' Pausing amidst the most profound silence and breathless astonishment, he slowly waved the paper three times around his head, when, lifting his hands and eyes to heaven, with peculiar and impressive energy, he exclaimed, 'Great God!' The exclamation, the action, the burst of feeling from the audience, were all overpowering. Mr. Henry resumed:—

"May it please your worships: In a day like this, when truth is about to burst her fetters; when mankind are about to be aroused to claim their natural and inalienable rights; when the yoke of oppression that has reached the wilderness of America, and the unnatural alliance of ecclesiastical and civil power, are about to be dissevered.—at such a period, when liberty—liberty of conscience—is about to awake from her slumberings, and inquire into the reason of such charges as I find exhibited here to-day in this indictment! Another fearful pause, while the speaker alternately cast his sharp, piercing eyes on the court and the prisoners, and resumed: 'If I am not deceived, according to the contents of the paper I now hold in my hand, these men are accused of "preaching the gospel of the Son of God."—Great God!' Another long pause, while he again waved the indictment around his head, while a deeper impression was made on the auditory. Resuming his speech, 'May it please your worships, there are periods in the history of man, when corruption and depravity have so long debased the human character, that man sinks under the weight of the oppressor's hand, and becomes his servile, his abject slave; he licks the hand that smites him; he bows in passive obedience to the mandates of the despot, and in this state of servility he receives his fetters of perpetual bondage. But, may it please your worships, such a day has passed away! From that period, when our fathers left the land of their nativity for settlement in these American wilds—for liberty—for civil and religious liberty—for liberty of conscience—to worship his Creator according to his conceptions of Heaven's revealed will; from the moment he placed his foot on the American continent, and in the deeply-imbedded forests sought an asylum from persecution and tyranny—from that moment despotism was crushed; her fetters of darkness were broken, and Heaven decreed that man should be free—free to worship God according to the Bible. Were it not for this, in vain have been the efforts and sacrifices of the colonists; in vain were all their sufferings and bloodshed to subjugate this new world, if we, their offspring, must still be oppressed and persecuted. But, may it please your worships, permit me to inquire once more, For what are these men about to be tried? This paper says, for preaching the gospel of the Son of God.'" Great

God! for preaching the gospel of the Savior to Adam's fallen race." And in tones of thunder he exclaimed, 'What law have they violated?' while the third time, in a slow, dignified manner, he lifted his eyes to heaven, and waved the indictment around his head. The court and audience were now wrought up to the most intense pitch of excitement. The face of the prosecuting attorney was pallid and ghastly, and he appeared unconscious that his whole frame was agitated with alarm; while the judge, in a tremulous voice, put an end to the scene, now becoming excessively painful, by the authoritative declaration, 'Sheriff, discharge those men!'"

The descendants of Patrick Henry are now members of Baptist churches.

1045. DANIEL WEBSTER'S CELEBRITY.

Daniel Webster.

The following anecdote of Daniel Webster is from a source on which may be placed the most implicit reliance:—

"In calling up the memory of that great civilian," (Judge Story.) "I am reminded of an interesting anecdote he related. It was in 1835. I was attending the Circuit Court in Portland, and boarded at the same hotel with Judge Story and some of the bar. One day after dinner, as we sat listening to his rich conversation, some one spoke of the Dartmouth College question, when Judge Story described to us the first appearance of the power of Mr. Webster, as evinced in that celebrated case. He spoke of him as a stranger, but little known at that time. The trial came on in March, 1818. The court room was crowded. Many distinguished spectators were present. The case was of no common kind; it touched the happiness, the preservation, the glory of our common country; for every college and seminary of learning in the Union was interested in the result. Mr. Webster felt the magnitude of his cause, and the great responsibility resting upon his shoulders. He rose up to address the court. Every eye was fixed upon him—every ear was open. He began slowly and in a low voice. His nerves were slightly tremulous, and the papers shook in his hand. His face looked troubled; the deep anxiety portrayed in his features excited the sympathy of the kindest feelings of the court for one who stood before them, a modest, unassuming man, a stranger, and with an overwhelming brow and look of no common care. But he went on, step by step, with arguments, with authorities, with appeals to the supreme tribunal before him; each step his voice rose into energy and power; his face brightened up, his eye kindled, and, ere long, the attention became so profound, and the interest of the whole assembly so great, from the magnitude of the question and the manner in which he presented it, that not merely a breathless silence prevailed, but even tears started in many an eye, and some were seen to fall from members of the bench. He won his case. It was his début; and from that moment Daniel Webster stood invincible, and took a stand in eloquence which has seldom been surpassed.

"Such is a feeble and impotent sketch of a most impressive anecdote, to which I listened with interest as it fell from the lips of a man who was himself a model of elegance, and a guide to eloquence in his judicial life."

1046. PATRICK HENRY HUNTING AND PLEADING.

After Patrick Henry's removal to Louisa, he has been known to hunt deer, frequently for several days together, carrying his provision with him, and at night encamping in the woods. After the hunt was over, he would go from the ground to Louisa court, clad in a coarse cloth coat, stained with all the trophies of the chase, greasy leather breeches, ornamented in the same way, leggins for boots, and a pair of saddle-bags on his arm. Thus accoutred, he would enter the court house, take up the first of his causes that chanced to be called, and, if there was any scope for his peculiar talent, throw his adversary into the background, and astonish both court and jury by the powerful effusions of his natural eloquence.

1047. CHALMERS IN LONDON.

When Dr. Chalmers first visited London, the hold that he took on the minds of men was unprecedented. It was a time of strong political feeling; but even that was unheeded, and all parties thronged to hear the Scottish preacher. The very best judges were not prepared for the display that they heard. Canning and Wilberforce went together, and got into a pew near the door. The elder in attendance stood alone by the pew. Chalmers began in his usual unpromising way, by stating a few nearly self-evident propositions, neither in the choicest language, nor in the most impressive voice. "If this be all," said Canning to his companion, "it will never do." Chalmers went on—the shuffling of the conversation gradually subsided. He got into the mass of his subject; his weakness became strength, his hesitation was turned into energy, and, bringing the whole volume of his mind to bear upon it, he poured forth a torrent of the most close and conclusive argument, brilliant with all the exuberance of an imagination which ranged over all nature for illustrations, and yet managed and applied each of them with the same unerring dexterity, as if that single one had been the study of a whole life. "The tartan beats us," said Mr. Canning; "we have no preaching like that in England."

1048. DISPLAY OF ELOQUENCE IN DANGER.

General Warren, who fell at Bunker Hill, was not only possessed of great eloquence, but the most undaunted courage.

Both were finely illustrated on the delivery of his second anniversary oration, on the 6th of March, 1775. Some British officers of the army then in Boston had publicly declared that it should be at the price of life of any man to speak of the event of March 5, 1770, on that anniversary. Warren's soul took fire at such a threat, so openly made, and he wished for the honor of braving it. This was readily granted, for at such a time a man would probably find but few rivals. Many, who would spurn the thought of personal fear, might be apprehensive that they would be so far disconcerted as to forget their discourse. It is easier to fight bravely than to think clearly or correctly in danger. Passion sometimes nerves the arm to fight, but disturbs the regular current of thought. The day came, and the weather was remarkably fine. The Old South Meeting-house was crowded at an early hour. The British officers occupied the aisles, the flight of steps to the pulpit, and several of them were within it. It was not precisely known whether this was accident or design. The orator, with the assistance of his friends, made his entrance at the pulpit window by a ladder. The officers, seeing his coolness and intrepidity, made way for him to advance and address the audience. An awful stillness preceded his exordium. Each man felt the palpitations of his own heart, and saw the pale but determined face of his neighbor. The speaker began his oration in a firm tone of voice, and proceeded with great energy and pathos.

Warren and his friends were prepared to chastise contumely, prevent disgrace, and avenge an attempt at assassination.

The scene was sublime; a patriot in whom the flush of youth and the grace and dignity of manhood were combined, stood armed in the sanctuary of God, to animate and encourage the sons of liberty, and to hurl defiance at their oppressors. The orator commenced with the early history of the country, described the tenure by which we held our liberties and property, the affection we had constantly shown the parent country, and boldly told them how, and by whom, these blessings of life had been violated. There was in this appeal to Britain, in this description of suffering, agony and horror, a calm and high-souled defiance, which must have chilled the blood of every sensible foe. Such another hour has seldom happened in the history of man, and is not surpassed in the records of nations. The thunders of Demosthenes rolled at a distance from Phillip and his host, and Tully poured the fiercest torrents of his invective when Catiline was at a distance, and his dagger no longer to be feared; but Warren's speech was made to proud oppressors resting on their arms, whose errand it was to overawe, and whose business it was to fight.

1049. AN INDIAN'S TOUCHING ELOQUENCE.

At the battle of Freehold, during the first American war, a young English officer, closely pressed by two Abenakis Indians with upraised hatchets, no longer hoped for life, and only resolved to sell it dearly. At the moment when he expected to sink beneath them, an old Indian armed with a bow, approached him, and prepared to aim an arrow; but having adjusted it, in an instant he dropped his bow, and ran to throw himself between the young officer and his assailants, who immediately retired with respect.

The old man took his prisoner by the hand, encouraged him by caresses, and conducted him to his cabin. It was winter, and the Indians were retiring home. Here he kept him for some time, treating him with undiminished softness, and making him less his slave than his companion. At length he taught him the Abenakis language, and the rude arts in use among that people. They became perfectly satisfied with each other, and the young officer was comparatively happy—except at times when his heart was wrung to perceive the old man intently fix his eyes on him and shed tears.

At the return of spring, the Indians returned to arms, and prepared for the campaign. The old man, yet sufficiently strong to support the fatigues of war, set out with them, accompanied by his prisoner. The Abenakis made a march of more than two hundred leagues across the desert, till at length they arrived within sight of an English camp; the old Indian pointed it out to the young officer, at the same time contemplating him wistfully. "Behold thy brothers!" said he to him; "behold where they wait to give us battle! Hear me. I have saved thy life; I have taught thee to make a canoe, bows, and arrows; to obtain the means to make them from the forest; to manage the hatchet, and to take off the scalp of an enemy. What wert thou when I took thee to my cabin? Thy hands were those of a child; they neither served to nourish nor defend thee; thy soul was in night; thou knewest nothing; thou owest me all! Wilt thou, then be ungrateful enough to join thy brothers, and raise the hatchet against us?"

The young Englishman vowed he would rather lose a thousand lives than spill the blood of one Abenakis. The Indian looked on his prisoner with earnestness, and, in a mingled tone of tenderness and sorrow, inquired, "Hast thou a father?" "He was alive," answered the young man, "when I left my country." "O, how miserable he must be!" cried the Indian; and after a moment of silence, he added, "Knowest thou that I have been a father? I am so no more! I saw my child fall in the battle; he was at my side. I saw him die like a warrior; he was covered with wounds, my child, when he fell. But I have avenged him. Yes, I have avenged him." The Indian, at pronouncing these words, was much agitated; then turning to the east, where the sun was just rising, he said to the young Englishman, "Seest thou that beauteous sun, resplendent of brightness? Hast thou pleasure in seeing it?" "Yes," answered he, "I have pleasure in seeing that beautiful sky." "Ah, well! I have it no more," said the Indian, shedding a torrent of tears. A moment after, he showed the young officer a flowering shrub. "Seest thou that fine tree?" said he to him; "and hast thou pleasure in looking upon it?" "Yes, I have," he answered. "I have it no more," returned the Indian, with precipitation; "but as for thee—go, return to thy country, that thy father may again with pleasure mark the rising sun, and behold the springing flower."

§ 107. APPEARANCE, STYLE, HABITS, PECULIARITIES.

1050. DEMOSTHENES.

When Harpalus, one of Alexander's officers, after betraying his master, and purloining his treasures, made his escape to Athens, it became a question with the Athenians whether they should give the traitor-robber shelter. Demosthenes, to whose opinion the people looked up with reverence, declared, at first, that they ought on no account to disgrace the character of the republic by affording refuge to one so infamous. A day was appointed for the solemn decision of the matter. In the mean time, Harpalus, sensible how much his success depended on gaining over "the prince of orators" to his side, sought and obtained an opportunity of showing Demosthenes the precious store of goodly things of which he had robbed his royal master. The orator was particularly struck with the sight of a massy golden cup, and, poisoning it in his hand, he asked Harpalus what was its weight. Harpalus replied, "To you it shall weigh twenty talents." When Demosthenes had departed, the cup was accordingly sent after him to his house, along with twenty talents in money. Next day, when the cause of Harpalus came on for consideration, Demosthenes appeared in the assembly with his throat muffled up, and when called on to speak, he made signs that he had lost his voice.

To the honor of Athens, this act of abominable venality was not allowed to pass unpunished. It was the cause of a fine of fifty talents being imposed on the orator, to avoid the payment of which he fled to Ægina, where he remained in exile, until an emergency in the affairs of the republic produced his recall.

Demosthenes once observed to Phocion, who was at the head of a party of orators whom Philip had bribed over to his interest, that the Athenians would one day murder him in a mad fit. "Take care," replied Phocion, "that they do not murder you in a sober one."

The warning was prophetic. The Athenians, as the price of their reconciliation with Antipater, were obliged to pass a decree condemning Demosthenes to death. The orator fled for refuge to the temple of Neptune at Celaura; but, inwardly convinced that no place could afford him a sanctuary from such vengeance as pursued him, he drank of poison and died.

1051. PERSONAL APPEARANCE OF LORD CHATHAM.

In figure, Lord Chatham was eminently dignified and commanding. "There was a grandeur in his personal appearance," says a writer, who speaks of him when in his decline, "which produces awe and mute attention; and, though bowed by infirmity and age, his mind shone through the ruins of his body, armed his eye with lightning, and clothed his lip with thunder." Bodily pain never subdued the lofty daring, or the extraordinary activity, of his mind. He even used his crutch as a figure of rhetoric. "You talk, my lords," said he on one occasion, "of conquering America—of your numerous friends there, and your powerful forces to disperse her army. I might as well talk of driving them before me with this crutch." Sir Robert Walpole could not look upon or listen to him without being alarmed, and told his friends, that he "should be glad, at any rate, to muzzle that terrible cornet of horse."

1052. COURAGEOUS ELOQUENCE.

The character of Isocrates presents the rare combination of a man, who, devoid of fear, is recorded to have passed through a long life without having made an enemy of a single individual by the boldness of his eloquence. When Theramenes, proscribed by the thirty tyrants, took refuge at the altar, Isocrates generously volunteered to plead in his defence at the hazard of his own life; and after the death of Socrates, when all his disciples, struck with dismay, fled into distant parts, Isocrates alone had the courage to appear in mourning in the public streets of Athens.

1053. TIMIDITY OF FAMOUS ORATORS.

Isocrates, celebrated for his beautiful oratorical compositions, was of so timid a disposition that he rarely ventured to speak in public. He compared himself to a whetstone, which will not cut, but enables other things to do this; for his productions served as models to other orators. Vaucanson was said to be as much a machine as any he had made.

1054. AN ORATOR'S DOMESTIC ELOQUENCE.

Mr. Pitt was a remarkably shy man. He was on terms of the greatest intimacy with Lord Camden; and being at his house on a morning visit, "Pitt," said his lordship, "my children have heard so much about you, that they are extremely anxious to have a glimpse at the great man. They are just now at dinner in the next room; you will oblige me by going in with me for a moment." "O, pray don't ask me; what on earth could I say to them?" "Give them at least the pleasure of seeing you." And half led, half pushed into the room, the prime minister approached the little group, looked from their father to them, from them to their father, remained for several minutes twirling his hat, without finding a single sentence at his disposal, and departed. So much for the domestic eloquence of an orator.

1055. BURKE'S METAPHORS

Mr. Burke, above all men, figured in a mode of metaphorical expression. On the 7th of June, 1794, when speaking on the Begum charge, on the trial of Hastings, and describing the happy situations of the provinces of Oude, Benares, and Goruckpore, before they were under Mr. Hastings's protection, used the following: "He is worse than Satan, for he showed the kingdoms of the world to the great Author of our sacred religion, in order that he might enjoy them; but he (turning to the bar) gave the province of Hindostan into the possession of men appointed by himself, for the purpose of destroying them." Mr. Hastings at this expression lifted up his eyes and hands. Again, when he spoke of the treasures deposited with the Begums, which Mr. Hastings seized, Mr. Burke said, "The prisoner at your bar, stepping beyond even the heathen mythology, was in his own opinion greater than Jove, who was esteemed the immortal god of the ancients; for Jove condescended to embrace a frail woman in a shower of gold; but Mr. Hastings paid more impressive adoration to the old Begums of Oude, for the purpose of seizing and stripping them of their gold. Here," said Mr. Burke, "is the distinction between the Jove of the ancients and the Jove of the East Indies. But your lordships' classical knowledge will convey to you that the first was fabulous, and I trust that the evidence adduced will convince your lordships the last is real." Mr. Burke, in his eulogium upon that extraordinary man, Mr. Charles Townshend, among other things said, "His style of argument was neither trite nor vulgar, nor subtle and abstruse: he hit the house just between wind and water."

1056. SHERIDAN'S PROCRASTINATION

Much of the inconvenience to which Sheridan was subjected arose from his procrastination; whether it was a deed to sign or a letter to frank, he would still put off doing it. Nothing was ever done in time or place. Letters containing money, or bearing intelligence of importance, remained unopened. Whether private or official business demanded his attention, still there was the same indolence, the same unwillingness to apply, which eventually led to the most serious results. Professor Smyth was waiting one morning for him in his ante-room, and happened to cast his eyes on a table that stood in the middle of the room, covered with manuscripts, plays, pamphlets and papers of every description. As he proceeded to tumble them over and look at the superscriptions, he observed that the letters were most of them unopened, and that some of them had coronets on the seal. He remarked to Mr. Westley, the treasurer of Drury Lane, who was sitting by the fire, having also for a long time danced attendance, that Mr. Sheridan treated all alike: waffer or coronet, pauper or peer, the letters seemed equally unopened. "Just so," was the treasurer's reply: "indeed, last winter I was occupying myself as you are doing, and for the same reason, and what should I see among these letters but one from myself, unopened like the rest — a letter that I knew contained a ten pound note within it. The history, sir, was, that I had received a note from Mr. Sheridan dated Bath, and headed with the words 'money bound,' and entreating me to send the first ten pounds I could lay my hands upon. This I did. In the mean time, I suppose some one had given him a cast in his carriage up to town, and his application to me had never more been thought of; and, therefore, there lay my letter, and would have continued to lie till the housemaid had swept it with the rest into the fire, if I had not accidentally seen it." Mr. Smyth could not help, on going down stairs, telling the story to his valet, Edwards, suggesting to him to look after the letters; to which he replied, "What can I do for such a master? The other morning I went to settle his room after he had gone out, and, on throwing open the windows, found them stuffed with bank notes; there had been a high wind in the night — the windows, I suppose, had rattled — he had come in quite intoxicated; and in the dark, for want of something better, stuffed the bank notes into the casement! and as he never knows what he has in his pocket or what he has not, they were never afterwards missed."

1057. SHERIDAN'S VINOUS ELOQUENCE.

The following anecdote of Sheridan's vinous eloquence we had from the lips of one of the oldest surviving friends and followers of Fox, and himself a highly influential whig of the old school. This gentleman and Sheridan had dined together at Belamy's; and Sheridan, having taken his allowance, gave his accustomed signal for a move. This signal consisted of the words, "Now I shall go down and see what's doing in the house;" which in reality meant, and was always so interpreted by whoever dined in his company, "I have drunk enough; my share of the business is done; now do yours; call for the bill, and pay it." On this occasion the usual course was pursued; and the bill having been settled by Sheridan's friend, the latter, hearing that Sheridan was "up," felt curious to know what he could possibly be at, knowing the "glorious" state in which he had just departed. Accordingly, he entered the house, and, to his no small astonishment, found Sheridan in a fit of most fervent oratory, thundering forth the following well-known passage: "Give them a corrupt House of Lords; give them a venal House of Commons; give them a tyrannical prince; give them a truckling court; and let me have but an unfettered press, and I will defy them to encroach a hair's breadth upon the liberties of England!"

1058. DEVOTION TO THE PUBLIC TO THE NEGLECT OF SELF.

The following sentences of George Selwyn respecting Charles Fox are applicable to many statesmen and scholars of improvident personal character: —

"He can make his understanding useful to the whole world, but will not, on any account, permit it to be useful to himself. He never seems to mistake, but in his own affairs: he thinks that however involved and chaotic they may be, he can set them right any morning he chooses; and the morning never comes!"

1059. TIME TO GET UP.

Grattan, the celebrated Irish barrister, was indefatigably industrious. He was so anxious not to lose a moment in sleep, which in his opinion ought to be devoted to study, that he contrived a singular apparatus to rouse him regularly at daybreak. A small barrel filled with water was placed over a basin, which stood on a shelf immediately above his pillow, and the cock of it was sufficiently turned to fill the basin by daylight; so that if he did not then rise, the water flowed upon his person and bedding.

1060. LORD ERSKINE.

When Lord Erskine made his début at the bar, his agitation almost overcame him, and he was just going to sit down. "At that moment," said he, "I thought I felt my little children tugging at my gown, and the idea roused me to an exertion of which I did not think myself capable."

1061. POLITICAL MEANNESS.

When Lord Erskine first rose to speak in Parliament, Pitt leaned forward, as if to catch every word he should utter, and held a pen in his hand, as if to take notes. After listening to a few sentences, he flung the pen and paper on the floor with an air of supreme contempt. It was doubtless a trick of Pitt's to damage Erskine, who was in the opposition, and showed to what meanness politicians can sometimes descend.

1062. INDUSTRIOUS IDLENESS.

Curran's notions of industry were somewhat ludicrous. An hour to him was a day to another man; and in his natural capabilities his idleness found a powerful auxiliary. A single glance made him master of the subject; and though imagination could not supply him with facts, still it very often became a successful substitute for authorities. He once said, in serious refutation of what he called the professional calumnies on this subject, that he was quite as laborious as was necessary for any nisi prius advocate to be. "For," said he, with the utmost simplicity, "I always perused my briefs carefully when I was concerned for the plaintiff; and it was not necessary to do it for the defendant, because, you know, I could pick up the facts from the opposite counsel's statements." This was what Curran considered being laborious; and, to say the truth, it was at best but an industrious idleness.

1063. CURRAN'S OPINION OF SELF-PRaise.

Curran and Erskine had frequent opportunities of meeting, and must have looked on each other's powers with respect. On one occasion Grattan's name was mentioned; and Erskine casually asked what "he said of himself." "Said of himself!" was Curran's astonished interjection; "nothing. Grattan speak of himself! Why, sir, Henry Grattan is a great man. Sir, the torture could not wring a syllable of self-praise from Grattan; a team of six horses could not drag an opinion of himself out of him. Like all great men, he knows the strength of his reputation, and will never condescend to proclaim its march like the trumpeter of a puppet-show. Sir, he stands on a national altar, and it is the business of us inferior men to keep up the fire of the incense. You will never see Grattan stooping to do either the one or the other."

This sally may have been stimulated in some degree by one of those fits of irritability to which Curran was liable; but no man could be more entitled to the praise than the speaker himself. Of course, every man of vigorous faculties knows his own powers, and knows them better than the world can. But no popular applause, — and he was its idol, — no homage of his profession, — and he was the acknowledged meteor of the Irish bar, — and no admiration of private society, — and he was the delight of the table, — could ever betray Curran into self-praise.

It must be supposed, that when he was thus scrupulous in his own instance, he demanded no less reserve from others. When Lord Byron rose into fame, Curran constantly objected to his talking of himself, as the great drawback on his poetry.

"Any subject," said he, "but that eternal one of self. I am weary of knowing once a month the state of any man's hopes or fears, rights or wrongs. I should as soon read a register of the weather, the barometer up so many inches to-day and down so many inches to-morrow. I feel scepticism all over me at the sight of agonies on paper, things that come as regular and as notorious as the full of the moon. The truth is, his lordship weeps for the press, and wipes his eyes with the public."

1064. WALPOLE'S REMARK UPON FOX.

"What a man," says Walpole, "Fox is! After his long and exhausting speech on Hastings's trial, he was seen handing ladies into their coaches, with all the gayety and prattle of an idle gallant."

1065. ROBESPIERRE.

The following is a brief and striking sketch of the man who attained so sanguinary a celebrity, and reigned absolute sultan of the "reign of terror." —

"I had two private conversations with Robespierre," says Dumont; "he had a sinister aspect; he never looked one in the face; he had a twinkling, winking motion in his eyes, which was continual and painful. Once I saw him on some business relating to Geneva. He asked some explanations from me, and I pressed him to speak: he told me that he was as timid as a child; that he always trembled when he rose to speak in public, and from the moment he so began speaking, he could not hear his own voice."

1066. MIRABEAU.

When a certain lady, who had been charmed by his writings, but had never seen his person, wrote to Mirabeau, saying how much she longed to see him, and begged that he would describe himself to her, he complied with the request of the fair enthusiast, in these brief and self-adulatory terms: "Figure to yourself a tiger that has had the small-pox."

1067. PERSONAL APPEARANCE OF LORD BROUGHAM.

Rev. Mr. Clark, in his Glimpses of the Old World, thus describes the appearance of this celebrated orator: —

"Lord Brougham's appearance is rather striking. He is somewhat tall, quite thin, rather careless in his personal appearance, with a face into which, when he is speaking, is thrown infinite expression. I never saw the man who played off with so much facility and effect whole volleys of the most keen and caustic satire. When assailing an opponent, having cut off all possibility of retreat, he seems to delight to stand and wave over him in taunt his shining cimex, before it descends with merciless and exterminating power. His words do not express half the meaning that is conveyed while he is speaking. He has the habit of drawing up one side of his face, and especially the left nostril, into such an aquiline shape, when about to utter any thing particularly caustic, that every word seems to derive immense point from the peculiar expression of his countenance.

1066. BROUGHAM AND WEBSTER.

Henry Lord Brougham.

A sketcher in the New York Gazette contributes, among other interesting matter, the following anecdote of the "learned lord" whose sarcastic and severely humorous manner has become so celebrated, and who is said to be incapable of letting any opportunity pass which admits of a touch at some opponent. The annexed anecdote is illustrative of his temper and manner.

It occurred at the time Mr. Webster was last in England, and at a period when the then ministry stood in a tottering position, and were expected every hour to throw up their hands and give place to others. Lord Brougham accompanied Mr. Webster one evening to the House of Lords, and placed himself in rather a conspicuous position, and wending his way among the members, chatting to one and to another, and evidently letting them know that a distinguished visitor was present; for those he spoke to would turn and take a look at "our senator." Shortly after, a member rose, and asked the postponement of some resolutions which had been marked down for discussion that evening, and in the course of his request expressed a hope that it would meet the approbation and assent of the "learned lord."

Whereupon Lord B. nodded assent. This done, another similar request was made by another member in regard to another resolution, and also hoping it would meet the assent of the "learned lord." This drew from him a like assent, with an extra nervous twitch of his nose and cheek. And, strange to say, a third and similar request followed, with an equally special hope that it would also meet the assent of the "learned lord;" whereupon his learned lordship rose, and, taking his peculiar attitude, remarked that when he came down to the house that evening, he did not suppose that so much honor and personal distinction awaited him — that he had scarcely got his seat before one noble lord made a direct appeal to him for his assent to the postponement of one question, and this followed by a second appeal from another noble lord, and now again comes a third, equally looking to his special acquiescence. "Why, me luds, this is strange indeed; and not less embarrassing to me. Should any distinguished stranger be now present," (and here he turned and looked towards Mr. Webster, and nearly every head turned instinctively in that direction also,) — "I say, me luds, if any distinguished stranger were here present, he would really be led to suppose that I was a man of some consequence here, when it is well known to your ludships that I have at this present moment no more weight or influence in this house than" (here he paused, and looking over the table that separated him from the ministerial bench, and making a bow in that direction) — "than any of her majesty's ministers."

This, of course, brought forth a general chuckle, in which the ministers themselves could scarcely refrain from joining.

1069. EXTRAORDINARY POWER OF ENDURANCE.

It is related of Lord Brougham that on one occasion, after having practised all day as a barrister, he went to the House of Commons, where he was engaged in active debate through the night, till three o'clock in the morning; he then returned home; wrote an article for the Edinburgh Review; spent the next day in court, practising law, and the succeeding night in the House of Commons; returned to his lodgings at three o'clock in the morning, and "retired, simply because he had nothing else to do."

1070. PATRICK HENRY'S BOLDNESS OF SPEECH.

Among the most prominent contributors to the foundation of our country's independence were the resolutions framed by Patrick Henry, and passed by the House of Burgesses of Virginia, in May, 1765, in opposition to the British stamp act. "By these resolutions," says Mr. Jefferson, "and his manner of supporting them, Mr. Henry took the lead out of the hands of those who had theretofore guided the proceedings of the house; that is to say, of Pendleton, Wythe, Bland, and Randolph." It was, indeed, the measure which raised him to the zenith of his glory. He had never before had a subject which entirely matched his genius, and was capable of drawing out all the powers of his mind. It was remarked of him, throughout his life, that his talents never failed to rise with the occasion, and in proportion with the resistance which he had to encounter. The nicety of the vote on his last resolution proves that this was not a time to hold in reserve any part of his forces. It was, indeed, an Alpine passage, under circumstances even more unpropitious than those of Hannibal; for he had not only to fight, hand to hand, the powerful party who were already in possession of the heights, but at the same instant to cheer and animate the timid band of followers that were trembling, and fainting, and drawing back below him. It was an occasion that called upon him to put forth all his strength, and he did put it forth, in such a manner as man never did before. The cords of argument with which his adversaries frequently flattered themselves that they had bound him fast, became packthreads in his hands. He burst them with as much ease as the unshorn Samson did the bands of the Philistines. He seized the pillars of the temple, shook them terribly, and seemed to threaten his opponents with ruin. It was an incessant storm of lightning and thunder, which struck them aghast. The faint-hearted gathered courage from his countenance, and cowards became heroes while they gazed upon his exploits.

It was in the midst of this magnificent debate, while he was descanting on the tyranny of the obnoxious act, that he exclaimed, in a voice of thunder, — "Cæsar had his Brutus, Charles I. his Cromwell, and George III." ("Treason!" cried the speaker. "Treason! treason!" echoed from every part of the house. It was one of those trying moments which is decisive of character. Henry faltered not for an instant; but rising to a loftier attitude, and fixing on the speaker an eye of the most determined fire, he finished his sentence with the firmest emphasis,) "may profit by their example! If this be treason, make the most of it!"

The late William Wirt, alluding to the foregoing, says, "I had frequently heard the above anecdote of the cry of treason, but with such variations of the concluding words, that I began to doubt whether the whole might not be fiction. With a view to ascertain the truth, therefore, I submitted it to Mr. Jefferson, as it had been given to me by Judge Tyler, and this was his answer: 'I well remember the cry of treason, the pause of Mr. Henry at the name of George III., and the presence of mind with which he closed his sentence, and baffled the charge vociferated.' The incident, therefore, becomes authentic history."

1071. WEBSTER'S DIFFIDENCE.

Daniel Webster, when a schoolboy, succeeded very poorly in declamation. "Many a piece," he says, "did I commit to memory, and rehearse it in my own room, over and over again; but when the day came, when the school collected, when my name was called, and I saw all eyes turned upon my seat, I could not raise myself from it."

1072. WEBSTER'S CLEARNESS OF THOUGHT AND EXPRESSION.

It is related of David Crockett, that on his arrival at Washington, he heard Mr. Webster, and afterwards meeting him somewhere in the Capitol, accosted him thus: "Is this Mr. Webster?" "Yes, sir." "The great Mr. Webster, of Massachusetts?" "I am Mr. Webster, of Massachusetts." "Well, sir," continued Mr. Crockett, "I had heard that you were a great man, but I don't think so. I heard your speech, and understood every word you said." There is never any difficulty in understanding Mr. Webster. Neither is there any difficulty in understanding Dr. Wayland. Mr. Webster addresses his auditors almost colloquially: thinking clearly, his words come forth the most perfect exponents of his thoughts; and when he rises to the regions of impressive grandeur, that grandeur is but the simple, unpretending expression of the grandeur which is in him.

1073. RANDOLPH.

Randolph, in dress and appearance, at the age of thirty-five years, appeared like a lad of eighteen. It was not so much what was said, but the speaker's manner and appearance, that gave it such withering force, generally, if not always, in debate, pointing his skinny finger with ludicrous and feeling effect.

John Randolph.

It was during the session of the Virginia convention, of which he was a member, that a large crowd had assembled, among it many ladies, patiently waiting to hear him on a subject in which he was known to be interested. It was near five o'clock P. M. before his long, lank form was seen quickly to pop up from its seat. The hum of voices was instantly hushed, all listening for the first words of his speech. Looking around for some time, he said, —

"I do not feel, Mr. President, that this convention is a suitable place for ladies, and I must plainly tell them that I shall quickly speak that which will make them move."

It was enough: the galleries were cleared of the ladies in double quick time, when he proceeded.

A gentleman (my old and lamented schoolmaster) once told me that he had been standing some five hours in the hall, waiting to hear Randolph, and had become almost tired out; but when he commenced, his fatigue seemed suddenly to leave him, and so rich was the repast, such "a feast of reason and a flow of soul," that he would willingly have remained five hours more after its conclusion.

His sarcastic reply to John Hampden Pleasants, the editor of the Richmond Whig, is very generally known, but the circumstances attending it may not be uninteresting. During a speech in Congress, he had been so bitter and violent in his attack upon the editor of the Richmond Whig as to induce Mr. Pleasants to proceed to Washington, to give him a cowhiding. Mr. P. had barely gotten on Pennsylvania Avenue, when he beheld Randolph approaching, and, wishing to provoke him, he placed himself directly in his path, and insultingly remarked, "I never give way for a scoundrel;" when, quick as thought, and with great suavity and nonchalance of manner, Randolph passed round him, replying, "I always do, sir."

So good was the retort that it disarmed Pleasants, — who ever enjoyed a good joke, — and he stood laughing while Randolph quietly pursued his way, as if nothing had ever happened. Pleasants told this joke as the best he ever enjoyed.

1074. GOVERNOR BISSEL.

A few years since, a large number of distinguished persons assembled at Middletown, Connecticut, to participate in the commencement ceremonies of the Wesleyan University. Among the rest, Governor Bissel was expected, and elegant rooms were provided for him at the largest and best hotel in the place. At length his excellency, the governor, arrived. He is a plain, diminutive-looking man, though of a strong, masculine mind, and great powers of oratory. He went to the hotel where quarters had been assigned him, and entered his name; but nobody was in who happened to know him, and he was not suspected of being any thing more than an every-day man, from the country. At length he asked for a room and a bed. He was told that every room in the house was occupied, and that the best thing they could do for him was to make him a temporary bed on the floor. To this he did not object, and bivouacked for the night on a blanket spread over the carpet. The mortification of the landlord may be imagined, when he found out, on the next day, that the stately rooms prepared for his excellency were unoccupied and waiting, while the governor himself had been obliged to take quarters on the floor.

1075. RANDOLPH'S ACCURACY.

It is stated in one of the biographies of John Randolph, as an instance of his critical knowledge of the English language, that while Dr. Parrish attended him as medical adviser, during his last illness, the following scene occurred:—

Whilst the doctor was reading for Randolph, the word "impetus" occurred. Dr. P. pronounced it "impetus," laying the accent on the second syllable. Randolph, weak and dying as he was, immediately interrupted him with,—

"Wrong, doctor; impetus, if you please."

Shortly afterwards, while reading a chapter in the Bible, he read the word "omnipotent," accenting on the third syllable. Randolph exclaimed,— "Wrong again, doctor; omnipotent is the word."

§ 108. HONORS.

1076. THE PRAISES OF THE MULTITUDE.

Phocion, the great Athenian general, having finished a speech, was applauded by the populace.

"I fear," said he, when he heard their acclamations, "I have said something foolish."

Did ever any of the modern orators, who are fond of haranguing the mob, read this anecdote?

1077. CATO OF UTICA.

It is told of this great man, that in a certain debate in the assembly of the senate, he was making a long speech, merely for the purpose of protracting the business, and preventing the adoption of a measure which he disapproved. His intention being evident, Julius Cæsar (then consul, and friendly to the measure in question) determined to put an end to his obnoxious harangue; and with that view arbitrarily ordered an officer to take him into custody, and conduct him to prison. But no sooner was the order issued, than the entire assembly at once rose from their seats to accompany him, and partake of his imprisonment; so great was the respect which his countrymen bore towards him. The effect this voluntary movement had upon Cæsar induced him, by a sense of shame, to revoke his imperious mandate.

1078. GRATTAN'S PANEGYRIC ON LORD CHATHAM.

Mr. Grattan never lighted the fire of his eloquence into a more splendid blaze than when he pronounced a panegyric on the great Lord Chatham. Speaking of his lordship, Mr. Grattan said, "His eloquence was an era in the senate peculiar and spontaneous, familiarly expressing gigantic sentiments and instructive wisdom; not like the torrents of Demosthenes, or the splendid conflagration of Tully. It resembled sometimes the thunder, and sometimes the music of the spheres. It lightened on the subject, and reached the point by the flashings of the mind, which, like those of the eye, were felt, but could not be followed.

"Upon the whole, there was in this man something that could create, subvert, or reform; an understanding, a spirit, and an eloquence to summon mankind to society, or to break the bonds of slavery asunder, and to rule the wilderness of free minds with unbounded authority; something that could establish or overwhelm an empire, and strike a blow in the world that should resound throughout the universe."

1079. FOX AND PITT.

Those distinguished orators and rivals, notwithstanding their political hostility, entertained the utmost respect for each other's talents. After the close of the first session in which Mr. Pitt appeared in Parliament, a friend of Mr. Fox saying, "Mr. Pitt, I think, promises to be one of the first speakers ever heard in the House of Commons," he instantly replied, "He is so already." From this and other testimonies, it appears that Mr. Fox was very early impressed with a high idea of Mr. Pitt's talents. It ought to be mentioned, to the mutual credit of these great men, that in future life, when they were the leaders of two opposite parties, and the supporters of different systems of politics, they always, in private, spoke of each other's abilities with the highest respect. Mr. Fox, in addressing the electors of Westminster, soon after he had resigned the seals as secretary of state, and Mr. Pitt had been appointed chancellor of the exchequer, bore the highest testimony to the talents of his rival; and at a late period of Mr. Pitt's administration, he said, that he had been narrowly watching Mr. Pitt for many years, and could never catch him tripping once. Mr. Pitt also considered Mr. Fox as far superior to any of his opponents, as a debater in the House of Commons.

1080. BURKE.

Beaconsfield, Residence of Burke.

At the time when Mr. Burke was selected to be the private secretary to the Marquis of Rockingham, he was an author, in the service of Mr. Doddsley, the bookseller. He had conducted for that gentleman the Annual Register, a work of considerable reputation and merit, first established in the year 1758; and it was conducted under the direction of Mr. Burke to a very late period of his life. The political knowledge of Mr. Burke might be considered almost as an encyclopædia; every man who approached him received instruction from his stores; and his failings — for failings he had — were not visible at that time; perhaps they did not then exist; perhaps they grew up in the progress of his political life. When Mr. Burke entered into the service of the Marquis of Rockingham, he was not rich; but the munificent generosity of that nobleman immediately placed him in an affluent situation. Mr. Burke purchased a beautiful villa, at Beaconsfield, which was paid for by the Marquis of Rockingham. When Dr. Johnson, who, like Mr. Burke, had subsisted by his labors as an author, visited his friend at his new purchase, he could not help exclaiming with the shepherd in Virgil's Eclogue, —

"Non equidem invidio, miror magis."

But the Marquis of Rockingham's liberality was not confined to the person of Mr. Burke; he procured for Mr. William Burke, his cousin, and most confidential connection, the employment of under secretary of state to General Conway; and he gave to Mr. Edmund Burke's brother, Richard Burke, the place of collector of the customs at Grenada.

"I had lived," says Mr. Nicholls, "in habits of acquaintance with Mr. Edmund Burke. I had no prejudices against him; for he had not at that time involved my country in the crusade against French principles. Before he brought forward the charges against Mr. Hastings, he conversed with me very fully on the subject. I put this question to him: 'Can you prove that Mr. Hastings ever derived any advantage to himself from that misconduct which you impute to him?' He acknowledged that he could not; but added, that his whole government of India had been one continued violation of the great principle of justice. Before the charges were laid on the table, I had a second conversation with Mr. Burke on the subject. When he found that I persevered in my opinion, he told me that in that case I must relinquish the friendship of the Duke of Portland. I replied, that would give me pain, but that I would rather relinquish the Duke of Portland's friendship than support an impeachment which I did not approve. We parted, and our intercourse was terminated.

"But the great injury which Mr. Burke did to his country was by preaching the crusade against French principles. He was emphatically the Peter the Hermit, who preached up this holy war. I consider this as the great measure of his life, and if I have ever spoken of him with harshness, my language has been the result of my feelings on this subject. The French revolution, at its very commencement, excited great alarm in the minds of the princes and nobles, especially of German princes. It is well known that George III. did not conceal his opinion on this head. Mr. Burke expressed his disapprobation of the French revolution at an early period; his language gradually became more violent; he professed to wish to excite all parties; not only all parties, but every religious sect in the British empire was called on to exert itself. He did not confine himself to the limits of Great Britain and Ireland; he endeavored to rouse every part of the continent. His son was sent to a meeting of princes and ministers at Coblenz. The Emperor Leopold and the King of Prussia were excited by Mr. Burke's publications. In a word, he left no means unemployed to inflame the whole of Europe to the adoption of his opinion. And the late Sir Philip Francis used to say, that if the friends of peace and liberty had at this time subscribed thirty thousand pounds to relieve Burke's pecuniary embarrassments, there would have been no war against the French revolution."

1081. SHERIDAN.

This eloquent, able, and polite man, who was the son of an actor, and without any fortune but his education, contrived, in early life, to purchase the half of Drury Lane Theatre, without a shilling of property, and to live the greater part of his life in princely splendor. But what is more extraordinary, he acquired such confidence in the princes of the blood royal, that, when the regency government was formed in 1811, and a family council was held at Carleton House, after midnight, to arrange the policy of the government, he was the only person, not of blood royal, present; and was the chief, and almost the only speaker in effecting the important arrangements.

1082. SHERIDAN'S GREAT SPEECH.

Mr. Burke, speaking of Mr. Sheridan's celebrated speech on the Begum charge, on the trial of Warren Hastings, observed, —

"He has this day surprised the thousands who hung with rapture on his accents, by such an array of talents. such an exhibition of capacity, such a display of powers, as are unparalleled in the annals of oratory; a display that reflected the highest honor on himself, lustre upon letters, renown upon Parliament, glory upon the country. Of all species of rhetoric, of every kind of eloquence that has been witnessed or recorded either in ancient or modern times, — whatever the dignity of the senate, the acuteness of the bar, the solidity of the judgment seat, and the sacred morality of the pulpit have hitherto furnished, — nothing has surpassed, nothing has equalled, what we have heard this day in Westminster Hall. No holy seer of religion, no orator, no man of any literary description whatever, has come up in the one instance to the pure sentiments of morality; or, in the other, to that variety of knowledge, force of imagination, propriety and vivacity of allusion, beauty and elegance of diction, strength and copiousness of style, pathos and sublimity of conception, to which we have this day listened with ardor and admiration. From poetry up to eloquence, there is not a species of composition of which a complete and perfect specimen might not from that single speech be culled and collected."

1083. APPLAUSE IN THE GALLERY OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The well-known William Gardiner, of Leicester, relates the following story of himself, in his amusing work called Music and Friends : —

"I was presented with an order to the gallery of the House of Commons. That night there was a grand debate upon Mr. Grey's motion touching the seizure of Oczakow by the Empress of Russia, in which I heard all the principal speakers. Mr. Grey's style was that of sober argument; Sheridan's, playful; Burke's, imaginative and lofty; Pitt's, (what little he said,) supercilious and scornful; Fox's, powerful and eloquent. He was the last speaker, and I was so excited by his oratory, that, without reflecting where I was, I vehemently called out 'Bravo!' I was delighted to that degree that I made the house ring again. The speaker, Addington, immediately got up and said, that more unwarrantable conduct he had never witnessed than that of the person who had interrupted the proceedings. Strangers were upon sufferance in that house, and could not be permitted to applaud or disapprove any thing that was passing. It was a high breach of privilege, and a sergeant at arms was ordered to bring the offender to the bar. A tall, handsome man, sitting alone in the side gallery, approached me, and said, with a countenance almost breaking into a laugh, 'How could you be so indiscreet, young man?' 'Sir,' I replied, 'I hope you will excuse me; I am but a countryman.' By this time the officer was making his way to take me up, when this person, waving his hand, caused him to desist. It was no other than the Prince of Wales, whom the importance of the debate had brought into the house, and who, most probably, saved me from Newgate. The gallery, however, in consequence of my indiscretion, was ordered to be cleared; and as I passed through the crowd, I had the execration of the whole company. Many years afterwards, when on a journey to the south of England, I arrived late in the evening at the Single Star, in Exeter, and was shown into the travellers' room, where a merry party were discussing the merits of the different speakers in the House of Commons. A gentleman told us that he was in the gallery one night, enjoying the debate, when he had the mortification to be turned out, in consequence of the folly of some fellow calling out, 'Bravo!' I kept my countenance, and joined in the laugh, and did not reveal to the gentleman that I was the very person who had committed this outrage, till I met him the next morning at breakfast."

1084. EZEKIEL AND DANIEL.

The following anecdote of Mr. Webster is told by a correspondent of the Cleveland Herald, as an illustration of the "uncertainty of worldly fame," and the folly of making it the controlling object of life : —

A few years since, but before the great Northern Railroad passed through his farm, he was on his way to the old homestead. He took the stage at Concord, New Hampshire, and had for a companion a very old man. After some conversation, he ascertained that the old man was from the neighboring town of Salisbury, and asked him if he ever knew Captain Webster.

"Surely I did," said the old man; "and the captain was a brave and good man, sir; and nobly did he fight for us, with General Stark, at Bennington."

"Did he leave any children?" said Mr. Webster.

"O, yes; there was Ezekiel, and, I think, Daniel."

"And what has become of them?" asked Mr. Webster.

"Why, Ezekiel — and he was a powerful man, sir — I have heard him plead in court often; yes, sir, he was a powerful man, and fell dead while pleading at Concord."

"Well," said Mr. Webster, "and what became of Daniel?"

"Daniel — Daniel," repeated the old man, thoughtfully; "why, Daniel, I believe, is a lawyer about Boston somewhere."

1085. WEBSTER'S LITERARY FAME.

When Daniel Webster was in the west, some years ago, Mr. B., one of the most conspicuous citizens, on being introduced to the distinguished statesman, addressed him as follows: "I have read your Spelling-book and Dictionary, Mr. Webster, but I never before had the pleasure of your acquaintance."

1086. THE ELOQUENCE OF MOTION.

Every one has read of the "action, action, ACTION" of Demosthenes, and of what a variety of emotions and passions Roscius could express by mere gestures; let it not be supposed, however, that such perfections of art belonged to the ancients only. The following anecdote of William C. Preston is illustrative of our remarks : —

"Some years ago, among a thousand others, we were listening to one of his splendid harangues from the stump. Beside us was one, as deaf as a post, in breathless attention, catching, apparently, every word that fell from the orator's lips. Now, the tears of delight would roll down his cheeks, and now, in an ungovernable ecstasy, he would shout out applause, which might have been mistaken for the noise of a small thunder storm.

"At length Preston launched out one of those passages of massive declamation, which those who have heard him know him to be so capable of uttering. In magnificent splendor it was what Byron has described the mountain storms of Jura. Its effects upon the multitude was like a whirlwind. Our deaf friend could contain himself no longer, but bawling into our ear, as if he would blow it open with a tempest, he cried, —

“Who’s that a-speaking?”

“‘William C. Preston!’ replied we, as loud as our lungs would let us.

“‘Who?’ inquired he, still louder than before.

“‘William C. Preston, of South Carolina!’ replied we, almost splitting our throat in the effort.

“‘Well, well!’ returned he, ‘I can’t hear a word he or you are saying; but, great Jericho! don’t he do the motions splendid?’”

§ 109. PERSONAL COLLISIONS AND CONFLICTS.

1087. PERICLES.

The eloquence of Pericles, which his countrymen were wont to designate by the attribute of “thunder and lightning,” must have mingled a wondrous share of the persuasive, in its power over the passions. When Thucydides, the Milesian, one of his great opponents in state matters, was asked by Archidamus, King of Sparta, which was the better wrestler, Pericles or himself. “It is in vain,” replied Thucydides, “to wrestle with that man. As often as I have cast him to the ground, he has as stoutly denied it; and when I would maintain that he had got the fall, he would as obstinately maintain the reverse; and so efficaciously withal, that he has made all who heard him, nay, the very spectators, believe him.”

1088. SIR ROBERT WALPOLE.

One day, in the House of Commons, a speaker in opposition to the ministry, and famous for his long harangues, had been upon his feet nearly two hours, inveighing against Sir Robert’s measures. He was silenced several days by Sir Robert telling the following story: “A short time ago,” said the premier, “I was travelling in the west of England with two ladies and a gentleman. Our carriage was in very good repair, the roads were very smooth, and the coachman was an expert driver. One of the ladies, however, appeared to be greatly terrified, crying out, every minute, we should be overturned, or the carriage would certainly break down. This language she held for several minutes, whilst I endeavored to prevail upon her to lay aside her apprehensions, assuring her we were in no danger whatever; that we were travelling in the greatest security imaginable, and that all her fears were entirely groundless. At length the gentleman, her brother, burst into a violent laugh, saying, his sister knew perfectly well we were safe, but having a melodious voice, and a fluency of words, she was very fond of hearing herself talk;” and Sir Robert concluded with observing, that “several gentlemen in the opposition exactly resembled the lady he had mentioned; for though they must be convinced that the state vehicle was in perfectly good repair, and was well conducted, yet they were so fond of hearing themselves make harangues, that they seized every opportunity of indulging their loquacity at the expense of their judgment.”

1089. PARLIAMENTARY ELOQUENCE.

There perhaps was no period in the history of the British senate in which our senators more nearly approached the nervous eloquence of the Greeks and

Romans, than during the sitting of the Long Parliament. The language was clear and copious, and often displayed strong marks of the most animated eloquence. In one of the debates at this period, the Lord Keeper Finch having observed, that “whatever supplies had been raised from the subject had been again restored to them in fructifying showers,” to this remark Lord Digby very spiritedly answered, “It has been a frequent metaphor with these ministerial oppressors, that whatever supplies have been raised from the subject have been again restored to them in fructifying showers; but it has been in hailstones and mildews, to wither our hopes, and batter and prostrate our affections.”

1090. MELODRAMATIC HIT.

Burke’s was a complete failure, where he flung the dagger on the floor of the House of Commons, and produced nothing but a smothered laugh, and a joke from Sheridan: —

“The gentleman has brought us the knife, but where is the fork?”

1091. MR. BURKE.

In speaking against Lord North, Mr. Burke quoted the Latin adage, Magnum vectigal est parsimonia, and made a false quantity. Lord North corrected him. Mr. Burke congratulated the House of Commons on the progress the noble lord was making in knowledge, and said, “there was now some hope of his proceeding from sound to sense.”

1092. A LENGTHY SPEECH.

Burke was sometimes provoked into humor. David Hartley, who had been employed as a negotiator of the treaty with America, was remarkable for the length and dulness of his speeches. One day, when Burke was prepared to take an important part in the debate, he saw, to his infinite vexation, the house melting down under Hartley’s influence, from an immense assemblage into a number scarcely sufficient to authorize the speaker’s keeping the chair. In the course of this heavy harangue, Hartley had occasion to desire that some clause in the riot act should be read at the table. Burke could restrain himself no longer. “The riot act,” said he, starting from his seat; “my honorable friend desires the riot act to be read! What would he have? Does he not see that the mob has dispersed already?”

It was of this interminable talker against time that Jenkinson, the first Lord Liverpool, told the amusing story, that, seeing Hartley rise to speak, he left the house to breathe a little of the fresh air. A fine June evening tempted him on. It was no more than five o'clock. He went home, mounted his horse, and rode to his villa, some miles from town, where he dined, rambled about the grounds, and then returned at an easy pace to London. But the hour was now nine o'clock; and conceiving that the division must be nigh, he sent a note to the house to inquire what had been done, and who had spoken. The answer returned was, that "nobody had spoken but Mr. Hartley, and that he was speaking still." The note, however, contained the cheering conjecture, that "he might be expected to close soon." Even that conjecture was disappointed; for, when Jenkinson at last went down to Westminster, he found Hartley on his legs, in the same position in which he had left him half a day before, pouring out the same sleepy wisdom, and surrounded by a slumbering house. The story does not tell by what means this inveterate haranguer was ever induced to conclude. But he had, by that time, been speaking five hours.

1093. BURKE AND SHERIDAN.

It is well known that the celebrated Edmund Burke, on his first début in life, improved himself not a little under the banners and patronage of the opposition; for which purpose he was a constant frequenter of the various debates and disputations held at the house of one Seacoeke, a baker, who, notwithstanding his situation in life, was gifted with such a vein of eloquence, that he was unanimously constituted perpetual president of the famous disputing society held at the Robin Hood, near Temple Bar. On a certain memorable occasion, in the House of Commons, Mr. Burke, exclaiming, "I quit the camp," suddenly left the opposite benches, and going over to the treasury side of the house, thundered a violent philippic against his former friends and associates. Mr. Sheridan concluded a spirited reply to that unlooked-for attack, nearly in the following words:—

"That gentleman, to use his own expression, has quitted the camp; but he will recollect that he has quitted it as a deserter, and I sincerely hope that he will never return to it as a spy. But I, for one," he continued, "cannot sympathize in the astonishment with which so flagrant an act of apostasy has electrified the house; for neither I nor that gentleman has forgotten from whom he has borrowed those weapons which he now uses against us. So far, therefore, from that gentleman's present tergiversation being a cause of wonder, I consider it not only characteristic, but consistent; for it is but natural that he who, on his first starting in life, should commit so gross a blunder as to go to a baker's for his eloquence, should conclude such a career by coming to the House of Commons for his bread!"

1094. THE LAST ARGUMENT.

Though Pitt's moral or physical courage never shrank from man, yet Sheridan was the antagonist with whom he evidently least desired to come into collision, and with whom the collision, when it did occur, was of the most fretful nature. There were a thousand instances of that "keen encounter of their wits," in which person was more involved than party.

"I leave," said Pitt, at the conclusion of an attack of this kind,— "I leave the honorable gentleman, what he likes so well, the woman's privilege—the last word." Sheridan started up. "I am perfectly sensible," said he, "of the favor which the right honorable gentleman means, in offering me a privilege so peculiarly adapted to himself; but I must beg leave to decline the gift. I have no wish for the last word; I am content with having the last argument."

1095. A CUTTING RETORT.

After the younger Mr. Pitt had made his speech in the House of Commons, Sir Robert Walpole, in a sarcastic note, remarked:—

"I apprehend the young gentleman has not sown all his wild oats;" to which Mr. Pitt replied, in a rejoinder,—

"Age has its privileges, and youth may have its faults; but the gentleman affords ample illustration that I still retain food enough for geese to peck at."

1096. ACTOR OF ONE PART.

A little after Lord Chatham (then Mr. Pitt) had changed his political sentiments in regard to the protection of Hanover, in the course of replying, one day, in the House of Commons, to Sir Francis Blake Delaval, he threw out some sarcastical reflections on him for appearing on the stage; upon which the other got up and acknowledged it was true: youth and whim led him once to amuse himself that way; but he could safely lay his hand on his heart and say, "He never acted but one part."

1097. RESEMBLANCE AND ANALOGY.

Mr. Pitt compared the constant opposition of Sheridan to an eternal drag chain, clogging all the wheels, retarding the career, and embarrassing the progress of government. Mr. Sheridan replied, that a real drag chain differed from this imaginary drag chain of the minister in one important essential; it was applied only when the machine was going down the hill.

There appears to be quite as much wit exercised in finding out things that differ, as in hitting upon those that resemble.

1098. PITT AND SHERIDAN.

In February, 1783, Mr. Sheridan first came into direct contact with Mr. Pitt, who was then chancellor of the exchequer; and it is evident that the attack was premeditated on the part of Sheridan, in an ambitious aim to cope with this extraordinary young man, whose powers as an orator and a statesman were then the general theme of admiration. When the preliminaries of peace came under consideration, Mr. Sheridan levelled some strong observations against Mr. Pitt, who could not well avoid taking notice of them. Alluding to Mr. Sheridan's dramatic connections and pursuits, he said, "No man admired more than he did the abilities of his honorable gentleman, the elegant sallies of his thoughts, the gay effusions of his fancy, his dramatic turns, his epigrammatic points; and if they were reserved for the proper stage, they would, no doubt, receive what the honorable gentleman's abilities always did receive — the plaudits of the audience. But this was not the proper scene for the exhibition of these elegances, and he must therefore beg leave to call the attention of the house to the serious consideration of the very important question before them."

Mr. Sheridan, in explanation, adverted in a forcible manner to this personality, saying, "he need not comment on it, as the propriety, the taste, and the gentlemanly point of it, must have been obvious to the house; but," said he, "let me assure the right honorable gentleman that I do now, and will at any time when he chooses to repeat this sort of allusion, meet it with the most sincere good humor; nay, I will say more; flattered and encouraged by the right honorable gentleman's panegyric on my talents, if ever I again engage in the composition he alludes to, I may be tempted to an act of presumption — to attempt an improvement on one of Ben Jonson's best characters, that of the Angry Boy in the Alchymist."

This reciprocity of sarcastic ridicule occasioned much sport at that period, and the whimsical application of Sheridan's dramatic reading fixed upon his opponent an appellation of which he did not get rid for many years.

1099. MINGAY'S RETORT ON ERSKINE.

All the London world was amused by Mingay's retort on Erskine, in one of his fits of laudation. The trial was on some trivial question of a patent for a shoe-buckle. Erskine held up the buckle to the jury, and harangued on "the extraordinary ingenuity of an invention which would have astonished and delighted past ages. How would my ancestors," said he, "have looked upon this specimen of dexterity!" From this point he started into a panegyric on his forefathers.

Mingay was counsel for the opposite side, and concluded his speech with, "Gentlemen, you have heard a good deal to-day of my learned friend's ancestors, and of their probable astonishment at his shoe-buckle. But, gentlemen, I can assure you their astonishment would have been quite as great at his shoes and stockings."

1100. HAPPINESS OF SLAVES.

Sir John Doyle, being told in the House of Commons, by those interested in keeping up the slave trade, that the slaves were happy, said it reminded him of a man whom he had once seen in a warren, sewing up the mouth of a ferret; he remonstrated with the man upon the cruelty of the act, but he answered, "Lord, sir, the ferret likes it above all things."

1101. COLONEL STENTOR.

Colonel Stentor was at one time a legislator in a certain legislative hall. He had been an Indian agent among the Osages, and whenever he took the floor he was exceedingly famous for making tropes and similes of buffaloes, wolves, panthers, bears, foxes, and all other voracious animals. In this way he got to be quite a lion himself, and his opponents all shrank in terror from his roar. But on one occasion, a young lawyer, new upon the floor, but who knew the roaring colonel of old, got up and replied to him as follows:—

"Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman imagine he is going to frighten us down here with a menagerie of wild beasts? Though the gentleman is so anxious to let us know that he was born in the woods, can he assert that he was never scared by an owl? The honorable member may, possibly, recognize a reminiscence which may be related thus:—

"A certain valiant gentleman was once benighted, even in his native woods, and, calling aloud for assistance from his dilemma, he heard a sepulchral voice exclaim in answer, 'Hoo — hoo — hoo — hoo — who are you?' The gentleman instantly replied, at the top of his voice, 'I am Colonel David Crockett Julius Cæsar Alexander Napoleon Stentor, formerly of Nicholas county, Kentucky, now a candidate to represent Caloway county in the lower branch of the next General Assembly in Missouri, and I am lost.' 'Hoo — hoo — hoo — hoo — who are you?' again demanded the mysterious voice. 'I tell you,' shouted the colonel, in a still higher key, 'I am Colonel David Crockett Julius Cæsar Alexander Napoleon Stentor, formerly of Nicholas county, Kentucky, now a candidate to represent Caloway county in the lower branch of the next General Assembly of Missouri, and I am lost.' 'Hoo — hoo — ho — ho — ha — ha — ha — ha — ha — hah!' returned the distant stranger; and, Mr. Speaker, the valiant colonel was left by the owl to find his own way out of the woods, which I presume he did, as he sits among us at present."

The speech was interrupted throughout with uproarious laughter, which echoed again and again in violent gusts for some moments after the juvenile member sat down. At length, to the surprise of every body, Colonel Stentor slowly arose with a witicism, and replied,—

"Mr. Speaker, the gentleman inquires if it is possible for me to be scared by an owl! I confess I am!"

1102. BROUGHAM AND LYNDHURST.

Brougham, speaking of the salary attached to the rumored appointment to the new judgeship, said it was all moonshine. Lyndhurst, in his dry and waggish way, remarked, "May be so, my Lord Harry; but I have a confounded strong notion that, moonshine though it be, you would like to see the first quarter of it."

1103. RANDOLPH'S WIT.

Once, after the celebrated John Randolph, of Roanoke, had been speaking in Congress, several members rose in succession and attacked him. His reply was as witty as it was prompt. "Sir," said he to the speaker, "I am in the condition of old Lear —

' — the little dogs and all,
Tray, Blanch, and Sweetheart,
See — they bark at me.'"

1104. JOHN RANDOLPH.

The celebrated John Randolph, not wishing to reply to a disagreeable question put to him in Congress, evaded it by saying, "Sir, that is a question, and I never answer questions."

1105. ROGER SHERMAN AND JOHN RANDOLPH.

Mr. Sherman was representative in Congress from Connecticut: his business had been that of making shoes. John Randolph rose, and with his usual squeaking sounds said, "I should like to know what the gentleman did with his leather apron before he set out for Washington." Mr. Sherman replied, imitating the same squeak, "I cut it up, sir, to make moccasins for the descendants of Pocahontas!"

§ 110. FAILURES IN ELOQUENCE.

1106. PUBLIC SPEAKING.

"I never," says Pope, "could speak in public. And I don't believe, if it was a set thing, I could give an account of any story to twelve friends together, though I could tell it to any three of them with pleasure. When I appeared for the Bishop of Rochester on his trial, though I had but ten words to say, and that on a plain point, (how that the bishop spent his time when I was with him at Bromley,) I made two or three blunders in it, notwithstanding the first row of lords, which was all I could see, was mostly of my acquaintance."

1107. GREAT WRITERS NOT ALWAYS GREAT ORATORS.

Some good writers are incapable of addressing a public assembly. Of this sort were Gibbon and Dean Swift. The former was a member of Parliament; and although a fluent and powerful writer, he could support his party with only a silent vote.

1108. A DISCONCERTED ORATOR.

Erskine, like many characters of peculiar liveliness, had a morbid sensibility to the circumstances of the moment, which sometimes strangely enfeebled his presence of mind: any appearance of neglect in his audience, a cough, a yawn, or a whisper, even among the mixed multitude of the courts, and strong as he was there, has been known to dishearten him visibly. This trait was so notorious that a solicitor, whose only merit was a remarkably vacant face, was said to be often planted opposite to Erskine by the adverse party, to yawn when the advocate began.

The cause of his first failure in the house was not unlike this curious mode of disconcerting an orator. He had been brought forward to support the falling fortunes of Fox, then struggling under the weight of the "coalition." The "India bill" had heaped the king's almost open hostility on the accumulation of public wrath and grievance which the ministers had, with such luckless industry, been employed during the year in raising for their own ruin. Fox looked abroad for help, and Gordon, the member for Portsmouth, was displaced from his borough, and Erskine was brought into the house with no slight triumph of his party, and perhaps some degree of anxiety on the opposite side. On the night of his first speech, Pitt, evidently intending to reply, sat with pen and paper in his hand, prepared to catch the arguments of his formidable adversary.

He wrote a word or two; Erskine proceeded; but with every additional sentence Pitt's attention to the paper relaxed; his look became more careless, and he obviously began to think the orator less and less worthy of his attention. At length, while every eye in the house was fixed upon him, he, with a contemptuous smile, dashed the pen through the paper, and flung them on the floor. Erskine never recovered from this expression of disdain; his voice faltered, he struggled through the remainder of his speech, and sank into his seat dispirited and shorn of his fame.

§ 111. AMUSING AND LAUGHABLE INCIDENTS.

1109. ORATORICAL PROLIXITY.

When the ambassadors of Samos came to Cleomenes, King of Sparta, with a very long and elegant oration, inviting him to assist them against Polycrates, he replied, being tired with their oratory, "The former and middle parts of your address were too long, and I have forgotten them. With regard to the latter part, being unconnected in my memory with what you said before, I do not see the propriety of it, and therefore I shall not grant your request."

1110. SIR PHILIP FRANCIS.

A person having, upon one occasion, gotten Sir Philip Francis into a corner, and innocently mistaking his agitations and gestures for extreme interest in the narrative which he was administering to his patient, was somewhat confounded when the latter, seizing him by the collar, exclaimed with an oath, that "human nature could endure no more."

1111. BREVITY DESIRABLE IN AN ORATOR.

The mayor of a town in Burgundy, hearing that the prince was to pass that way, and thinking himself to be a great orator, determined to display his abilities on this occasion. When the prince approached, the burghers were put under arms, whilst the mayor, at the head of the corporation, pulling out a long piece of parchment, began to harangue, as follows: "Of all the towns that have the honor of being within the compass of your most serene highness's government, the very least would be overjoyed to make you sensible that none has so great a zeal for your service, or affection for your person, as ours. We very well know that the certain way of pleasing the greatest warrior of the present age is to receive him with the thunderings of numerous artillery; but for us, alas! it is impossible to fire one cannon, for eighteen reasons. The first is, that there never was any such thing as a cannon in this place since it was built. The second—"Hold, hold," said the prince, "I am so well satisfied with your first reason, that I shall excuse all the rest."

1112. WRITING AND FIGHTING.

A master read to his scholars the funeral oration of Marshal Turenne, written by the celebrated Flechier. One of the scholars said to another, "When will you be able to write as well as Flechier?" "As soon," said the other, "as you are able to fight as well as Turenne."

1113. A ROLAND FOR AN OLIVER.

A certain chief justice, on hearing an ass bray, interrupted the late Mr. Curran, in his speech to the jury, by saying, "One at a time, Mr. Curran, if you please." The speech being finished, the judge began his charge, and during its progress the ass sent forth the full force of its lungs, whereupon the advocate said, "Does not your lordship hear a remarkable echo in the court?"

1114. PITT AND WALPOLE.

In a debate, in which Mr. Pitt and some of his young friends had violently attacked old Horace Walpole, the latter complained of the self-sufficiency of the young men of the day, on which Mr. Pitt got up with great warmth, beginning with these words: "With the greatest reverence for the gray hairs of the honorable gentleman—" upon which Walpole pulled off his wig, and showed his head covered with gray hairs, which occasioned a general laughter, in which Pitt joined and the dispute subsided.

1115. SHERIDAN'S PARLIAMENTARY CAREER.

This distinguished wit, upon being asked by a young member of Parliament how he first succeeded to establish his fame as an orator, observed, "Why, sir, it was easily effected. After I had been in St. Stephen's Chapel a few days, I found that four fifths of the house were composed of country squires and great fools; my first effort, therefore, was by a lively sally, or an ironical remark, to make them laugh; that laugh effaced the recollection of what had been urged in opposition to my view of the subject, from their stupid pates, and then I whipped in an argument, and had all the way clear before me."

1116. WILLIAM PITT.

William Pitt was born in November, 1708. About the early part of his life little more is known than that he was educated at Eton, and that at seventeen he was entered at Trinity College, Oxford. During the second year of his residence at the university, George I. died; and the event was, after the fashion of that generation, celebrated by the Oxonians, in many very middling copies of verses. On this occasion Pitt published some Latin lines, which Mr. Thackeray has preserved. They prove that he had but a very limited knowledge even of the mechanical part of his art. All true Etonians will hear with concern that their illustrious school-fellow is guilty of making the first syllable in labenti short. The matter of the poem is as worthless as that of any college exercise that was ever written before or since. There is, of course, much about Mars, Themis, Neptune, and Coeetus. The Muses are earnestly entreated to weep for Cæsar; for Cæsar, says the poet, loved the Muses—Cæsar, who could not read a line of Pope, and who loved nothing but hot punch and fat women.

1117. HOW TO RAISE A DINNER.

One evening, Sheridan, not knowing where to go for a dinner, sat down by Michael Angelo Taylor, in the House of Commons, and said, "There is a law question likely to arise presently, on which, from your legal knowledge, you will be wanted to reply to Pitt; so I hope you will not think of leaving the house." Michael sat down with no little pleasure, while Sheridan slipped out, walked over to Michael's house, and ordered up dinner, saying to the servants, "Your master is not coming home this evening." He made an excellent dinner, came back to the house, and seeing Michael look expectant, went to release him, saying, "I am sorry to have kept you, for, after all, I believe this matter will not come off to-night." Michael instantly walked home, and heard, to his no little consternation, when he rang for dinner, "Mr. Sheridan had it, sir, about two hours ago."

1118. MR. BURKE AND MR. CRUGER.

There never was a stronger contrast between two candidates upon the hustings than between Mr. Burke and Mr. Cruger, at a Bristol election. The former tired his hearers with his prolix harangues; the only speech the latter made, if speech it could be called, was, "I say ditto to Mr. Burke, I say ditto to Mr. Burke."

1119. BURKE PUT TO FLIGHT.

Mr. Burke, on one occasion, had just risen in the House of Commons, with some papers in his hand, on the subject of which he intended to make a motion, when a rough-hewn member, who had no ear for the charms of eloquence, rudely started up, and said, "Mr. Speaker, I hope the honorable gentleman does not mean to read that large bundle of papers, and to bore us with a long speech into the bargain." Mr. B. was so swollen, or rather so nearly suffocated, with rage, as to be incapable of utterance, and absolutely ran out of the house. On this occasion, George Selwyn remarked, that it was the only time he ever saw the fable realized—a lion put to flight by the braying of an ass.

1120. A LUDICROUS MISTAKE.

One morning, at an inn in the south of Ireland, a gentleman, travelling upon mercantile business, came running down stairs, a few minutes before the appearance of the stage coach, in which he had taken a seat for Dublin. Seeing an ugly little fellow leaning against the door post, with dusty face and shabby clothes, he hailed him, and ordered him to brush his coat. The operation proceeded rather slowly; the impatient traveller cursed the lazy valet for an idle, good-for-nothing dog, and threatened him with corporal punishment on the spot, if he did not make haste and finish his job well before the arrival of the coach. Terror seemed to produce its effect; the fellow brushed the coat, and then the trousers, with great diligence, and was rewarded with sixpence, which he received with a low bow. The gentleman went into the bar, and paid his bill just as the expected vehicle arrived at the door. Upon getting inside, guess his astonishment to find his friend, the quondam waiter, seated snugly in one corner, with all the look of a person well used to comfort. After two or three hurried glances, to be sure his eyes did not deceive him, he commenced a confused apology for his blunder, condemning his own rashness and stupidity; but he was speedily interrupted by the other exclaiming, "O, never mind; make no apologies; these are hard times, and it is well to earn a trifle in an honest way. I am much obliged for your handsome fee for so small a job. My name, sir, is John Philpot Curran; pray what is yours?" The other was thunderstruck by the idea of such an introduction; but the drollery of Curran soon overcame his confusion, and the traveller never rejoiced more at the termination of a long journey than when he beheld the distant spires of Dublin glitter in the light of a setting sun.

1121. PARLIAMENTARY HABITS.

Some few members of our Congress, and also some of our numerous legislative bodies, if not possessing clever talents for making a speech on any mooted question, yet, not having prudence enough to keep quiet, continue to be "the observed" by some exclamation similar to these: "I cry ditto to Mr. Burke!" "Bravo!" "Hear!" &c., &c. Some time ago, in the British Parliament, there was such a would-be statesman. Mr. R. B. Sheridan then alluded to a certain notorious public character, prominently known as a rogue, and after depicting him in the startling light of one to be dreaded and avoided, exclaimed, "Where shall we find a more foolish knave or a more knavish fool than this?" "Hear, hear, hear!" bawled out that particular gentleman, amid the roar of the house.

1122. CONFIDENCE ESSENTIAL TO AN ORATOR'S SUCCESS.

Bonaventure des Periers, in his works, relates the following anecdote: "A student at law, who studied at Poitiers, had tolerably improved himself in cases of equity; not that he was overburdened with learning, but his chief deficiency was a want of assurance and confidence to display his knowledge. His father passing through Poitiers, recommended him to read aloud, and to render his memory more prompt by a continued exercise. To obey the injunction of his father, he determined to read at the ministry, (the hall of the school of equity.) In order to obtain a certain assurance, he went every day into a garden, which was a very secret spot, being at a distance from any house, and where there grew a great number of fine large cabbages. Thus for a long time, as he pursued his studies, he went to repeat his lesson to these cabbages, addressing them by the title of gentlemen; and dealing out his sentences as if he had composed them to an audience of scholars at a lecture. After having prepared himself thus for a fortnight or three weeks, he began to think it was high time to take the chair. Imagining that he should be able to harangue scholars as well as he had before done his cabbages, he went forward; began his oration; but before he had said a dozen words, he remained dumb, and became so confused that he knew not where he was, so all that he could bring out was, 'Domini, ego bene video quod non estis caules;' that is to say, (for there are some who will have every thing in plain English,) 'Gentlemen, I now clearly see you are not cabbages.' In the garden he could conceive the cabbages to be scholars; but in the chair, he could not conceive the scholars to be cabbages."

1123. MR. FOX.

The celebrated orator was one day told by a lady, whom he visited, that she "did not care three skips of a louse for him." He immediately took out his pencil, and wrote the following lines:—

"A lady has told me, and in her own house,
That she cares not for me 'three skips of a louse.'
I forgive the dear creature for what she has said,
Since women will talk of what runs in THEIR HEAD."

1124. JOHN RANDOLPH AND THE IRISHMAN.

An Irishman, in the New Mirror, relates the following anecdote, illustrating the marvellous geographical knowledge of John Randolph:—

"My knowledge of Ireland," said he to me, "seems to astonish you as much as it did a servant of Mr. Canning, at Washington, the other day. He brought me a note from his master,—who, by the by, is a very superior man, sir,—and the moment he spoke, I at once detected the Munster man, for he had a fine richbrogue; so, thinks I, I'll have some fun."

"So, John, you're from Munster, are you not?" said I.

"I am, pluse your honor," replied he, surprised at my question.

"From the county Clare, I presume?" (This was a guess, on my part, as to the county.)

"Yes, sir," said he, still more astounded.

"What town did you live in?" continued I.

"The town of Ennis, sir."

"O," said I, laughing, "I know Ennis very well. Pray does Sir Edward O'Brien still live at Dromoland?"

"He does, indeed, sir."

"And Mr. Stackpoole, at Edenvale?"

"Yes, surely, sir."

"And the Knight of Glin, at Shannovale?"

"Yes, sir." And then, after a pause and a low bow, he added, "Might I make bould to ar, sir, how your honor lived in Clare?"

"I never was there at all," replied I, "but hope to be very soon."

"O, sir," said he, "don't be after fooling me, for you must be a bit of an Irishman; you have the brogue, and you know as much of the country as I do myself, and more too, I'm thinking!"

"It was in vain that I assured him I had never been in Ireland; he went away still insisting that I had lived there; which fact he told to Mr. Canning, who was very much amused at the way in which I had puzzled poor John, as he told me himself next day."

1125. ISAAC HILL.

Isaac Hill, of New Hampshire, used to read all his speeches in the Senate. One day, recently, he commenced a violent tirade against Mr. Webster; turning leaf over leaf as he went along. Mrs. Hill, who is quite a politician also, sat behind him on one of the sofas, watching his progress with great conubial interest. Mr. Hill went on reading his task, with great industry. On a sudden the lady started up, exclaiming, "Alas! he has turned over two leaves!" The ludicrousness of the scene excited considerable merriment.

1126. JUST "A LITTLE SPEECH."

We all know that Mr. Webster can tell a good story, at a good time. In his late southern tour, having been called upon for a speech, he replied by telling a capital story of Mr. Clay. "Mr. C.," said the well-wisher of the constitution, "was once travelling in the west, and stopped at a humble cabin for the night. Having learned who Mr. Clay was, the old man, after breakfast next morning, could not dismiss his distinguished guest without requesting him to make himself and wife a little speech before leaving them!"

1127. A PERTINENT REPLY.

In the course of his luminous argument in the Senate, Mr. Clay, addressing the ultras, cried out with the voice of a Stentor, "What do you want?" A tight little Irishman, who was making some noise while trying to escape from the crush near the gallery door inside, replied quite audibly, supposing that he was personally addressed, "I want to get out."

1128. WEBSTER AND HARRISON GRAY OTIS

Mr. Webster was speaking, of one occasion, some years since, in Faneuil Hall. If we remember right, he was arguing in favor of the "Maysville road" bill. Mr. Otis sat near him, on the platform. Mr. Webster proceeded as follows:—

"I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of all roads, except—except—"

Here he stuck, and could not think of any exception. Mr. Otis saw his difficulty, and said to him, in a low voice,—

"Say, except the road to ruin!"

Mr. Webster heard it, and, as if he had merely stopped for the purpose of making his remark more effective, repeated the whole, as follows:—

"I repeat it, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of all roads except—the road to ruin."

The wit in Otis, in this instance, was well met by the presence of mind in Webster.

1129. CONGRESSIONAL IRRELEVANCE.

Members of Congress are not always men of temperance societies, that is certain. A member once came into the house essentially fuddled: the currency bill was up, and he forthwith proceeded to speechify upon the fortification bill, which was quite natural, considering that toppers usually have less love for cash than for fighting. After proceeding about half an hour, a friend took the liberty to hand him the currency bill, hinting that that was the subject of discussion. The hint was kindly taken, and the mistake discovered; whereupon the honorable member cried out, "Mr. Speaker! I don't know as my remarks exactly hit the bill under consideration; but I think they apply as well to that as to any thing else." The house was in an uproar of laughter at the drunken wit, and permitted the member to finish his speech, in the extraordinary short space of one hour and a half.

1130. LEGISLATIVE ADROITNESS.

The following is an extract from a speech of Mr. Proffit of Indiana, in Congress:—

"Mr. Speaker, this passage between my colleague and the gentlemen from Pennsylvania reminds me of a circumstance which occurred in the Indiana legislature. I had made some remarks upon a subject of importance, and was followed by a gentleman in opposition, who immediately commenced misrepresenting my language. I corrected him. He received my explanation apparently in all sincerity, but continued to misrepresent me. I again, with some little warmth, corrected him, and complained of the course he seemed determined to pursue. The gentleman, after a moment's hesitation, cast an imploring look upon me, and, with much candor, said, 'Well, Mr. Proffit, I know that you did not exactly use the language attributed to you; but, sir, I have been for six weeks preparing a speech on this subject, and in order to give it effect, it is necessary for some person to use the language attributed to you. I know of no person who can stand it better than yourself, and so you must excuse me!'"

§ 112. PLEASANTRIES AND SARCASMS OF ORATORS.

1131. LIBERTY A PLANT.

During the progress of a political meeting held in the town of Cambridge, it so happened that the late Dr. Mansel, then public orator of the University of Cambridge, but afterwards master of Trinity College and Bishop of Bristol, came to the place of meeting just as Musgrave, the well-known political tailor of his day, was in the midst of a most pathetic oration, and emphatically repeating, "Liberty, liberty, gentlemen."—"he paused—"Liberty is a plant—" "So is a cabbage!" exclaimed the caustic Mansel, before Musgrave had time to complete his sentence, with so happy an allusion to the trade of the tailor, that he was silenced amid roars of laughter.

1132. A MOVING SPEECH.

An indifferent pleader asked Catulus, "Have I not succeeded in making a very moving speech?" "Certainly," said he, "for some of your audience pitied you, and the rest walked out of court."

1133. MARRYING A KINGDOM.

That celebrated statesman, William Pitt, once being asked by a friend why he neglected the blandishments of a certain fair lady, who lost no opportunity of throwing herself in his way, replied, that he was already married to a Mrs. Britain, who took up so much of his attention, that he had little time to attend to any other fair one.

1134. MR. BURKE.

Mr. Burke remarked, "Strip majesty of its exterior, (the first and last letters,) and it becomes a jest."

1135. BURKE SATIRIZED.

After Burke had finished that extraordinary speech against Hastings, a friend of the latter wrote the following impromptu, which to our mind can hardly be surpassed:—

"Oft have I wondered that on Irish ground
No venomous reptile ever yet was found;
The secret stands revealed in nature's work—
She saved her venom to create a BURKE!"

1136. WIT AND FOLLY.

Burke once mentioned to Fox that he had written a tragedy. "Did you let Garrick see it?" inquired his friend. "No," replied Burke: "I indeed had the folly to write it, but the wit to keep it to myself."

1137. RIGHTEOUS REBUKE.

Dr. Robertson observed that "Johnson's jokes were the rebukes of the righteous, described in Scripture as being like excellent oil." "Yes," exclaimed Burke, "oil of vitriol!"

1138. BURKE AND SCOTT.

As Burke was declaiming with great animation against Hastings, he was interrupted by little Major Scott. "Am I," said he, indignantly, "to be teased by the barking of this jackal while I am attacking the royal tiger of Bengal?"

1139. SHERIDAN'S WIT.

It has been said that Sheridan was in the habit of manufacturing puns and other witty sayings before he went into company, and that he generally remained silent until a proper opportunity offered for letting off a good thing. That he and other celebrated wits may have occasionally done so, is not at all improbable; but that such was Sheridan's practice will hardly be allowed. If we give the least consideration to his practical jokes upon those tradesmen and others who were in the habit of dunning him, we shall perceive that his invention was never at a stand; for on such occasions, instead of paying, he generally contrived to obtain longer time, and to run more deeply into debt; those who came to shear went home shorn. But there are a thousand proofs on record that Sheridan's wit was instantaneous and vivid. For instance, "A rich member of the lower house, but exceedingly penurious, having one day descanted for half an hour, at the Cocoa-tree, on the excellent quality and cheapness of a waistcoat, which, after much bating, he had just bought at a tailor's shop in the Strand, and which he was exhibiting in triumph to the gentlemen present, concluded by praising the high perfection of the Manchester manufactures, and saying, 'Can any thing be more reasonable? Can any one conceive how they let me have it so cheap?' 'Very easily,' replied Sheridan, raising his head from the newspaper, and heartily tired of being bored by such a subject, 'they took you for one of the trade, and sold it to you wholesale.'"

1140. SHERIDAN TAKING THE CHAIR.

The late R. B. Sheridan, being once on a parliamentary committee, happened to enter the room when most of the members of the committee were present and seated, though business had not commenced; when, perceiving there was not another seat vacant, he, with his usual readiness, said, "Will any gentleman move that I may take the chair?"

1141. THE POWER OF WIT IN DIFFICULTIES.

Sheridan never was without a reason, never failed to extricate himself in any emergency by his wit. At a country house, where he was once on a visit, an elderly maiden lady desired to be his companion in a walk. He excused himself at first, on the ground of the badness of the weather. She soon afterwards, however, intercepted him in an attempt to escape without her. "Well," she said, "it is cleared up I see." "Why, yes," he answered, "it has cleared up enough for one, but not enough for two."

1142. LORD LOUGHBOROUGH.

Mr. Wedderburn, afterwards Lord Loughborough, was once asked whether he really delivered in the House of Commons a speech which the newspapers ascribed to him. "Why, to be sure," said he, "there are many things in that speech which I did say, and there are more which I wish I had said."

1143. CURRAN AND LORD CLARE.

Curran, when opposed to Lord Clare, said that he reminded him of a chimney sweep, who had raised himself by dark and dusky ways, and then called aloud to the neighbors to witness his dirty elevation.

1144. CURRAN AND THE SHOEMAKER.

A certain member of the Irish Parliament, whose father had been a shoemaker, having, in the course of his speech, used some language which caused him to be called to order by Mr. Curran, the gentleman complained that Mr. Curran had broken the thread of his discourse.

"Then was it better the next time," replied Curran.

1145. COUGHING DOWN.

One evening, when Mr. Hunt was speaking in the House of Commons, an honorable member was unusually persevering in his efforts to cough him down. Mr. Hunt cured the honorable gentleman of his cough by one short sentence, which, delivered, as it was, with infinite dramatic effect, created universal laughter. Mr. Hunt put his hand into his pantaloons pocket, and after fumbling about for a few seconds, said, with the utmost imaginable coolness, that "he was extremely sorry to find that he had not a few lozenges in his pocket for the benefit of the honorable member who seemed to be so distressed with a cough, but he could assure him he would provide some for him by next night." Never did doctor prescribe more effectually; not only did Mr. Hunt's tormentor from that moment get rid of his cough, but it never returned, at least while Mr. Hunt was speaking.

1146. HALF GENTLEMEN.

Mr. Curran, happening to cross examine one of those persons known in Ireland by the significant description of half gentlemen, found it necessary to ask a question as to his knowledge of the Irish tongue, which, though perfectly familiar to him, the witness affected not to understand, whilst he at the same time spoke extremely bad English. "I see, sir, how it is: you are more ashamed of knowing your own language than of not knowing any other."

1147. CURRAN'S JOKING PROPENSITY.

Curran's ruling passion was his joke. In his last illness, his physician observing in the morning that he seemed to cough with more difficulty, he answered, "That's rather surprising, as I have been practising all night."

1148. A HUMOROUS RETORT.

Robert Hall did not lose his power of retort even in madness. A hypocritical condoler with his misfortunes once visited him in the madhouse, and said, in a whining tone, "What brought you here, Mr. Hall?" Hall significantly touched his brow with his finger, and replied, "What'll never bring you, sir — too much brain."

1149. GOULBURN AND O'CONNELL.

Goulburn, when secretary of Ireland, visited Kilkeny at a time when Mr. O'Connell (then on a circuit) happened to be there also. Both stopped at Finn's Hotel, and chanced to get bed-rooms opening off the same corridor. Mr. O'Connell's early habits called him up at cock-crowing. Finding the hall door locked, and so being himself hindered from walking outside, he commenced walking up and down the corridor. To pass the time, he repeated aloud some of Moore's poetry, and had just uttered the lines, —

"We tread the land that bore us,
The green flag flutters o'er us,
The friends we've tried are by our side;" — at this moment Goulburn popped his night-capped head out to see what was the matter. Mr. O'Connell instantly pointed his finger at him, and finished the verse, —

"And the foe we hate before us."

In went Goulburn's head again, in a great hurry.

1150. RETORT COURTEOUS.

When a sovereign entered a town, it was formerly the custom to treat him with a long harangue. Louis XIII. was one day listening very patiently, at the gate of a small town, to a very tedious oration of this kind. Bautru, who accompanied him, thought that he should please the king by interrupting the insipid orator. "Sir," said he, "what is the price of asses in your country?" The haranguer stopped, and, after having scanned Bautru from head to foot, "When they are in as good condition and as large as yourself," replied he, "they are worth at least forty shillings," and then resumed his discourse.

1151. THE PHILOSOPHER'S STONE.

John Randolph, in the midst of one of his splendid rhapsodies in the Senate of the United States, paused, and, fixing his eyes on the presiding officer, exclaimed, "Mr. President, I have discovered the philosopher's stone. It consists in these four plain English monosyllables, 'Pay as you go.'"

1152. JOHN RANDOLPH AND THE APPEAL TO POSTERITY.

During the delivery of one of those tedious and interminable speeches that are often inflicted upon the House of Representatives, a member who had occupied the floor for many hours was called to order, on the ground that his remarks were not pertinent to the question before the house. "I know it," said he; "I am not speaking for the benefit of the house, but for posterity." "Speak a little longer," said John Randolph, in an under tone, "and you will have your audience before you."

§ 113. MISCELLANEOUS.

1153. A MAN OF DEEDS, AND NOT OF WORDS.

An Athenian who wanted eloquence, but who was an able and brave man, when one of his countrymen had, in a brilliant speech, promised great things, rose and said, "Men of Athens, all that he has said I will do!"

1154. SOCRATES AND HIS PUPIL.

A young man, who was a great talker, was sent by his parents to Socrates to learn oratory. On being presented to Socrates, the lad spoke so incessantly that he was out of all patience. When the bargain came to be struck, Socrates asked him double price.

"Why charge me double?" said the young fellow.

"Because," said the orator, "I must teach you two sciences; the one to hold your tongue, and the other how to speak."

1155. DOMITIUS.

The orator Domitius was once in great danger from an inscription which he had put upon a statue erected by him in honor of Caligula, wherein he had declared, that that prince was a second time consul at the age of twenty-seven. This he intended as an encomium; but Caligula, taking it as a sarcasm upon his youth, and his infringement of the laws, raised a process against him, and pleaded himself in person. Domitius, instead of making a defence, repeated part of the emperor's speech with the highest marks of admiration; after which, he fell upon his knees, and begging pardon, declared that he dreaded more the eloquence of Caligula, than his imperial power. This piece of flattery succeeded so well, that the emperor not only pardoned, but also raised him to the consulship.

1156. A CHILD'S JUDGMENT OF AN ORATOR'S SPEECH.

It was in 1792, a short time after the atrocious days of September, that a distinguished advocate of the bar of Paris, deprived of his certificate of citizenship, and flying from persecution, happened to be at Blois, where he pleaded a cause against an officious defender. Let it be recollected that the Constituent Assembly, in overturning the judicial hierarchy, had begun by creating officious defenders; that is to say, had given to the first comer the right of pleading for the first comer. The officious defender, in the case in question, was a prosy individual, who wearied both judges and audience by his eloquence. The son of the advocate, a child about two years and a half old, was present with his mother, and had his patience tried more severely than any one else. At length, unable to restrain himself, he cried out in a voice loud enough to be heard all over the court, "Come, mamma, that's enough! I'm tired; let us go away." "The cause is heard," said the president, delighted with the pertinence of the interruption; "give in your papers; the tribunal will pronounce upon them."

Forty years afterwards, in the same town, in the same apartment, the same child, then the leader of a party, and a potent orator, defended his liberty and his life. Audience, advocates, jury, all rose respectfully on the entrance of the illustrious accused. All hearts beat at the accents of that sonorous, deep-toned voice; a few words sufficed for his triumph; he was listened to even after he had ceased to speak, and no one thought of crying, "Enough."

It may be easily guessed that the child, the great advocate, and Mr. Barryer are one and the same person.

1157. SOUND JUDGMENT versus ELOQUENCE.

Mr. Townsend, being offended with the Duke of Newcastle, thought fit to show his ill humor by making an attack, in the House of Commons, upon Alderman Baker's contract; and he played off all the lightning of his eloquence upon the occasion. The alderman, who was no orator, but possessed as sound a judgment as any man of the age, got up as soon as Mr. Townsend had finished his philippic, and told the house he had but two words to say by way of answer to all the gentleman's fine speech against him, — "Prore it!" — and sat down under a roar of applause from all parts of the house.

1158. ROYAL CANDOR.

George II., being informed that an impudent printer was to be punished for having published a spurious king's speech, replied that he hoped the punishment would be of the mildest sort, because he had read both, and as far as he understood either of them, he liked the spurious speech better than his own.

1159. JUDICIAL ANIMOSITY.

Mr. Curran distinguished himself not more as a barrister than as a member of Parliament; and in the latter character, it was his misfortune to provoke the enmity of a man whose thirst for revenge was only satiated by the utter ruin of his adversary. On the discussion of a bill of a penal nature, Mr. Curran inveighed in warm terms against the attorney general, Mr. Fitzgibbon, for sleeping on the bench, when statutes of the most cruel kind were enacting; and he ironically lamented that the slumber of guilt should so nearly resemble the repose of innocence. A message from Mr. Fitzgibbon was the consequence of this sally; and the parties, having met, were left to fire when they chose. "I never," said Mr. Curran, relating the circumstances of the duel, "saw any one whose determination seemed more malignant than Fitzgibbon's: after I had fired, he took aim at me for at least half a minute; and on its proving ineffectual, I could not help exclaiming to him, 'It was not your fault, Mr. Attorney; you were deliberate enough.'" The attorney general declared his honor satisfied; and here, at least for the present, the dispute appeared to terminate. Not here, however, terminated Fitzgibbon's animosity. Soon after, he became lord chancellor and a peer in Ireland, and, in the former capacity, found an opportunity, by means of his judicial authority, ungenerously to crush the rising power of his late antagonist. Mr. Curran, who was at this time a leader, and one of the senior practitioners at the chancery bar, soon felt all the force of his rival's vengeance. The chancellor is said to have yielded a reluctant attention to every motion he made; he frequently stopped him in the midst of a speech; questioned his knowledge of law; recommended to him more attention to facts; in short, he succeeded not only in crippling all his professional efforts, but actually to leave him without a client. Mr. Curran, indeed, appeared as usual in the three other courts; but he had been already stripped of his most profitable practice; and as his expenses nearly kept pace with his gains, he was almost left a beggar; for all hopes of the wealth and honors of the long robe were now denied him. The memory of this persecution imbibed the last moments of Curran's existence; and he could never even allude to it without evincing a just and excusable indignation. In a letter which he addressed to a friend, twenty years after, he says, "I make no compromise with power. I had the merit of provoking and despising the personal malice of every man in Ireland who was the known enemy of the country. Without the walls of the court of justice, my character was pursued with the most persevering slander; and within those walls, though I was too strong to be beaten down by any judicial malignity, it was not so with my clients; and my consequent losses in professional income have never been estimated at less, as you have often heard, than thirty thousand pounds." The incidents attendant upon this disagreement were at times ludicrous in the extreme. One day, when it was known that Curran was to make an elaborate argument in chancery, Lord Clare (the title of Fitzgibbon) brought a large Newfoundland dog upon the bench with him; and during the progress of the argument, he lent his ear much more to the dog than to the barrister. At last the chancellor seemed to lose all regard to decency. He turned himself quite aside, in the most material part of the case, and began in full court to fondle the animal. Mr. Curran stopped short. "Go on, go on, Mr. Curran," said Lord Clare. "O," replied Mr. Curran, "I beg a thousand pardons, my lord; I really took it for granted that your lordship was employed in consultation."

1160. SPEAKING TO THE PURPOSE.

A certain member of Parliament, having heard many speeches in the house to the great applause of the speakers, grew ambitious of rising to rival glory by his oratory, and accordingly watched for a favorable opportunity to open. At length an occasion presented itself. It was on a motion being made in the house for enforcing the execution of some statute, on which public-spirited motion, the orator in embryo rose solemnly up, and, after giving three loud hems, spoke as follows: "Mr. Speaker, have we laws, or have we not laws? If we have laws, and they are not observed, to what end were these laws made?" So saying, he set himself down, his chest heaving high with conscious consequence, when another member arose, and delivered his thoughts in these words: "Mr. Speaker, did the honorable gentleman, who spoke last, speak to the purpose, or not speak to the purpose? If he did not speak to the purpose, to what purpose did he speak?" which apropos reply set the house in such a fit of laughter as discouraged the young orator from ever attempting to speak again.

1161. LOUIS NAPOLEON AS AN ORATOR.

During the discussion which came up in the Assembly on article forty-five of the constitution, declaring that the president must be a native of France, and a French citizen, Prince Louis ascended the tribune, and attempted to make a speech. This effort was by no means a happy one; in fact, it proved a total failure. The government organ, which is opposed to the prince, gives the annexed version of this affair. We must take its statements with some few grains of allowance:—

"Prince Louis Napoleon, in directing his steps towards the tribune, showed that he was overwhelmed with his position. On his arrival there, he had some difficulty in commencing at all, and at length he came out, in a hesitating and unconnected manner, with the following words:—

"Citizens: I do not come before you to speak against the amendment; certainly I have been sufficiently rewarded in recovering all my rights as a citizen to entertain any other ambition. Neither do I come here to make any complaint against the calumnies of which I have been the object. It is in the name of the three hundred thousand electors who have twice honored me with their suffrages, that I disavow the appellation of 'pretender,' which is constantly brought forward against me."

"At this point the prince stopped, hesitated, and appeared inclined to go on; but at length he descended from the tribune, apparently greatly disconcerted, and amid marks of great astonishment on the part of a portion of the members, and of annoyance on the part of others. The German accent, the confusion, the vagueness and inanity of the words spoken, the absence of all the qualities of a popular orator, had done their work. Prince Louis Napoleon had been warned against the dangers of the tribune, and the warning has been thrown away upon him. He has more damaged his cause by this short attempt to speak than by all the past follies of his life. His adversaries at once saw the advantage they had gained, and profited by it. After a short consultation with M. Senard, M. Anthony Thouret rose, and in a tone of contempt, which was not even disguised, he said, that after the few short words they had heard, he was quite satisfied that his fears from the 'pretender' were exaggerated, and that his amendment was needless, and that he therefore withdrew it. The observation was received with loud plaudits from all sides of the Assembly, excepting from that upon which Prince Louis Napoleon and his friends were seated. The Débats says that the words spoken by the oratorical novice produced a marvellous effect, for that they set those who most feared him quite at their ease."

§ 114. ENGRAVERS AND ENGRAVING.

1162. PRINCE RUPERT'S DISCOVERY.

PRINCE RUPERT, nephew to Charles I., who devoted himself much to the prosecution of chemical and philosophical experiments, as well as the practice of mechanic arts, for which he was famous, was the inventor of mezzotinto, of which he is said to have taken the hint from a soldier scraping his rusty fusil.

The prince, going out early one morning, observed a sentinel at some distance from his post, very busy doing something to his piece. The prince was one of those men that go through the world with their eyes open, and, though not at all disposed to interfere with others' business, was naturally and properly enough inquisitive. Accordingly he approached him, and without preliminaries inquired what he was about. He replied, that the dew had fallen in the night, and made his fusil rusty, and therefore he was scraping and cleaning it. The prince, looking at it, was struck with something like a figure eaten into the barrel, with innumerable little holes closed together, like frieze work on gold and silver, part of which the soldier had scraped away. From this trifling incident Prince Rupert conceived the idea of mezzotinto. He concluded that some contrivance might be found to cover a brass plate with such a grained ground of fine pressed holes, as would undoubtedly give an impression all black, and that, by scraping away proper parts, the smooth superficies would leave the rest of the paper white. Communicating his ideas to Wallerant Vaillant, a painter, they made several experiments, and at last invented a steel roller, cut with tools to make teeth like a file or rasp, with projecting points, which effectually produced the black grounds; those being scraped away, and diminished at pleasure, left the gradations of light. It is said that the first mezzotinto print ever published was engraved by the prince himself. It may be seen in the first edition of Evelyn's Sculptura; and there is a copy of it in the second edition, printed in 1755.

1163. BLAKE, THE POET, PAINTER, AND ENGRAVER.

Blake, the poetical painter, had served a regular apprenticeship in engraving; and in his first work of much note, — the Days of Innocence, — his triple accomplishments in poetry, painting, and engraving were displayed to fine advantage. But Blake was a great enthusiast, and believed in the reality of what his dreaming fancy painted. The pictured forms which swarmed before his eyes assumed, in his apprehension, the stability of positive revelations, and he mistook the vivid figures, which his professional imagination shaped, for the poets, and heroes, and princes of old. Among his friends, he at length ventured to intimate, that the designs on which he was engaged were not from his own mind, but copied from great works revealed to him in visions; and those who believed that would readily lend an ear to the assurance that he was commanded to execute his performances by a celestial tongue.

Of these imaginary visitations he made good use, when he invented his truly original and beautiful mode of engraving and tinting his plates. He had made the sixty-five designs of his Days of Innocence, and was meditating, he said, on the best means of multiplying their resemblance in form and in hue. He felt sorely perplexed. At last he was made aware that the spirit of his favorite brother, Robert, was in the room, and to this celestial visitor he applied for counsel. The spirit advised him at once. "Write," he said, "the poetry, and draw the designs upon the copper with a certain liquid, (which he named, and which Blake ever kept a secret,) then cut the plain parts of the plate down with aquafortis, and this will give the whole, both poetry and figures, in the manner of a stereotype." The plan recommended by this gracious spirit was adopted; the plates were engraved, and the work printed off. The artist then added a peculiar beauty of his own. He tinted both the figures and the verse with a variety of colors, among which, while the yellow prevails, the whole has a rich and lustrous beauty, to which, says Cunningham, I know little that can be compared.

1164. ORIGIN OF THE ART OF ENGRAVING.

The art of engraving has this, in common with most others, that its source is involved in obscurity. Italy, Germany, and Holland have respectively put in their claims to the honor of the invention; though with what success it is almost impossible to determine.

The Italians tell us that Tomaso Finiguerra, a goldsmith of Florence, hit upon the method of printing from an engraved plate in the year 1460; taking off the impression upon a moistened paper, and rolling it gently with a roller. He communicated the discovery to Baccio Baldini, of his own profession and city, who pursued it with success, and engraved several plates, from drawings of one Alessandro Boticelli, which being seen, say they, by Andrea Mantegna, he not only assisted Baldini with designs, but cultivated and improved the new art himself. It was not long before Ugo da Carpi used different stamps for the gradations of lights and shades, and thereby added a variety of tints. From Italy, they state, the art travelled into Flanders, where it was first practised by Martin Schoon, of Antwerp.

The Germans contend that engraving was practised in their country long before the time of Finiguerra and Mantegna. Francis à Bochoit (say some of them) was the inventor of the art, and his immediate followers were Israel à Machenick, and Martin Stock.

But the Dutch will have the source of the art to be among them, and to have flowed from Holland into Germany, and from Germany into Italy. Laurence, of Haerlem, say they, invented not only printing, but also the method of taking off impressions on wood. And Peter Schoeffer found out the art of engraving on copper, and taking impressions from plates of that metal. When Mentz was taken, in the year 1462, and Schoeffer's printing office broken up, the workmen, say they, dispersed, and along with their own art carried engraving and copperplate printing into Germany, where they became commonly practised about the year 1465. Conrad Schweynheim, of Mentz, they add, with Arnold Pannartz, imported all these arts into Italy about the same year.

Thus have these three nations contended for the invention of the art of engraving; the champions of each carrying up the antiquity of the art, in his own nation, as high as they could.

From more reasonable evidence, however, it appears that wood-cuts for books came into use about or before 1450; and the art of printing from copperplates may, perhaps, be dated as high as 1465.

The invention of etching seems to have been about forty years posterior to that of engraving. It appears to have been commonly practised in Germany, both at Nuremburg and Frankfort, about 1512; not long after which, it is probable, the artists found out the way of uniting etching and engraving together.

1165. ANGELO AND ALBERT DURER.

Charles V. asked Michael Angelo, in what estimation he held Albert Durer; when, with all the noble frankness of a man of genius, who knows how to appreciate superior talents, he instantly replied, "I esteem him so highly, that I would, if I were not Michael Angelo, much rather be Albert Durer than even the Emperor Charles V."

1166. COPPERPLATE ENGRAVING.

The invention of copperplate engraving is believed to have been derived from Maso Finiguerra, a Florentine, who lived between the years 1400 and 1460. It is said that he impressed with earth all the things which he engraved in silver, for the purpose of filling them with niello, a metallic substance reduced to powder, composed of silver, copper, lead, sulphur, and borax; and having poured over the earthen impressions liquid sulphur, they became printed, and filled with smoke. "Whence," says Vasari, "being rubbed with oil, they showed the same as the silver; and this he also did with damped paper, and with the same tint, pressing it over with a round roller, smooth in every part, which not only made them appear printed, but as if drawn with a pen."

1167. WOOD ENGRAVING.

The first engraving on wood, of which there is any record in Europe, is that of the Actions of Alexander, by the two Cunios, executed in the year 1285 or 1286. The engravings are eight in number, and in size about nine inches by six. In a frontispiece decorated with fanciful ornaments there is an inscription which states the engravings to have been by "Alessandro Alberico Cunio Cavaliere, and Isabella Cunio, twin brother and sister; first reduced, imagined, and attempted to be executed in relief, with a small knife on blocks of wood, made even and polished by this learned and dear sister; continued and finished by us together, at Ravenna, from the eight pictures of our invention, painted six times larger than here represented; engraved, explained by verses, and thus marked upon the paper, to perpetuate the number of them, and to enable us to present them to our relations and friends in testimony of gratitude, friendship, and affection. All this was done and finished by us when only sixteen years of age." This account, which was given by Papillion, who saw the engravings, has been much disputed; but Mr. Ottly, in his late valuable work, deems it authentic.

1168. COMICAL ILLUSTRATION.

In Wicrix's Bible, 1594, is an illustration of the parable of the prodigal son, from Luke xv.: "And there wasted his substance with riotous living." It represents the prodigal, after his money is spent, running away from a woman, who beats him down the steps of a tavern with her shoes, and is assisted in the assault by two men. A dog on the steps is barking at him, and a dwarf, dressed like a court fool, having dropped his mace, mocks him, by placing the thumb of his right hand upon the end of his nose, and on the little finger of that, the thumb of his left hand, spreading the fingers as far as possible.

1169. DECEPTION OF AN ENGRAVER.

Marc Antonio Raimondi raised himself into notice in the following manner: Many engravings by Albert Durer were brought to Venice for sale, and Raimondi was so much struck by the style and execution that he purchased them, and set to work to copy them, counterfeiting Albert Durer's mark, A. D. These copies appeared so similar that they were believed to be the genuine works of Albert, and, as such, were exposed to sale, and became speedily purchased. This made Albert so indignant that he quitted Flanders, and came to Venice to make a complaint against Raimondi to the government; and he was forbidden in future to make use of Albert's name or mark.

1170. IMPOSTURES.

There is a collection of engravings by that ingenious artist Bernard Picart which has been published under the title of the Innocent Impostors. Picart had long been vexed at the taste of his day, which ran wholly in favor of antiquity, and no one would look at, much less admire, a modern master. He published a pretended collection, or a set of prints, from the designs of the great painters, in which he imitated the etchings and engravings of the various masters; and much were these prints admired as the works of Guido, Rembrandt, and others. Having had his joke, they were published under the title of Impostures Innocens. The connoisseurs, however, are strangely divided in their opinion of the merit of this collection. Gilpin classes these Innocent Impostors among the most entertaining of his works, and is delighted by the happiness with which he has outdone in their own excellences the artists whom he copied; but Strutt, too grave to admit of jokes that twitch the connoisseurs, declares that they could never have deceived an experienced judge, and reprobates such kinds of ingenuity played off at the cost of the venerable brotherhood of the cognoscenti!

1171. TRICKS OF ENGRAVERS.

The tricks of transmutation which are often played with copperplate engravings are well known. At the time when the person so justly execrated and branded with the name of "The Monster" made such a noise, the dealer in one of the catchpenny accounts of his life and adventures was very desirous of giving to the public some representation of him. Not being able suddenly to procure one, it was necessary for him to find a substitute. An old plate, which had been engraved for a magazine, and intended to pass for a likeness of Sir Joshua Reynolds, was luckily obtained, and was made to answer the purpose. As the print bore no resemblance whatever to Sir Joshua, and had, indeed, a most unprepossessing appearance, the original inscription was erased, "The Monster" substituted, and it did very well. In the ephemeral publications which daily issue from the press, similar metamorphoses are by no means uncommon.

1172. HOGARTH'S POETRY ON HIS ENGRAVINGS.

Accompanying the prints of Hogarth's favorite works appeared explanations in verse, sometimes with the names of the authors, but oftener without, and all alike distinguished by weakness and want of graphic accuracy, which marked the engravings. London was at that time infested with swarms of wandering verse-makers, who wrote rhymes on occasions of public mourning or private distress, and who supplied print-sellers with jingling commendations of the works which they published. They wrote epigrams for half a crown each — a fair price for four wretched lines. From such men Hogarth is supposed to have obtained many of the verses which are attached to his prints. But less charitable persons have ascribed them all to himself.

1173. A CURIOUS PIECE OF HISTORY.

About the year 1785, Alderman J. Boydell, of London, conceived the project of establishing a "Shakspeare Gallery," upon a scale of grandeur and magnificence which should be in accordance with the fame of the poet, and, at the same time, reflect honor upon the state of the arts in Great Britain and throughout the world. Mr. Boydell was at this time a man of great wealth and influence, and a patron of the fine arts, being an engraver himself, and having accumulated his fortune mostly by dealing in works of that character.

He advertised for designs from artists throughout Great Britain, and paid a guinea for every one submitted, whether accepted or not, and for every one accepted by the committee a prize of one hundred guineas. The committee for selecting these designs was composed of five eminent artists, Boydell himself being the president. The first painters of the age were then employed to paint these pictures, among whom were Sir Joshua Reynolds, Benjamin West, Fuseli, Romney, Northcote, Smirke, Sir William Beechey, and Opie.

Allan Cunningham, in his Lives of Eminent British Artists, mentions that Sir Joshua Reynolds was at first opposed to Boydell's project, as impracticable on such an immense scale; and Boydell, to gain his approbation and assistance, privately sent him a letter enclosing a thousand pound Bank of England note, and requested him to paint two pictures at his own price. What sum was eventually paid by Boydell for these pictures was never known. A magnificent building was erected in Pall Mall to exhibit this immense collection, called the Shakspeare Gallery, and was for a long time the pride of London.

The first engravers of England were employed to transfer these gems to copper, and such artists as Sharp, Bartolozzi, Earlom, Thew, Simon, Middiman, Watson, Fytler, Wilson, and many others exerted their talents for years in this great work. In some instances the labor of more than five years was expended on a single plate, and proof impressions were taken for subscribers at almost every stage of the work. At length in 1803, after nearly twenty years, the work was completed. The price fixed (which was never reduced) was two guineas each for the first three hundred impressions, and the subscription list was then filled up at one guinea each, or one hundred guineas a set, of one hundred plates.

Besides these subscriptions, large donations were made by many of the noblemen of England, to encourage the undertaking and to enable Boydell to meet his enormous outlay. The cost of the whole work, from the commencement, is said to have been more than a million pounds sterling; and although the projector was a wealthy man when he commenced it, he died, soon after its completion, a bankrupt, to the amount, it is said, of two hundred and fifty thousand pounds.

After these plates were issued, Boydell petitioned Parliament to allow him to dispose of his gallery of paintings by a lottery. The petition was granted, and the whole collection was thus disposed of. One of these finest pictures, King Lear, by Benjamin West, is now in the Boston Athenæum.

One fact in relation to these plates gives great value to them. All the principal historical characters are genuine portraits of the persons represented in the play; every picture gallery and old castle in England was ransacked to furnish these portraits.

After a certain number of copies had been taken from the plates, they were laid aside, some of them having been worn but little, while others required much labor to restore them to their original beauty. A few copies of the work have been brought to this country at different times, and are now to be found in the hands of amateurs, and in different public libraries. Many of the single prints have been sold in Boston at from fifteen to twenty-five dollars each.

1174. M'ARDELL'S PRINTS.

M'Ardell resided at the Golden Ball, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden. Of the numerous and splendid productions of this excellent engraver of pictures by Sir Joshua, nothing can be said after the declaration of Reynolds himself, that "M'Ardell's prints would immortalize him." However, I will venture to indulge in one remark more, namely, that that engraver has conferred immortality also upon himself in his wonderful print from Hogarth's picture of Captain Coram, the founder of the Foundling Hospital. A brilliant proof of this head in its finest possible state of condition, in my humble opinion, surpasses any thing in mezzotint now extant.

1175. HOGARTH'S EXPERIMENT.

Hogarth was fond of making experiments in his profession. He resolved to finish the engraving of the first print of the Election without taking any proof to ascertain the success of his labors. He had nearly spoiled the plate, and was so affected with the misadventure, that he exclaimed, "I am ruined!" He soon, however, proceeded to repair the damage, which his haste or obstinacy had caused, and with such good fortune, that the print in question is one of the clearest and cleverest of all his productions.

1176. ENGRAVING BACKWARDS.

Picture work, or lettering by an engraver, in all plates to be printed from, is done backwards, that when an impression or proof is taken, it then is restored to a correct right view, or for reading. This habit becomes so strong, that mistakes are often made in lettering rings, silver ware, door-plates, &c.

An eminent letterer was employed to cut a motto on the inside of a splendid ring, and unconsciously lettered it backwards; on its being brought to him again, he observed, "How astonishing it is that I should letter this ring backwards!" continuing his exclamations to another engraver, "I can hardly conceive it possible that I should commit such a blunder;" rubbing the ring with his burnisher at the same time, to obliterate his previous work, "'Tis almost impossible, impossible, incredible, how I could do it," &c., &c.; and then, with his pointer, marked it all in again, to be cut with the graver. "Why, what are you about?" inquired the visitant engraver; "you have marked it in again backwards." "The — I have! So it is."

1177. AFFECTING APPEAL.

Holler, the celebrated engraver, died, as he had for the principal part of his life lived, in the greatest poverty. Within a few days of his dissolution, bailiffs were sent to seize the bed on which he lay for a small debt which he was unable to discharge. "Spare me," said the expiring artist, "my bed for a little while — only till I can find another in the grave."

1178. PATRONAGE OF GENIUS.

A young engraver just entering into life, and who afterwards rose to great eminence in his profession, applied to Alderman Boydell for employment. Having never executed any considerable work, he had only some trifling specimens of his ability to show. The alderman, however, was satisfied from them that the young artist possessed abilities worthy of encouragement, and offered him a picture, if he thought himself equal to it. The young man undertook it, and agreed on twenty-five guineas as the remuneration. When the plate was quite finished, he waited on the alderman, finally to deliver it with a proof. Mr. Boydell examined it so long, and, as it seemed, so minutely, that the artist was apprehensive that he was not quite pleased with it, and resolved to ask him; adding, that he should be happy to make any improvement or correction Mr. Boydell might suggest. "O, no," replied the alderman; "I am extremely pleased with it, and desire no alteration. It is charming; and instead of twenty-five guineas, I shall give you thirty-five. Very charming indeed! the more I look at it, the more I like it. I shall give you fifty guineas." He went to his desk and wrote a check on his banker, which he gave to the artist, telling him to call on him in a few days, as he had further employment for him. The young man endeavored to express his gratitude for this unexpected and munificent liberality of his new patron; but his speech utterly failed him, when, casting his eyes on the check which he held in his hand, he found it to be for one hundred guineas. This happy event was the foundation both of his fortune and his fame.

1179. CONNOISSEURSHIP.

Sturt, a very neat writing-engraver, published a Common Prayer-book, all of which was engraved on silver plates. Unfortunately, however, it did not sell; and poor Sturt became seriously alarmed, and took every body's advice, as usual, as to what was to be done. It was at length determined to take off a number of copies privately, and then to cut the plates up publicly. After this, the hoarded copies, being brought out stealthily, one by one, as particular favors, fetched greater prizes. Such are the follies and tricks in the world of connoisseurs.

1180. LE DIABLE BOITEUX.

A curious edition of the New Testament was published in 1552, with many wood-cuts of singular character. The engraving to the 8th chapter of St. Matthew represents the devil, with a wooden leg, sowing tares.

1181. SMALL WORK

It is stated that Charles Toppan, of Philadelphia, has engraved the Lord's Prayer on a piece of metal the size only of one tenth of a square inch! This is probably the most wonderful instance of microscopic engraving ever executed.

We once saw the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the 10th Psalm engraved in the flowing curls of the wig of George II., in a portrait of that monarch that adorned the frontispiece of the Book of Common Prayer.

§ 115. EPIGRAMS.

1182. QUEEN ELIZABETH.

She was the most accomplished woman of her age, and often spoke with as much spirit and dignity as she acted.

She evaded giving a direct answer to a theological question respecting the sacrament of the Lord's supper, with admirable address. On being asked by a Popish priest whether she allowed the real presence, she replied, —

"Christ was the word that spake it;
He took the bread and brake it;
And what that word did make it,
That I believe and take it."

1183. DR. TRAPP'S WIT.

His majesty King George I. made a present of books to the University of Cambridge, soon after the commencement of the tumults at Oxford, on which occasion Dr. Trapp wrote the following epigram: —

"Our royal master saw with heedful eyes
The wants of his two Universities:
Troops he to Oxford sent, as knowing why
That learned body wanted loyalty;
But books to Cambridge gave, as well discerning
That that right loyal body wanted learning."

This epigram received a retort from Sir William Brown, as it is said, impromptu: —

"The king to Oxford sent a troop of horse,
For Tories know no argument but force;
With equal care to Cambridge books he sent,
For Whigs allow no force but argument."

1184. A SMART RETORT.

The following is from the pen of a celebrated Irish wit. Lord E. declared in a large party, that "a wife was only a tin canister tied to one's tail;" upon which Lady E. was presented with the following lines: —

"Lord E. at woman presuming to rail,
Calls a wife a 'tin canister tied to one's tail';
And fair Lady Anne, while the subject he carries on,
Seems hurt at his lordship's degrading comparison."

"But wherefore degrading? Considered aright,
A canister's polished, and useful, and bright;
And should dirt its original purity hide,
That's the fault of the puppy to whom it is tied!"

1185. METHOD IN MADNESS.

A lunatic in Raleigh, N. C., recently penned the following magnificent — ay, sublime — lines, and sent them to the register of that place for publication: —

"Tell them I AM, JEHOVAH said
To Moses, while Earth heard in dread,
And, smitten to the heart,
At once, above, beneath, around,
All nature, without voice or sound,
Replied, O LORD! THOU ART!"

1186. POLITICAL WITTICISM.

The following epigram was written on a pane of glass in a tavern window at Huddersfield, England: —

"'The queen is with us,' whigs exulting say,
'For, when she found us in, she let us stay.'
It may be so, but give me leave to doubt
How long she'll keep you when she finds you out."

1187. WITTY IMPROMPTU.

Serjeant C. was of a very rubicund countenance, and sometimes rather prolix in his arguments. On one occasion, when, in the full dress costume of his court, he was delivering a very long speech, a wit by his side wrote this epigram: —

"The serjeant pleads with face on fire,
And all the court may rue it;
His purple garment comes from Tyre,
His arguments go to it."

1188. VENTILATION OF THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

The London Times publishes the following epigram on Dr. Reid's being allowed to ventilate the houses of Parliament by alternate blasts of hot and cold air: —

"Peel's patronage of Dr. Reed
Is very natural indeed;
For no one need be told
The worthy, scientific man
Is acting on the premier's plan
Of blowing hot and cold."

1189. BOILEAU.

Boileau used to say that the best epigrams originated in conversation; and of all his own he gave the preference to the following: —

"Ci-gît ma femme, ah qu'elle est bien Pour son repos, et pour le mien!"

"Here lies my wife, and Heaven knows,
Not less for mine than her repose!"

EPITAPHS.

§ 116. APT AND APPROPRIATE.

1190. POPE'S NURSE.

There is in Twickenham Churchyard an inscription to the memory of the woman who nursed Pope, of which the following is a copy:—

"To the memory of MARY BEACH, who died November 5, 1725, aged 78.

"Alexander Pope, whom she nursed in his infancy, and whom she affectionately attended for twenty-eight years, in gratitude for such a faithful old servant, erected this stone."

1191. UNMERITED REMEMBRANCE.

Oblivion blindly scattereth her poppy, and deals with the memory of men without distinction as to merit of perpetuity. Who can but pity the founder of the pyramids? Herostratus lives that burnt the temple of Diana; he is almost lost that built it. Time hath spared the epitaph of Adrian's horse—confounded that of himself. In vain we compute our felicities by the advantage of our good names, since bad ones have equal durations; and Thersites is likely to live as long as Agamemnon, without the favor of the Everlasting Register.

1192. LIFE AN EMBLEM OF A DAY.

A gentleman travelling in Europe copied the following lines from a tombstone in a graveyard, in Llangollen, North Wales:—

"Our life is but a winter day—
Some only breakfast and away;
Others to dinner stay, and are well fed:
The oldest man but sups and goes to bed.
Large is his debt who lingers out the day:
Who goes the soonest has the least to pay."

1193. BURNS AND THE SICK LADY.

Burns called to see a young lady who was rather indisposed. "Well, Jessie," said he, "how do you do to-day?" "Very poorly: Mr. Burns, I want you to write my epitaph." "O, you are not likely to die yet, Jessie." "Well, be it as it may, you must write my epitaph." Getting the pen, ink, and paper at the time, he then penned these lines:—

"Say, sage, where's the charm on earth
Can turn death's dart aside?
It is not purity or worth—Else Jessie had not died."

1194. PIRON'S SARCASM.

Piron wrote his own epitaph in a style of humility, pointed with a bitter sarcasm against the French academicians:—

"Ci-gît Piron, qui ne fut rien, Pas même académicien."

1195. VOICES FROM CHURCHYARDS.

In Luton Churchyard, Bedfordshire, an uncourtly voice from the dead to the living speaks as follows:—

"Reader! I have left a world
In which I had much to do,
Sweating and fretting to get rich.
Just such a fool as you."

The following quaint epitaph is copied from a churchyard in Finsbury, near Chatham:—

"Time was I stood as thou dost now,
And viewed the dead as thou dost me:
Ere long thou'lt lie as low as I,
And others stand to look on thee."

1196. GOV. ELIHU YALE.

Governor Elihu Yale, whose name was given to the college, was born in New Haven, 1648. At the age of ten years he was taken to England, where he received his education. Subsequently he went to the East Indies, acquired a great estate, and was made governor of Fort St. George, on the coast of Malabar. After his return to England, he was chosen governor of the East India Company. President Clapp says, "He was a gentleman who greatly abounded in good humor and generosity, as well as in wealth; and his name and memory will be gratefully perpetuated in Yale College." An engraving likeness of Governor Yale is one of the first you see on entering the Trumbull Gallery, connected with the college. The following is the epitaph in the churchyard at Wrexham:—

"Under this tomb lyes interred ELIHU YALE, of Place Gronow, Esq.; born 5th of April, 1648, and died the 8th of July, 1721, aged 73 years.

"Born in America, in Europe bred,
In Africa travel'd, and in Asia wed,
Where long he lived and thrived; at London dead.
Much Good, some ill he did: so hope all's even,
And that his soul through Mercy's gone to Heaven

"You that survive and read, take care
For this most certain exit to prepare.
Only the Actions of the Just Smell sweet and blossom in the dust."

1197. THE MORNING AND EVENING OF LIFE.

The following is an inscription on a tombstone in Massachusetts. It is beautiful:—

"I came in the morning—it was spring,
And I smiled;
I walked out at noon—it was summer,
And I was glad;
I sat me down at even—it was autumn,
And I was sad;
I laid me down at night—it was winter,
And I slept."

1198. FRANKLIN'S OWN EPITAPH.

The following epitaph was written by himself many years previous to his death :—

"The body of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, printer,

(like the cover of an old book, its contents torn out and strip of its lettering and gilding,) lies here food for worms; yet the work itself shall not be lost, for it will (as he believed) appear once more in a new and more beautiful edition, corrected and amended by the Author."

§ 117. ECCENTRIC AND CURIOUS.

1199. SLIPPERS ON A MONUMENT.

In a church at Amsterdam there is a very ancient funeral monument of white marble, on which are engraved a pair of slippers, of a very singular kind, with this inscription, "Effen Nyt," which means exactly; and the story of this singularity is this: A man who was very rich, but who was a bon vivant, took it into his head that he was to live a certain number of years, and no longer. Under the impression of this idea, he calculated that if he spent so much a year, his estate and his life would expire together. It accidentally happened that he was not mistaken in either of his calculations; he died precisely at that time which he had presented to himself in fancy, and had then brought his fortune to such a predicament, that after the paying of his debts, he had nothing left but a pair of slippers. His relations buried him in a creditable manner, and had the slippers carved on his tomb, with the above laconic device.

1200. SIR WILLIAM SUTTON'S EPITAPH.

Sir William Sutton's epitaph, in Aram, or Averham Church, Notts :—

"Sir William Sutton's corpse here tombéd sleeps, Whose happy soul in better mansion keeps.
Thrice nine years lived he with his Lady fair,
A lovely, noble, and like virtuous pair.
Their generous offspring, parents' Joy of heart,
Eight of each sex: of each an equal part,
Ushered to Heaven their Father; and the other Remained behind him to attend their Mother."

1201. WHALLEY'S GRANDFATHER.

Richard Whalley, grandfather of the regicide, died in 1583, at the age of 84, and these verses were inscribed on his monument :—

"Behold his wives were number three :
Two of them died in right good fame :
The third this tomb erected she
For him who well deserved the same,

Both for his life and godly end,
Which all that knows must needs commend,
And they that know not, yet may see
A worthy Whalley, lo! 'was he.

'Since time brings all things to an end,
Let us ourselves apply,
And learn by this our faithful friend,
That here in tomb doth lie,
To fear the Lord, and eke behold
The fairest is but dust and mold :
For so we are, so once was he;
And as he is, so must we be."

1202. A MONUMENTAL CONCERT.

The following epitaph is on an old monument in St. Ann and St. Agnes Church :—

Qu	an	tris	di	c	vul	stra
os	guis	ti	ro	um	nerc	vit
H	san	Chris	mi	c	mu	la

In this distich, the last syllable in each word in the upper line is the same as that of each corresponding word in the last line, and is to be found in the centre. It reads thus :—

"Quos anguis tristi diro cum vulnere stravit, Hos sanguis Christi miro cum munere lavit."

TRANSLATION.

"Those who have felt the serpent's venom'd wound,
In Christ's miraculous blood have healing found."

1203. JOHN CABECCA IN THE CHOIR OF ANGELS.

The following epitaph is to be seen at Saragossa, in Spain :—

"Here lies JOHN CABECCA, precentor of My Lord the King. When he is admitted to the choir of angels, whose society he will embellish, and where he will distinguish himself by his powers of song, God shall say to the angels, 'Cease, ye calves! and let me hear John Cabecca, the precentor of My Lord the King!'"

§ 118. HUMOROUS.

1204. CHARLES II. AND ROCHESTER.

King Charles II. once said, over his bottle, in his usual lively way, that he supposed some stupid peasant would write a nonsensical epitaph on him when he was gone. "Now," says his majesty, "I should like to have something appropriate and witty, Rochester, let's have a touch of your pen on the subject."

His lordship instantly obeyed the command, and produced the following :—

"Here lies our sovereign Lord the King, Whose word no man relied on;
Who never said a foolish thing,
And never did a wise one."

For this keen effusion Rochester remained some time in disgrace.

1205. GREENTREE'S RESURRECTION.

Upon the tomb of one Isaac Greentree, in Harrow Churchyard, is inscribed the following:—

"There is a time when these green trees shall fall,
And Isaac Greentree rise above them all."

1206. POPE'S PARODY.

"You know," says Pope, "I love short inscriptions, and that may be the reason why I like the epitaph on the Count of Mirandola * so well. Some time ago I made a parody on it for a man of very opposite character:—

'Here lies Lord Coningsby; be civil:
The rest God knows, perhaps the devil.'

1207. FULLER'S EARTH.

Fuller, the well-known author of British Worthies, wrote his own epitaph, as it appears in Westminster Abbey. It consists of but four words, but it speaks volumes:—

"Here lies Fuller's earth."

1208. BELOE'S PUN.

Beloe, in his anecdotes, gives a good punning epitaph on William Lawes, the musical composer, who was killed by the Roundheads:—

"Concord is conquer'd! In his urn there lies
The master of great Music's mysteries;
And in it is a riddle, like the cause,
Will Lawes was slain by men whose Wills were Laws."

1209. THE DULCE AND THE UTILE.

When Sir John Carr was in Glasgow, about the year 1807, he was asked by the magistrates to give his advice concerning the inscription to be placed on Nelson's monument, then just completed. The travelling knight recommended this brief record: "Glasgow to Nelson."

"True," said one of the bailies, "and as there is the town of Nelson near us, we might add, 'Glasgow to Nelson, ix. miles,' so that the column might serve both for a milestone and a monument."

1210. CUTTING REBUFF.

Louis XVI. was presented with an epitaph on Molière by an indifferent poet. "I would rather," said his majesty, "that Molière had brought me yours."

1211. JOSEPH GREEN'S HUMOR.

Joseph Green, a graduate of Harvard College of 1726, who was somewhat celebrated in his day as a

* Johannes jacet hic Mirandola: cetera norunt Et Tagus, et Ganges, forsae et Antipodes.

poet, was applied to, on all sorts of occasions, to furnish odes, epitaphs, and other poetical scraps. It is related of him that on one occasion a rather verdant specimen of humanity came into his store, and requested him to write an epitaph on a man who died in his service. Green told him that in order to write, he must know something about the character of the man; but all he could pump out of the applicant was, that the deceased beat every body but himself in raking hay. The poet, who had a vein of humor and satire in his nature, immediately took his pen, and after putting down the name, wrote,—

"He could rake hay; none could rake faster, Except that raking dog, his master."

1212. MARRYING IN PLUTO'S REALMS.

The following is a copy of an epitaph in the churchyard at North Shields, which has been the subject of much laughter to many persons on account of its absurdity:—

"In memory of James Bell, of North Shields, who died 16th of Jan., 1763, aged 42 years. Margaret, widow of the above said Jas. Bell, died Dec. 30, aged 49 years. She was wife, after, to Wm. Fenwick, of North Shields."

The following lines were written underneath it with a pencil:—

"As in the Scriptures it is said
No marriages in heaven are made,
It seems that Margaret's ghost did go
To Pluto's dreary realms below,
Where she, poor soul, not long had tarried,
Till her friend Will and her got married."

1213. SINGULAR TASTE.

In a churchyard in Plymouth, Connecticut, at the close of a long list of virtues ascribed to an aged Christian mother, we find the following curious item:—

"She left five sons; all of them sustained the office of deacon."

1214. BYRON'S MISANTHROPY.

Byron's misanthropy vented itself in an epitaph on his Newfoundland dog, which he concluded with the following lines:—

"To mark a friend's remains these stones arise;
I never knew but one, and here he lies."

1215. EPITAPH ON THE ANIMALS

Epitaphs have been written on animals by others besides Byron. The following is one of them:—

*L'oiseau sous ces fleurs enterré,
N'ayant pas par son ramage,
N'étonnait pas par son plumage,
Mais il aimait, il fut pleuré.*

§ 119. EXERCISE, PHYSICAL.

1216. SHAKSPEARE, WESLEY, BURRITT, SCOTT, AND OTHERS.

SHAKSPEARE, while composing his immortal plays, carried brick and mortar to build places for their performance.

John Wesley rode and walked a great many thousand miles, and it was this habitual exercise which prepared his gigantic intellect to put forth those mighty efforts which enabled him to do so much good, and which must immortalize his name.

Elihu Burritt, one of the greatest scholars of the age, so far as the mere study of language is concerned, was for a long course of years compelled, by stern necessity, — that best of all merely human instructors, — to work eight hours daily at the anvil, in order to furnish himself with the means of prosecuting his intellectual labors; and the fact of his thus laboring daily facilitated his astonishing strides in the acquisition of knowledge.

Sir Walter Scott, after confining himself to his desk for several days, till the energies of his brain had become exhausted, would mount his horse, call out his dogs, and follow the chase for days in succession, till he had restored his prostrated energies, and then return to his study.

When Byron entered college, fearing that his tendency to corpulency would injure his personal beauty, — of which he was very proud, — he took severe exercise daily in order to reduce it, besides leading an extremely abstemious life.

Webster was a backwoodsman, born in a "log cabin," on the borders of the unbroken forest, and inured to hard labor. And often, breaking away from public life, and shouldering his gun, he ranged the forests for days in search of game, besides taking much exercise daily.

Franklin, the beacon star of his profession, was a practical printer, and a hard worker.

Patrick Henry, that unrivalled star of genius and eloquence, labored on the farm while young, and was passionately fond of music, dancing, and the chase, the latter of which he often followed for weeks together, camping out in true hunter's style.

Need we mention the father of our country, its pride and pattern? Washington, when not employed by his country, labored assiduously upon his farm, and was actually driving his plough when he received the news of his election as president.

Harrison, "the farmer of North Bend," led a life of great physical exertion and exposure.

Burns, the Scottish bard, actually composed much of his poetry when at work on the farm.

President Dwight, the great theologian and scholar, attributed much of his mental vigor to daily labor in his garden.

John Quincy Adams, one of the most learned men of the age, found much daily exercise indispensable.

1217. BEATTIE, PASCAL, BOERHAAVE.

Dr. Beattie used to work with carpenter's tools.

In the Academy of Port Royal, in France, every member was required to labor at some mechanical business, partly for the benefit of his health. The eminent Pascal was a maker of wooden shoes in this establishment.

Gardening is an excellent employment for the sedentary person. The celebrated Boerhaave was exceedingly fond of this relaxation.

1218. THE ENGLISH BURRITT

Samuel Lee, professor of Hebrew at the University of Cambridge, (England,) was seventeen years of age before he conceived the idea of learning a foreign language. Out of the scanty pittance of his weekly earnings as a carpenter, he purchased, at a bookstore, a volume, which, when read, was exchanged for another; and so on, by degrees, he advanced in knowledge. He had not the privilege of balancing between reading and relaxation, he was obliged to pass from bodily fatigue to mental exertion. During six years previous to his twenty-fifth year, he omitted none of the hours usually appropriated to manual labor, and he retired to rest regularly at ten o'clock, P. M. And yet at the age of thirty-one years he had actually taught seventeen languages.

Elihu Burritt has read a greater number of languages, but it is doubted whether he could teach half as many.

1219. WORKING FOR HEALTH.

"If we would make a well man sick," says Theodore Weld, in his Report on Manual Labor Institutions, "or kill a sick man by piecemeal, we need only require him to practise regularly some formal muscular movement, and to keep up his spirits by such a sing-song as this: —

'I'm doing this for my health,
I'm doing this for my health,
For my health, for my health,
I'm doing this for my health.'"

The error alluded to consists not in laboring to promote health, but in thinking too much about our ill health.

FICTION.

§ 120. HISTORICAL ITEMS.

1220. CHARACTER OF EARLY ROMANCES.

HE earliest romances appear in a metrical form, about the middle of the twelfth century. The first was Estoires, or pretended chronicles, like that of the Brut of Wales: the romances of martial achievement then predominated—those of the knights of Arthur, and the paladins of Charlemagne. The adventures of love and gallantry were of a later epoch. In the mutability of taste, an extraordinary transisition occurred: after nearly two centuries passed in rhyming, all the verse was to be turned into prose. Whether voluminous rhymes satiated the public ear, or novelty in the form was sought, even when they had but little choice, the writers of romance, a very flexible gentry, who, of all other writers, servilely accommodate themselves to the public taste, with more fluent pen loitered into a more ample page; or, as they expressed themselves, “translated de rime en prose.”

On the discovery of the typographic art, in the fifteenth century, many of these prose romances in manuscript received a new life by passing through the press; and these, in their venerable lettres Gothiques, are still hoarded, for the solace of the curious, in fictions of genuine antiquity, and of invention in its prime, both at home and abroad; and in a reduced form we find them surviving among the people on the continent. It is singular that the metrical romances seem never to have received the honors conferred on the prose. These romances, in their manuscript state, were cherished objects: the mighty tomes, sometimes consisting of forty or fifty thousand lines, described as those “great books of parchment,” or the “great book of romances,” were usually embellished, by the pen and pencil, with every ornament that fancy could suggest, bound in crimson velvet, guarded by clasps of silver, and studded with golden roses; profuse of gorgeous illuminations, and decorated with the most delicate miniatures, “lined with gold of graver’s work” on an azure ground; or the purple page setting off the silvery letters;—objects then of perpetual attraction to the story-believing reader, and which now charm the eye which could not as patiently con the endless page. A collection of these romances, formed into three folio tomes in manuscript, was enriched by seven hundred and forty-seven miniatures, with the initials painted in gold and colors.

Studies for the artist, as for the curious antiquary, we may view the plumage in a casque, curved and falling with peculiar grace, and a lady’s robe floating in its amplitude, and ornaments of dress arranged, which our taste might emulate. A French amateur, who possessed le Roman de la Violette, a romance of a fabulous Count of Nevers, was so deeply struck by its exquisite and faithful miniatures, that he employed the best artists to copy the most interesting, and placed them in his collection of the costume and fashions of the French nation—a collection preserved in the Royal Library of France.

In a group of figures we may observe that the heads are not mechanically cast by one mould; but the distinct character looks as if the thoughtful artist had worked out his recollections on which he had meditated. In some of the heads, portraits of distinguished persons have been recognized. Not less observable are the arabesques often found on the margins, where the playful pencil has prodigally flung flowers and fruit, imitating the bloom, or insects, which look as if they had lighted on the leaf. These margins, however, occasionally exhibit arabesques of a very different character—figures or subjects which often amused the pencil of the monastic limners, satirical strokes aimed at their brothers and sisters, the monks and the nuns! We have observed a wolf, in a monk’s frock and cowl, stretching its paw to bless a cock, bending its submissive head; a cat, in the habit of an abbess, holding a platter in its paws to a mouse approaching to lick it, alluding to the allurements of abbesses to draw young women into their convents; and a sow, in a nun’s veil, mounted on stilts. A pope appears to be thrown by devils into a caldron, and cardinals are roasting on spits. All these expressions of suppressed opinion must have been executed by the monks themselves. These reformers, before the reformation, sympathized with the popular feeling against the haughty prelate and luxurious abbot.

The great romance of Alexander, preserved in the Bodleian Library, reveals a secret of the cost of time freely bestowed on that single and mighty tome. The illuminator, by preserving the date when he had completed his own work, compared with that of the transcriber when he had finished his part, appears to have employed nearly six years on the paintings which embellish this precious volume.

To the writers of ancient romance we cannot deny a copious invention, a variegated imagination, and, among their rambling exuberances and grotesque marvels, those enticing enchantments which the Greeks and Romans only partially and coldly raised. We may often, too, discover that truth of human nature which is not always supposed to lie hid in these desultory compositions. Amid their peculiar extravagances, which at least may serve to raise an occasional smile, the strokes of nature are abundant, and may still form the studies of the writers of fiction, however they may hang on the impatience of the writers and the readers of our duodecimos.

1221. POETICAL MONKS.

We cannot think, less than Père Hardouin, that there were no poetical and imaginative monks—Homers in cowl, and Virgils who chanted vespers—who could compose in their unoccupied day more romances than their crude legends, or the dry annals of the leger book of their abbey. Some knowledge these writers had of the mythological and even the Homeric and Virgilian fiction, for they often gave duplicates of the classical fables of antiquity. Circe was a fair sorceress, the one-eyed Polyphemus a dread giant, and Perseus bestrode a winged dragon, before they were reflected in romances. But what we discover peculiar in these works is a strange mixture of sacred and profane matters, always treated in a manner which scents of the cloister. Before he enters the combat, the knight is often on his knees, invoking his patron saint; he proffers his vows on holy relics; while ladies placed in the last peril, or the most delicate positions, by their frequent repetitions of the sign of the cross, or a vow to found an abbey, are as certainly saved: and for another refined stroke of the monachal invention, the heroes often close their career in a monastery or hermitage. The monkish morality, which sat loosely about them, was, however, rigid in its ceremonial discipline.

Lancelot de Lac leaves the bed of the guilty Genevra, the queen of the good King Arthur, at the ring of the matin bell, to assist at mass; so scrupulous were such writers that even in criminal levities they should not neglect all the offices of the church.

The subject of one of these great romances is a search after the cup which held the real blood of Christ; and this history of the sang-real forms a series of romances. Who but a monk would have thought, and even dared to have written it down, that all the circumstances in this romance were not only certain, but were originally set down by the hand of Jesus himself? and further dared to observe, that Jesus had never written but twice before—the Lord's prayer, and the sentence on the woman taken in adultery? Such a pious or blasphemous fraud was not unusual among the dark fancies of the monastic legends.

Some of these Homers must have left their lengthening Iliad, as Homer himself seems to have done, unfinished; tired, or tiring, for no doubt there was often a rehearsal; "the tale half told" was often resumed by some Elisha who caught the mantle his more inspired predecessor had let fall. It appears evident that several were the continuators of a favorite romance; and from deficient attention or deficient skill, a fatal discrepancy has been detected in the identical characters—the ordinary fate of those who write after the ideas of another, with indistinct conceptions, or with fancies going contrary to those of the first inventor.

1222. ECCLESIASTIC ARTISTS.

In the history of literature we discover a whole generation of writers, authors of the Gothic romance, who, so far from claiming the honor of their inventions, or aspiring after the meed of fame, have even studiously concealed their claims, and, with a modesty and caution difficult to comprehend, dropped into their graves without a solitary commemoration.

These idling works of idlers must have been the pleasant productions of persons of great leisure, with some tincture of literature, and to whom, by the peculiarity of their condition, fame was an absolute nullity. Who were these writers who thus contemned fame? Who pursued the delicate tasks of the illuminator and the calligrapher? Who adorned psalters with a religious patience, and expended a whole month in contriving a vignette of an initial letter? Who were these artists who worked for no gain? In those ages the ecclesiastics were the only persons who answer to this character; and it would only be in the silence and leisure of the monastery that such imaginative genius and such refined art could find their dwelling-place. I have sometimes thought that it was Père Hardouin's conviction of all this literary industry of the monks which led him to indulge his extravagant conjecture, that the classical writings of antiquity were the fabrications of this sedentary brotherhood; and his "pseudo Virgilius" and "pseudo Horatius" astonished the world, though they provoked its laughter. The Gothic mediæval periods were ages of imagination, when in art works of amazing magnitude were produced, while the artists sent down no claims to posterity. We know not who were the numerous writers of these voluminous romances, but, what is far more surprising, we are nearly as unacquainted with those great and original architects who covered our land with the palatial monastery, the church, and the cathedral. In the religious societies themselves the genius of the Gothic architect was found: the bishop or the abbot planned while they opened their treasury; and the sculptor and the workmen were the tenants of the religious house. The devotion of labor and of faith raised these wonders, while it placed them beyond the unvalued glory which the world can give.

121. AUTHORS, THEIR PECULIARITIES, &c.

1223. MAGNANIMITY OF CERVANTES.

Michael Cervantes Saavedra, the author of Don Quixote, gave a proof that his generosity was equal to his genius. He was, in the early part of his life, for some time a slave in Algiers, and there he concerted a plan to free himself and thirteen fellow-sufferers. One of them traitorously betrayed the design, and they were all conveyed to the Dey of Algiers; and he promised them their lives on condition they discovered the contriver of the plot. "I was that person," exclaimed the intrepid Cervantes; "save my companions, and let me perish." The dey, struck with his noble confession, spared his life, allowed him to be ransomed, and permitted him to depart home.

This writer of an incomparable romance, replete with character, incident, pleasantry, and humor, without any alloy of vulgarity, obscenity, or irreligion, which is held in admiration throughout the civilized world, starved in the midst of a high reputation, and died in penury.

As Philip III., King of Spain, was standing in a balcony of his palace at Madrid, and viewing the prospects of the surrounding country, he observed a student on the banks of the River Manzanares, reading a book, and from time to time breaking off, and beating his forehead with extraordinary tokens of pleasure and delight; upon which the king said to those about him, "That scholar is either mad, or he is reading Don Quixote."

This anecdote is worth a volume of panegyric.

The history of Don Quixote did not wait for the tardy fame of remote ages. It was universally read, and as universally admired, as soon as published; and the most eminent painters, engravers, and sculptors vied with each other in representing the story of the Knight of La Mancha; yet the author had not interest enough to obtain even the smallest pension from the court. Friendless and indigent, however, as Cervantes was, he retained his incomparable humor and facetiousness to the end of his life.

M. de Boulay attended the French ambassador to Spain, while Cervantes was yet alive. He said that the ambassador one day complimented Cervantes on the reputation he had acquired by his Don Quixote, and that Cervantes whispered in his ear, "Had it not been for the Inquisition, I should have made my book much more entertaining."

Steele's House at Liangunnol.

1224. DESTITUTION OF STERNE.

Garrick lived many years in Southampton Street, at the house now known as Enstey's Hotel, exactly opposite Tavistock Street. There is a painful recollection connected with that building. Poor Sterne, a very little time before his death, being in a state of destitution, bent his steps thither to borrow five pounds of the Roscius. It was evening. On arriving at the house, he heard music, and knew that Garrick had a party; he was not habited for such a scene; he heard the merry laugh within, and gently replacing the uplifted knocker, turned away to struggle with his wants as he might. We never feel our miseries so keenly as when thus contrasted with the merriment and enjoyment of others; then, and then only, does the sufferer realize Wordsworth's picture:—

"And homeless near a thousand homes I stood,
And near a thousand tables pined for food."

1225. REGALTY OF GENIUS.

Gibbon, in speaking of his own genealogy, refers to the fact of Fielding being of the same family as the Earl of Denbigh, who, in common with the imperial family of Austria, is descended from the celebrated Rodolph of Hapsburg. "While the one branch," he says, "have contented themselves with being sheriffs of Leicestershire and justices of the peace, the others have been emperors of Germany and kings of Spain; but the magnificent romance of Tom Jones will be read with pleasure when the palace of the Escorial is in ruins, and the imperial eagle of Austria is rolling in the dust."

1226. STEELE ADVERTISED. HIS ANNOYANCES.

When Steele first went up to London to reside, he was forced to quit his first lodgings by reason of an officious landlady, who would be asking him every morning how he had slept. He then fell into an honest family, and lived very happily for above a week, when his landlord, who was a jolly, good-natured fellow, took it into his head that he wanted company, and would, therefore, frequently come into his chamber to keep him from being alone. This the victim bore for two or three days; but the intruder telling him one morning that "he was afraid he was melancholy," he thought it was high time for him to be gone, and at once took new lodgings. About a week afterwards, he found that his jolly landlord, who was an honest, hearty man, had put him into an advertisement in the daily papers, something in this wise: "Whereas a melancholy man left his lodgings on Thursday last, in the afternoon, and was afterwards seen going towards Islington, if any one can give notice of him to R. B., fishmonger, in the Strand, he shall be well rewarded for his pains."

1227. CUTTING RETORT.

Sterne, who used his wife very ill, was one day talking to Garrick, in a fine sentimental manner, in praise of conjugal love and fidelity. "The husband," said Sterne, "who behaves unkindly to his wife, deserves to have his house burnt over his head." "If you think so," said Garrick, "I hope your house is insured."

1228. STERNE'S HARD-HEARTEDNESS.

"What is called sentimental writing," says Horace Walpole, "though it be understood to appeal solely to the heart, may be the product of a bad one. One would imagine that Sterne had been a man of a very tender heart; yet I know, from indubitable authority, that his mother, who kept a school, having run in debt on account of an extravagant daughter, would have rotted in jail if the parents of the scholars had not raised a subscription for her. Her son had too much sentiment to have any feeling. A dead ass was more important to him than a living mother."

1229. STERNE'S COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE.

Some letters and papers of Sterne reveal a piece of secret history of the sentimentalist. The letters are addressed to a young lady of the name of De Fourmantel, whose ancestors were the Berangers de Fourmantel, who, during the persecution of the French Protestants by Louis XIV., emigrated to England. They were entitled to extensive possessions in St. Domingo, but were excluded by their Protestantism. The elder sister became a Catholic, and obtained the estates; the younger adopted the name of Beranger, and was a governess to the Countess of Bristol. The paper states that Catharine de Fourmantel formed an attachment to Sterne, and that it was the expectation of their friends that they would be united; but that, on a visit, Sterne became acquainted with a lady, whom he married in the space of one month, after having paid his addresses to Miss de Fourmantel for five years. The consequence was, the total derangement of intellect of this young lady. She was confined in a private madhouse. Sterne twice saw her there, and, from observation on her state, drew the "Maria" whom he so pathetically described. The elder sister, at the instigation of the father of the communicator of these letters, came to England, and took charge of the unhappy Maria, who died at Paris. "For many years," says the writer of this statement, "my mother had the handkerchief Sterne alludes to." Sterne's subsequent hasty marriage was an act of which he repented at leisure.

1230. RICHARDSON'S CAREER.

Richardson's House, Parson's Green.

The early life of Richardson, as of every man of genius, determined the character of his later years. Born in very humble circumstances, with little opportunity of liberal instruction, bound to a trade, he passed through his seven years of apprenticeship with fidelity and zeal. In these years, he laid the foundation of sober, upright, exact principles, and frugal, diligent, methodical habits,—fairly realizing Hogarth's Industrious Apprentice,—upon which to rear an after fortune. He obtained, by these means, the sincere respect of his master, of whose interest he was so careful as even to buy the candles by the light of which he read at night. When a mere boy, he was noted for invention, and was often called upon to exert his peculiar talent for the gratification of his favorite schoolmates; and in later life he always used to boast that he never forgot to add a good moral. Shortly after this period, he began to exhibit his strongest propensities—a love for letter writing and for the company of women. The letter was the vehicle by means of which he conducted his narratives to the conclusion, and which, doubtless, became the easiest style for him, from long practice and natural inclination. Being a modest, and perhaps rather timid, young fellow, he was encouraged, it seems, by the young women of the neighborhood to read to them some entertaining volume, when they met together for sewing. From the reader, he became the principal confidant of their love adventures, and finally their devoted scribe in all cases of emergency requiring epistolary skill and the habit of the pen. The little secrets disclosed to him, the varying conflict of duty and desire, the hopes and fears of bashful love, the tenderness and liberal charity of the passion in its most engaging state,—these pages of the book of human nature the author conned with a careful eye, and thence secured his richest stores. This was the best part of Richardson's education as an author. From one step to another, making the best honest use of opportunities, Richardson gradually became a settled tradesman, of wealth and respectability. His first published efforts were prefaces, indexes, and what he called honest dedications, for the printers. Himself a printer and publisher, he became acquainted with some of the first men of the day, though with more of a much inferior grade; with Johnson, Young, Warburton, Cibber, of the first class, and such men as Aaron Hill, who stood on a sort of middle ground between the best and worst. He was very liberal and hospitable to authors and scholars. He assisted Aaron Hill; he had the honor to bail Dr. Johnson. He was a kind master, laying pieces of money for the man first in the office of a morning. Accident led him to a proper appreciation of his powers. At the request of a number of "the trade," he undertook to write a volume of familiar letters for the youth of the lower classes, in which he would not only aim at giving them words for composition, but also infuse his own ethical code of practical duties; thus he meditated directions to young women going out to service; he intended to give his views of the parental and filial relations, and similar mutual obligations. From a letter of the first sort—a mere acorn to the oak into which it expands—sprang the history of Pamela. The way once found, and success attending the novel attempt, he was induced, once and again, to appear in the same character of fictitious writer, embodying, in his second work of Clarissa Harlowe, his idea of "a perfect woman, nobly planned," and in Sir Charles Grandison—a sort of male Clarissa—the abstraction of a perfect man.

Richardson's character was a good deal formed by circumstances, and undoubtedly much affected by the circle of which he was the centre. "He lived in a kind of flower garden of ladies," who were at once his models and critics. He drew the characters of his heroines from the characters he saw around him, and subjected his writing to the judgement of that body of his readers whom he thought best fitted to appreciate them. Woman he thought—not always correctly—the best judge of female character. Dr. Johnson gives another reason for his being surrounded by women—that he loved superiority, and hated contradiction; but he has left out another point—that our author really loved their society for its own sake, and for sympathy. His own nature was somewhat feminine, and, like Marmontel, and Hume, and Cowper, he found the society of virtuous women most congenial to his mind. Wordsworth is a rare instance of a man, living for years chiefly in the society of his sister and wife, whose writings exhibit few or no traces of the influence of female conversation.

Richardson liked attention, and his correspondents indulge freely in compliments, and sometimes in extravagant praises. His works generally formed the subject of conversation when he was present. But then we are to consider the novelty of the form of writing he originated, its unprecedented success, that it was to woman he devoted his talent, and from women expected his praises.

Richardson always had about him a number of young women, whom he treated as daughters, and to whom he appears to have been more attached than to his children. He called them his girls. They were at one period Miss Mulso, afterwards Mrs. Chapone; Miss Highmore, sister to the painter, and afterwards Mrs. Duncomb, marrying a gentleman she met at Richardson's; a niece to Secker, the bishop, to whom Pope gave "a heart;" Miss Prescott, Miss Fielding, and Miss Collier. These ladies constituted a sort of virtuous harem, where the main business done was listening to the letters fresh from the pen of Richardson, and proceeding in their criticisms as he read. When we consider the way of life of Richardson, in the midst of his admiring coterie, and contrast it with a Turk's seraglio, we are at once reminded of the lines of Congreve's two lovers, one of whom thus addressed the other:—

"You take her body, I her mind—
Which has the better bargain?"

Richardson seems to have resolved this question for himself, by choosing the latter.

1231. ENVIOUS MEANNESS OF RICHARDSON.

An odious feature in Richardson, and which we will dismiss very briefly, is his mean jealousies of his rivals, Fielding and Sterne: of both he speaks with great, and we hope, ignorant contempt. He speaks of that "brat," Tom Jones; of its run being over "with us;" of its not being tolerated in France, of almost every character in it with scornful disdain. Amelia comes off little better. He can read only the first volume. It is all so low. Parson Adams he appears to regard as a pure burlesque. He allows Fielding low humor, but nothing else. He can see nothing but indelicacies and irreligion in Sterne; to his finest strokes he is wholly indifferent.

1232. EARLY OCCUPATION OF STERNE.

The author of Tristram Shandy told the following story of himself:—

"I happened," said he, "to be acquainted with a young man from Yorkshire, [England.] who rented a window in one of the paved alleys near Cornhill, for the sale of stationery. I hired one of the panes of glass from my friend, and stuck up the following advertisement with wafers:—

"Epigrams, Anagrams, Paragrams, Chronograms, Monograms, Epitaphs, Epithalamiums, Prologues, Epilogues, Madrigals, Interludes, Advertisements, Letters, Petitions, Memorials on every occasion. Essays on all subjects, Pamphlets for and against ministers, with Sermons upon any text, or for any sect, to be written here on reasonable terms, by

A. B. PHILOLOGER."

The uncommonness of the titles occasioned numerous applications, and at night I used privately to glide into the office to digest the notes, or heads of the day, and receive the earnest, which was directed always to be left with the memorandums, the writing to be paid for on delivery, according to the subject."

Sterne soon became disgusted with this employment, and the moment he had realized a small sum of money closed the scene.

1233. DESERVED REBUKE.

An Englishman, being left alone with Richardson, observed to him he was "happy to pay his respects to the author of Sir Charles Grandison, for at Paris and at the Hague, and in fact, at every place I have visited, it is much admired." Richardson appeared not to notice the compliment, but, when all the company were assembled, addressed the gentleman with, "Sir, I think you were saying something about Sir Charles Grandison." "No, sir," he replied, "I do not remember ever to have heard it mentioned." The falsehood in the case was unjustifiable, but the mortification was deserved.

1234. FLATTERY.

Soon after Dr. Johnson issued his celebrated Rasselas, a literary society of ladies appointed some of their number a committee to wait on him and express their approbation of his work. They accordingly waited on him, and one of their number addressed him in a long speech of fulsome praise. He calmly sat waiting the conclusion of the speech, and then, turning his face to the committee, expressed his acknowledgment by saying, "Fiddle-de-dee, my dears."

1235. WALTER SCOTT'S EARLY LIFE.

Walter Scott was twenty years of age when, in 1791, he was admitted to the Speculative Society of Edinburgh. He was chosen the librarian, and shortly afterwards the secretary and treasurer. He kept the accounts and records very faithfully, and wrote essays and joined in debates on the commonplace questions usually proposed in such clubs. The following, from the Life of Scott by Lockhart, lately published, relates to this part of his life:—

"Lord Jeffrey remembers being struck, the first night he spent at the Speculative, with the singular appearance of the secretary, who sat gravely at the bottom of the table in a huge woollen night-cap, and, when the president took the chair, pleaded a bad toothache as his apology for coming into that worshipful assembly in such a 'portentous machine.' He read that night an essay on ballads, which so much interested the new member, that he requested to be introduced to him. Mr. Jeffrey called on him next evening, and found him 'in a small den, on the sunk floor of his father's house, in George's Square, surrounded with dingy books,' from which they adjourned to a tavern, and supped together. Such was the commencement of an acquaintance, which by degrees ripened into friendship, between the two most distinguished men of letters whom Edinburgh produced in their time. I may add here the description of that early den, with which I am favored by a lady of Scott's family. 'Walter had soon begun to collect out-of-the-way things of all sorts. He had more books than shelves; a small painted cabinet, with Scotch and Roman coins in it, &c. A claymore and Lochaber axe, given him by old Ivernahyle, mounted guard on a little print of Prince Charlie; and 'Broughton's saucer' was hooked up against the wall below it.' Such was the germ of the magnificent library and museum of Abbotsford; and such were the 'new realms' in which he, on taking possession, had arranged his little paraphernalia about him, 'with all the feelings of novelty and liberty.' Since those days the habits of life in Edinburgh, as elsewhere, have undergone many changes; and the 'convenient parlor,' in which Scott first showed Jeffrey his collections of minstrelsy, is now, in all probability, thought hardly good enough for a menial's sleeping-room."

1236. SCOTT AND THE BEGGAR.

While attending Dugald Stewart's lectures on moral philosophy, Scott happened to get frequently beside a modest and diligent youth, considerably his senior, and obviously of very humble condition. Their acquaintance soon became rather intimate, and he occasionally made this new friend the companion of his country walks; but as to his parentage and place of residence he always preserved total silence. One day, towards the end of the session, as Scott was returning to Edinburgh from a solitary ramble, his eye was arrested by a singularly venerable blue gown—a beggar of the Edie Ochiltree order, who stood propped on his stick, with his hat in hand, but silent and motionless, at one of the outskirts of the city. Scott gave the old man what trifles he had in his pocket, and passed on his way. Two or three times afterwards the same thing happened, and he had begun to consider the blue gown as one who had established a claim on his bounty; when one day he fell in with him as he was walking with his humble student. Observing some confusion in his companion's manner, as he saluted his pensioner and bestowed the usual benefaction, he could not help saying, after they had proceeded a few yards farther, "Do you know any thing to the old man's discredit?" Upon which the youth burst into tears, and cried, "O, no, sir; God forbid; but I am a poor wretch to be ashamed to speak to him; he is my own father. He has enough laid by to serve for his own old days, but he stands bleaching his head in the wind that he may get the means of paying for my education." Compassionating the young man's situation, Scott soothed his weakness, and kept his secret, but by no means broke off the acquaintance.

Some months had elapsed before he again met the blue gown. It was in a retired place, and the old man begged to speak a word with him. "I find, sir," he said, "that you have been very kind to my Willie. He had often spoke of it before I saw you together. Will you pardon such a liberty, and give me the honor and pleasure of seeing you under my poor roof? To-morrow is Saturday; will you come at two o'clock? Willie has not been very well, and it would do him meikle good to see your face." His curiosity, besides better feelings, was touched, and he accepted this strange invitation. The appointed hour found him within sight of a sequestered little cottage, near St. Leonard's, the hamlet where he has placed the residence of his David Deans. His fellow-student, pale and emaciated from recent sickness, was seated on a stone bench by the door, looking out for his coming, and introduced him into a not untidy cabin, where the old man, divested of his professional garb, was directing the last vibrations of a leg of mutton that hung by a hempen cord before the fire. The mutton was excellent; so were the potatoes and whiskey. Scott returned home from an entertaining conversation, in which, besides telling many queer stories of his own life,—and he had seen service in his youth,—the old man more than once used an expression which was long afterwards put into the mouth of Dominie Sampson's mother: "Please God, I may live to see my bairn wag his head in a pulpit yet."

Walter could not help telling all this, the same night, to his mother, and added, that he would fain see his poor friend obtain a tutor's place in some gentleman's family. "Dinna speak to your father about it," said the good lady; "if it had been a shoulder, he might have thought less, but he will say the gigot was a sin. I'll see what I can do." Mrs. Scott made her inquiries in her own way among the professors, and, having satisfied herself as to the young man's character, applied to her favorite minister, Dr. Erskine, whose influence soon procured him such a situation as had been suggested for him, in the north of Scotland. "And thenceforth," said Sir Walter, "I lost sight of my friend; but let us hope he made out his curriculum at Aberdeen, and is now wagging his head where the fine old man wished to see him."

1237. HABITS OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.

There was no feature more conspicuous in the life of the great enchanter than the economical division of his time, and the entire occupancy of it to the best account. In part second of his memoirs, Mr. Lockhart furnishes this description, by James Skene, of Rubislaw, who was very intimate with Scott.

He rose by five o'clock, lit his own fire when the season required one, and shaved and dressed with great deliberation; for he was a very martinet as to all but the mere coxcombries of the toilet, not abhorring effeminate dandyism itself so cordially as the slightest approach to personal slovenliness, or even those "bed-gown and slipper tricks," as he called them, in which literary men are so apt to indulge. Arrayed in his shooting jacket, or whatever dress he meant to use till dinner time, he was seated at his desk by six o'clock, all his papers arranged before him in the most accurate order, and his books of reference marshalled around him on the floor, while at least one favorite dog lay watching his eye just beyond the line of circumsvallation. Thus, by the time the family assembled for breakfast, between nine and ten, he had done enough, in his own language, "to break the neck of the day's work." After breakfast a couple of hours more were given to his solitary tasks, and by noon he was, as he used to say, his "own man." When the weather was bad, he would labor incessantly all the morning; but the general rule was to be out and on horseback by one o'clock at the latest; while, if any more distant excursion had been proposed over night, he was ready to start on it by ten; his occasional rainy days of uninterrupted study forming, as he said, a fund in his favor, out of which he was entitled to draw for accommodation, whenever the sun shone with special brightness.

Abbotsford.

It was another rule, that every letter he received should be answered that same day. Nothing else could have enabled him to keep abreast with the flood of communication that in the sequel put his good nature to the severest test; but already the demands on him in this way also were numerous; and he included attention to them among the necessary business, which must be despatched before he had a right to close his writing-box. In turning over his enormous mass of correspondence, I have almost invariably found some indication that, when a letter had remained more than a day or two unanswered, it had been so because he found occasion for inquiry or deliberate consideration.

I ought not to omit that in those days Scott was far too zealous a dragoon not to take a principal share in the stable duty. Before beginning his desk work in the morning, he uniformly visited his favorite steed, and neither Captain nor Lieutenant, nor the lieutenant's successor, Brown Adam, so called after one of the heroes of the Minstrelsy, liked to be fed except by him. The latter charger was indeed altogether intractable in other hands, though in his the most submissive of faithful allies. The moment he was bridled and saddled, it was the custom to open the stable door, as a signal that his master expected him, when he immediately trotted to the side of the leaping-on-stone, of which Scott, from his lameness, found it convenient to make use, and stood there, silent and motionless as a rock, until he was fairly in his seat, after which he displayed his joy by neighing triumphantly through a brilliant succession of curvettings. Brown Adam never suffered himself to be backed but by his master. He broke, I believe, one groom's arm and another's leg in the rash attempt to tamper with his dignity.

Camp was at this time the constant parlor dog. He was very handsome, very intelligent, and naturally very fierce, but gentle as a lamb among the children. As for the more locomotive Douglas and Percy, he kept one window of his study open, whatever might be the state of the weather, that they might leap out and in as the fancy moved them.

He always talked to Camp as if he understood what was said, and the animal certainly did understand not a little of it; in particular, it seemed as if he perfectly comprehended, on all occasions, that his master considered him as a sensible and steady friend, and the greyhounds as volatile young creatures, whose freaks must be borne with.

1238. SCOTT'S REVERSES.

Sir Walter Scott was engaged, at the time of his misfortunes, in writing the Life of Bonaparte, taking up his new novel of Woodstock at intervals by way of relief. These tasks he continued, with steady perseverance, in the midst of all his distresses. Even on the day which brought him assurance of the grand catastrophe, he resumed in the afternoon the task which had engaged him in the morning. There was more triumph over circumstances here than might be supposed, for he had lately begun to feel the first touches of the infirmities of age — age to which ease, not hard work, is naturally appropriate. His sleep was now less sound than it had been; his eyesight was failing; and, above all, he felt that backwardness of the intellectual power which is inseparable from years. The will, however, was green as ever, and under the prompting of an honorable spirit, it did its work nobly. Doggedly, doggedly did the energetic old man rouse himself from his melancholy couch, and set to his task at an hour when gaiety had little more than sought his. Firmly did he keep to his desk during long hours, till he could satisfy himself that he had done his utmost. The temptations of society, the more insinuating claims of an overworked system for rest, were alike resolutely rejected. The world must ever hear with wonder, that between the third day after his bankruptcy and the fifteenth day thereafter, he had written a volume of Woodstock, although several of these days had been spent in comparative vacancy, to allow the imagination time for brooding. He believed, that, for a bet, he could have written this volume in ten days. Just a fortnight after his final contentment and mirth of heart, the long series of difficulties and distresses with which it assailed him; and died regretted by his nation, as a forwarder of harmless pleasure, and by those that knew him better, as a truthful, unassuming, affectionate, and, on the whole, very estimable person.

1244. SAMUEL WARREN.

"Mr. Warren, author of the celebrated Diary of a late Physician," says a correspondent of the Boston Atlas, "was any thing but brilliant looking; indeed, he had that sort of face which may be called 'heavy.' Still it was of a very thoughtful cast, and the high and broad forehead indicated powers of a very superior order. He seemed to be remarkably shy and retiring; and I noticed that, during the whole morning, he seldom exchanged a word with any one but the author of Ion."

"It may not be generally known that Mr. Warren is a son of Dr. Warren, a Wesleyan minister of Manchester. He is by profession a barrister, and travels on the northern circuit. His profession furnishes him with abundance of material, and a late tale of surpassing interest, in Blackwood's Magazine, entitled We are all low People there—a Tale of the Assizes, from his pen, is a proof of his tact in seizing on every-day topics, and converting them into subjects of deep interest."

"Mr. Warren was originally intended for the medical profession, and studied in the hospitals—a circumstance which accounts for the intimate acquaintance with professional matters which is evinced in his Physician's Diary. It is a curious circumstance connected with these papers, that they were offered to, and successively rejected by, nearly all the leading English magazines, and thrown aside by the author as useless. A friend of Warren's persuaded him to offer them to Professor Wilson, and he sent them anonymously. They were accepted, and at once became popular. But it was not until many papers of the series had been before the public that the editor knew his correspondent."

1245. A CLASSICAL SATIRE.

With the passion for autographs, we have a return of the album mania; and a good story is told of a certain M. Bonbelle, who, having increased his fortune by speculating in railroad stocks, determined to set up an album. The first person he sent it to was Dumas; but unfortunately, the French Walter Scott had just then cash orders for thirty volumes of romances and ten dramas, to be delivered in three months; so he had no time to write in the album. Bonbelle persisted, and finally the author seized a pen, and gave him a distich:—

"*Eh! pourquoi ces gens-là se nomment Bonbelle?
Le mari n'est pas bon, la femme n'est pas belle.*"

which, translated, runs,—

"For what are these folks called Bonbelle?

The husband is not bon, (good,) the wife is not belle, (beautiful.)

1246. DUMAS' INDUSTRY.

A gentleman was inquiring of a friend of Dumas whether it was really true that he was about to undertake the management of a theatre. "Certainly he is," replied the friend; "he does not know what else to do with himself. Monte Christo is finished; the Dame de Montsoreau and the Chevalier de Maisonrouge are nearly so; the ten volumes of the Vicomte de Bragelone are in the hands of the publisher; his bargain with the Constitutionnel and the Presse binds him to produce hereafter only eighteen volumes of romances a year, and the Theatre Français confines him to five five-act comedies annually: so, you see, he must look out for some means of employing his leisure time."

1247. DUMAS' FORTUNE.

At the first news of the approaching sale of Alexandre Dumas' chateau of Monte Christo, says a French paper, a merchant of Lyons took the post route to Paris, and presented to the illustrious novelist in person fifty thousand francs! M. Dumas, delighted with this generosity, offered the noble merchant his friendship and a box in the Theatre Montpensier.

On the morrow of this event, a lady called on Dumas, and, in a tone of emotion, said, "Monsieur, I do not know you, but I have seen Antony, Henry III., and have read the Three Guardsmen and the Count of Monte Christo. Here are my savings, amounting to six thousand francs. Take them; they are yours!" Dumas declined the widow's offering, and sent her his works complete.

If a subscription were opened to make up M. Dumas' deficits, adds the same journal, it would surpass that of the Lafitte subscription.

1248. RESULT OF HABIT AND INDUSTRY.

Bulwer worked his way to eminence—worked it through failure, through ridicule. His facility is only the result of practice and study. He wrote at first very slowly, and with great difficulty; but he resolved to master his stubborn instrument of thought, and mastered it. He has practised writing as an art, and has rewritten some of his essays (unpublished) nine or ten times over. Another habit will show the advantage of continuous application. He only works about three hours a day, from ten in the morning till one, seldom later. The evenings, when alone, are devoted to reading, scarcely ever to writing. Yet what an amount of hard labor has resulted from these three hours! He writes very rapidly, averaging twenty pages a day of novel print.

1249. ANNE RADCLIFFE.

In the romances of Anne Radcliffe the marvellous predominates every where—in woods, in chateaux, in cloisters; we feel ourselves surrounded by apparitions returned from the other world, by spirits celestial and infernal; terror increases, omens heaped on omens till the imaginative seems like reality; but when the dénouement arrives, all is explained by natural causes.

But her romances met with such prodigious sale that the Mysteries of Udolpho were sold for one thousand pounds; and their demand was so advantageous to the bookseller, that Messrs. Cadell & Davies, who, in 1794, were at the head of the book trade, offered her fifteen hundred pounds sterling for her first romance, and actually paid that price to become the possessors of the Italian, a romance translated into French by the Abbé Morellet, who lengthened the title with the additions, Or Confessions of Melancholy Penitents. The work sold rapidly; editions followed editions, until the English critics resolved to throw some drops of gall on her literary crown. They could not deny her success, but they could censure her public infatuation and bad taste. They pursued another mode of attack also: they ridiculed the authoress, whom no one knew; and from that moment there was no end to the malicious suppositions and calumnies about Mrs. Radcliffe, the blue-stocking, the sorceress, the Eumenide, the harpy who lived upon corpses and drank blood out of brass cups. Thus, all at once, she found herself the prey of the lowest journalists of London—not a light thing in a country where caricature, far from resembling the spear of Achilles, whose divine point wounded and healed at the same time, is like a triangular dart, which leaves its poison on every side of the wound. She had not strength to support this bitterness, and, therefore, wrote to her bookseller, vowing never to write any thing more for the public. Some time afterwards the journalists announced her death. In the mean while, a young man, one morning, went into the shop of Cadell & Davies, and addressed himself to Mr. Davies, who was standing behind the counter.

"So, Mr. Davies, poor Mistress Anne is dead."

"Alas! yes," replied the bookseller.

"A mine of gold is closed to you."

"O, no," said the bookseller, "Mrs. Radcliffe declared she would never print any more."

"But you might publish one of her posthumous works. You are certain she could not prevent it?"

"That is true," said Mr. Davies. "Have you the romance?"

"Yes, sir."

It is generally very difficult to cheat a bookseller, and it was next to impossible to deceive Mr. Davies, the shrewdest editor in London; he understood perfectly that he had to deal with an audacious beginner, who wished to put off his own romance under a commendable name, and turn to his own profit the still living reputation of Anne Radcliffe.

"Sir," said he to the young man, fixing his eyes steadily upon him, "what is your name?"

"Robert Will."

"Mr. Robert Will. I will take your romance, and it shall come out under the name of the late Anne Radcliffe."

The literary piracy was begun immediately; every thing was agreed upon—the price, the number of volumes, and the time of its publication. By the management of Davies, the next day's journals announced that in a short period they would publish the Grave, a posthumous work of Anne Radcliffe.

All this time, Mrs. Radcliffe, instead of being dead, as they thought, was living very retired at Lincoln, a little village in the neighborhood of London; there, renouncing all literary occupation, she defied the malice of her enemies to reach her; she strove to forget she had ever been an authoress, and, laying aside the ogres of half-ruined cloisters, Neapolitan brigands, and the ghosts of Italian nuns, busied herself in looking after her poultry yard, and prided herself on making the most delicious puddings, and the best keck's-captain eaten in Lincoln. Her husband, the most patient angler in the three kingdoms, occupied himself daily in lessening the number of trout in the deep brooks which ran not far from the village. They both lived like retired grocers, enjoying good health, in the golden mediocrity recommended by Horace as the best situation conducive to happiness. After the quiet and peaceful day, they went to bed undisturbed by frightful apparitions of their own creating; and the only dream Mrs. Radcliffe had was about a fight between one of her rabbits and her favorite hen, and the ghosts of some weasels in the pantry where she kept her provisions. She was at that time about fifty-seven or eight years old, her stature small and thin, her movements always quick, brisk, and cheerful. She had been very pretty in her youth, and her brilliant conversation had been very recherche.

At the time of which we are speaking she avoided all long conversations, and was distinguished only for her laconic replies; she never related a story; all one could get from her was a word, a salutation, a benevolent smile. There was but one method to win her from her taciturnity; it was to mention puddings and gooseberry tarts; she would then talk, and with complacent pride give every imaginable receipt. She would enumerate pastries without number, and disclose the secrets of anchovy sauce, ginger, and nutmeg, indispensable ingredients in English cooking. The only thing Mrs. Radcliffe had in common with her heroines was her paleness; but the paleness of an old woman with wrinkled face, on whose forehead were seen here and there some gray hairs, offered nothing for the imagination, and had nothing but the ordinary appearance of a citizen.

One day, while leading this obscure and tranquil life, her neighbor, Mrs. Patterson, out of breath, presented herself at her house, holding a large paper in her hand.

"Ah, neighbor," said she, "here is news. Read—read for yourself."

"No, no," replied Mrs. Radcliffe, motioning the paper away with her hand.

But, whether or no, her loquacious neighbor told her it was reported in London that she was dead, and that Messrs. Cadell & Davies were going to publish a romance of hers called the Grave.

"But that would be nothing," she went on to add. "Do you know who it is has written the romance which is to bear your name? It is Robert Will, son of Lord Temple's tailor, member of Parliament. His lordship gave him his education; and now see the use he makes of it—steals the respectable name of a lady he don't know. Heavens! mistress, what would come of it if you were really dead, as they suppose?"

In vain may authors renounce writing, dream of weasels, raise rabbits, but the remembrance of their success can never be forgotten; their minds may be like a volcano, silent for a while, but they are never extinguished; there are ever among the live ashes sparks ready to burst forth in new eruptions. As usual, Mrs. Radcliffe said nothing, but hastened to rid herself of her neighbor by going to feed her chickens. It was in summer; evening was approaching; Mr. Radcliffe had just returned with some fine trout he had taken. The old couple supped, arose from the table, and Mistress Anne, instead of taking off her embroidery, took her cloak, called her servant Judith, and sent her to get a coach.

"A coach, Anne!" said her husband, as much astonished as if his line, instead of bringing up a trout, had brought up a haunch of venison. "A coach!"

"Yes, my dear; I am going to London for a few hours."

And without further explanation, she left her husband, and got into the coach.

"Soho Square," said she to the coachman, giving him the number.

During the ride, the self-love of the authoress developed itself more and more, and her anger reached a fearful height. Robert Will, a college runaway, a journalist's apprentice, who had, without doubt, spread the report of her death, in order to dupe the public under cover of her name! However, as she approached the abode of the young man, she began to look upon it in a different light, and the fumes of her self-love began to dissipate; and with her old facility of making her heroes pass from one difficulty to another, she felt her spite evaporating, and was surprised at herself for forgetting her anger; and then her situation appeared to her somewhat ridiculous. Night came on before she reached the retreat of the literary pirate. Mr. Robert Will, like young authors of all countries, lived in a garret. Anne Radcliffe ascended, step by step, very softly, until she came to the apartment, whose walls were hung in black, and decorated with relics of heraldry, bones, and death's heads; on one side of the room was a sand-glass, on an empty coffin, and on the other a table, on which were crossed a scythe and poniard.

Leaning on a table of black wood sat a young man, in a monk's dress, writing by the light of two sepulchral lamps, and the vacillating and bluish flames of the spirits of wine which were burning in a bronze vase. Anne Radcliffe smiled at the infernal phantasmagoria, — evident marks of a barren imagination, which sought to fertilize itself by the sight of external objects, — and recalled her little mahogany table and her light and cheerful cabinet in which she composed her works. She then glided noiselessly into the petty office of literary crime, silently seated herself opposite the young man, and remained some time looking at him. It seemed that Mr. Robert Will was at length likely to find a situation dark and frightful enough, and while making his heroes the prey of horrible apparitions, and striving to excite terror, they were about seizing upon the author himself. His hand trembled, the perspiration fell from his forehead on the paper, and his eyes with difficulty followed the lines, which appeared entangling themselves capriciously with one another.

"Robert Will!" said Anne Radcliffe.

At this call, the young man looked up; his hair stood on end at beholding the pale woman, fixing her eyes upon him.

"Robert Will," she repeated, "I am Anne Radcliffe. What are you doing here?"

The author, who had been trying to frighten his readers with awful apparitions, never expected the dead would come to visit him in his gloomy chambers. He opened his mouth at first, his teeth chattered, and then sunk back in his chair.

"What are you doing?" asked Anne again, at the same time stretching out her thin, bony hand towards the manuscript.

But Robert Will had lost all power to speak.

She seized the manuscript, held it suspended over the flames of the bronze vase a few moments, and then let it fall. The Grave became the color of wine, then crackled, caught fire, and then lighted with its flames the garret of Robert Will. When the sacrifice was ended, when the last spark was gone out on the bronze hearth, with a very serious look, she made a solemn reverence to the author, half dead with fear, and disappeared exactly like a ghost.

"Where have you been, Anne?" said her husband, when she returned.

"Making an auto da fé," said she, as she went to bed.

The next day Robert Will, with pale face, haggard looks, and empty hands, presented himself before Davies.

"Well, where is your copy?" asked Mr. Davies.

"Sir, the devil has gone off with it; he took it by the hands of Anne Radcliffe's ghost, and between the two they have burnt the manuscript."

Just at that moment the postman entered, and handed a letter to Mr. Davies, who opened, it and read the following:—

"Mrs. Radcliffe's compliments to her esteemed editors, Messrs. Cadell, Davies, & Co., and begs them to send her a copy of 'The Perfect Cook,' an excellent French work, recently translated and published by them.

"A thousand compliments to the honorable Robert Will."

"We are tricked," said Davies; "our market is spoiled."

However, Ann Radcliffe did not succeed in hindering all her posthumous romances; and, let us say without a pun, she was not able to avoid the Grave. A romance bearing that title, and falsely attributed to her, appeared afterwards at Paris: it was supposed to have been the work of Messrs. Hector, Chaussier, and Bezot.

§ 122. ORIGIN, OR ORIGINAL CHARACTERS OF WORKS OF FICTION.

1250. DR. SMOLLETT AND HIS FAMILY.

The town residence of the family of the celebrated Dr. Smollett was at the head of St. John Street, Edinburgh. The novelist's mother passed several years of her widowhood in this house. She was a proud, ill-natured looking woman; but her temper was in reality much better than her physiognomy bespoke. She was enthusiastically devoted to cards. One of the magistrates of Edinburgh, who was a tallow-chandler, paying her a visit one evening, she saluted him with, "Come awa', baillie, and tak' a trick at the cartes." "Troth, madam," says he, "I ha' na a bawbee i' my pouch." "Tut, man, ne'er mind that; let us play for a pund of can'le!" She was a shrewd, intelligent, and what one might call a clever old lady. She had a very high nose.

During his last visit to Edinburgh, — the visit which occasioned Humphrey Clinker, — the doctor lived in his mother's house. A person who recollects seeing him there, describes him as being dressed in black clothes, tall, and extremely handsome, but quite unlike the portraits foisted upon the public at the fronts of his works, all of which are disclaimed by his relations. The unfortunate truth is, that the world is in possession of no genuine likeness of Smollett! He was very peevish, on account of the ill health to which he had been long a martyr, and used to complain much of a severe ulcerous disorder in his arm.

His wife, as we know from authority, was a Creole.

with a dark complexion, though, upon the whole, rather pretty. — a fine lady, but a silly woman. It is not true that she was the Tabitha Bramble of the novel.

Smollett's House, Chelsea.

There can be little doubt that Matthew Bramble was intended for himself. Jerry Melford was a picture of his sister's son, Major Telfer. Liddy was his own daughter, who was destined by her friends to marry the major, but died, to the inexpressible grief of her father, before that scheme was accomplished. The beautiful Miss R——n, whom Jerry admired so much in the gay circles of Edinburgh, was Miss Eleonora Renton, the daughter of Renton of Lamerton, and Lady Susan Montgomery, one of the Jacobin Countess of Eglington's pretty daughters. The object of Jerry's admiration was, therefore, a beauty by a sort of jus divinum, or divine right; it being just as much a matter of course for the daughters and granddaughters of old Lady Eglington to inherit her personal charms as for a legitimate male heir to succeed to an estate, a title, or a throne. A sister of Miss E. Renton married Mr. Telfer, elder brother of the major, who afterwards took the name of Smollett, in order to succeed to the estate. She herself was wedded to Mr. Sharpe, of Hoddum, and thus became the mother of Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, Esq., a gentleman whose "ingenious and indefatigable" exertions in the cause of virtu entitle him to the designation of the Scottish Walpole.

1251. SMOLLETT'S "HUGH STRAP."

In the year 1809 was interred, in the churchyard of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, the body of one Hlew Hewson, who died at the age of 85. He was the original of Hugh Strap, in Smollett's Roderick Random. Upwards of forty years he kept a hair-dresser's shop in St. Martin's parish: the walls were hung round with Latin quotations, and he would frequently point out to his customers and acquaintances the several scenes in Roderick Random pertaining to himself, which had their origin, not in Smollett's inventive fancy, but in truth and reality.

Birthplace of Smollett.

The meeting in a barber's shop at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, the subsequent mistake at the inn, their arrival together in London, and the assistance they experienced from Strap's friend, are all facts. The barber left behind an annotated copy of Roderick Random, showing how far we are indebted to the genius of the author, and to what extent the incidents are founded in reality.

1252. THE TOMBS OF PAUL AND VIRGINIA.

A correspondent of the Boston Journal, at Port Louis, in the Isle of France, says, that many suppose the celebrated work of Paul and Virginia is a fiction, but such is not the case. Indeed, the general outline of the story is drawn from truth, and the only embellishment may be said to be found in the graceful style of Bernardin de St. Pierre. The tombs of the hero and heroine still exist, being simple monuments of brick and plaster, now much defaced by the hands of curiosity-hunters. The old church of Pamplémousses withstands the ravages of time, and the Morne de la Decouverte will be a more enduring monument than all. The memory of Paul and Virginia is still cherished by the people, many of whom bear their names; and it is quite amusing to hear some of them boast of a lineal descent from this virtuous bachelor and unspotted maid! All strangers make a pilgrimage to Pamplémousses; for to stand over the graves of the lovers, and to call to mind passages of their history, can but awaken pleasing reflections.

1253. SCOTT'S IVANHOE.

As a work of art, Ivanhoe is perhaps the first of all Scott's efforts, whether in prose or in verse; nor have the strength and splendor of his imagination been displayed to higher advantage than in some of the scenes of this romance. The introduction of the charming Jewess and her father originated in a conversation that Scott had with his friend Skene, during the severest season of his bodily sufferings, in the early part of 1819. "Mr. Skene," says that gentleman's wife, "sitting by his bedside, and trying to amuse him as well as he could, in the intervals of pain, happened to get on the subject of the Jews, as he had observed them when he spent some time in Germany in his youth. Their situation had naturally made a strong impression, for in those days they retained their own dress and manners entire, and were treated with considerable austerity by their Christian neighbors, being still locked up at night in their own quarters by great gates; and Mr. Skene, partly in seriousness, but partly from the mere wish to turn Scott's mind at the moment upon something that might occupy and direct it, suggested that a group of Jews would be an interesting feature, if he could contrive to bring them into his next novel." Upon the appearance of Ivanhoe, he reminded Mr. Skene of this conversation, and said, "You will find that this book owes not a little to your German reminiscence." Mrs. Skene adds, "Dining with us one day not long before Ivanhoe was begun, something that was mentioned to Scott led him to describe the death of an advocate of his acquaintance, a Mr. Elphinstone. 'It was,' he said, 'no wonder that it had left a vivid impression on his mind, for it was the first sudden death he ever witnessed,' and he related it so as to make us all feel as if we had the scene passing before our eyes. In the death of the Templar, in Ivanhoe, I recognized the very picture, I believe I may say the very words."

Mr. Lockhart says, that "some months previous to the publication of this admirable novel, he was present at a conversation which suggested, and indeed supplied, all the materials of one of the most amusing chapters. He alludes to that in which our Saxon terms for animals in the field, and our Norman equivalents for them as they appear on the table, and in one are explained and commented on. All this Scott owed to the after-dinner talk, one day in Castle Street, of his old friend, Mr. William Clerk, who, among other elegant pursuits, has cultivated the science of philology very deeply."

1454. THE ORIGINAL ROBINSON CRUSOE.

Colonel Sutcliffe, "the retired governor of Juan Fernandez," has recently published a volume, giving an account of that island from its discovery by Don Juan Fernandez, (after whom it was named,) in 1578; and to this volume he gives the title of Crusoniana, from the fact that it was the well-known abode of Alexander Selkirk on this island, which furnished Defoe with the materials of his inimitable romance of Robinson Crusoe. But it is not so generally known that there was, previously to Alexander Selkirk, a solitary tenant of this island, and one, too, whose sojourn there, as recorded by Dampier and Ringrose, must have been known to Defoe, as will be seen from the following extract from Colonel Sutcliffe's book, in which we trace the original of the story of Man Friday, and his discovery of his father, in Robinson Crusoe.

"At the moment of the hurried escape of a crew of buccaners from Juan Fernandez, one of their crew, a Mosquito Indian, named William, happened to be in the woods hunting goats, so that the ship was under sail before he got back to the bay. Poor

Will had only the clothes on his back, a knife, a gun, a small horn of powder, and a few shot. His situation became still more critical when the Spaniards entered the bay, took up the anchors and cables, and, having caught sight of him, made a diligent search; but he eluded their pursuit, and remained the sole human occupant of the island.

Daniel Defoe.

"Dampier, in the account which he gives of Will's sojourn, states, 'At first he could procure scarcely any food but seals, which he found but ordinary eating; some other articles he obtained by means of his powder and shot, but these were soon expended. He next made a saw of his knife, by notching it, and so, by incessant labor, cut the barrel of his gun into small pieces. He kindled a fire by striking with the gun flint against a piece of the barrel. Having heated the pieces of iron, he hammered them out, and bent them just as he pleased with hard stones, and sawed them with his jagged knife. By persevering industry, he ground them to an edge, and hardened them to a good temper as there was occasion; and thus he procured harpoons, lances, fish-hooks, and a long knife. All this may seem strange to those who are not acquainted with the sagacity of the Indians; but it is no more than these Mosquito men are accustomed to in their own country, where they make their own fishing and striking instruments without either forge or anvil, though they spend a great deal of time about them. Having obtained these conveniences, he no longer lived upon seals, nor did he afterwards ever kill any, except when he wanted lines, which he made by cutting the seal-skins into thongs. He had now a plentiful and comfortable subsistence, living upon goats, birds, or fish, as best suited his inclination; his clothes were worn out, but he supplied their place by fastening a skin round his waist. He built a house or hut, about half a mile from the sea, which he lined with goat-skins; to render it complete, his couch of sticks, raised about two feet distance from the ground, was spread with the same, and constituted his only bedding. During the period of William's residence on the island, he was often sought for by the Spaniards; and at one time, being guided by the light of his fire, they nearly surprised him. This escape, and his having frustrated, by his activity and wiles, all their endeavors to take him, made his pursuers consider him to be a supernatural being. Will could easily distinguish his friends from the Spaniards by the rigging and appearance of their vessels and boats; and on two English ships making their appearance, he almost went frantic with joy, supposing they came on purpose to fetch him away: of such consequence is a man to himself. In order to give them a hearty welcome, he caught and killed three goats, and dressed them with the "chonta," (cabbage palm,) that he might be ready to treat the crews as soon as they came on shore. On their landing, he was recognized by a Mosquito Indian, named Robin, who was the first that leaped on shore. Will had stationed himself at the seaside, dressed in his goat-skin, to congratulate them on their arrival. The meeting of the two Indians, and old friends, was affecting. Dampier gives the following description of the scene he witnessed: 'Robin ran to his brother Mosquito-man, threw himself flat upon his face at his feet, who, helping him up and embracing him, fell flat with his face on the ground at Robin's feet, and was by him taken up also. We stood with pleasure to behold this interview, which was exceedingly affectionate on both sides; and when their ceremonies of civility were over, we also, that stood gazing at them, drew near. Each of us embraced him we had found there, who was overjoyed to see so many of his old friends come hither, as he thought, purposely to fetch him.' Dampier and Edmund Cook were his former shipmates. The latter was now only a private seaman, and Will found, that although his friend had not made so long a voyage merely on his account, they proved themselves not unmindful of him; for, as soon as they had anchored, they immediately got out their boat on purpose to send for him. They staid, to refit and refresh themselves, from the 23d of March to the 8th of April, 1684. Will was very useful in procuring goats, of which there was an abundance on the island; and, after having resided there alone for three years, two months, and eleven days, he embarked with his former friends, to renew the avocation of a bucca-

1255. THE AUTHOR OF QUEENHOO-HALL.

When Stutt settled in the metropolis, and studied at the British Museum, amid all the stores of knowledge and art, his imagination delighted to expatiate on its future prosperity. In a letter to a friend, he has thus chronicled his feelings:—

"I would not only be a great antiquary, but a refined thinker; I would not only discover antiquities, but would, by explaining their use, render them useful. Such vast funds of knowledge lie hid in the antiquated remains of the earlier ages; these I would bring forth and set in their true light."

Poor Stutt, at the close of life, was returning to his own first and natural energies, in producing a work of the imagination. He had made considerable progress in one, and the early parts, which he had finished, bear the stamp of genius: it is entitled Queenhoo-hall, a Romance of Ancient Times, full of the picturesque manners and customs and characters of the age, in which he was so conversant, with many lyrical pieces, which often are full of poetic feeling; but he was called from the work to prepare a more laborious one. Queenhoo-hall remained a heap of fragments at his death, except the first volume, and was filled up by a stranger hand. The stranger was Sir Walter Scott, and Queenhoo-hall was the origin of that series of romances where antiquarianism has taken the shape of imagination.

1256. CINDERELLA.

The origin of the tale from which this pantomime was adopted is sufficiently curious. It was about the year 1730 that a French actor, of equal talent and wealth, named Thevenard, in passing through the streets of Paris, observed upon a cobbler's stall the shoe of a female, which struck him by the remarkable smallness of its size. After admiring it for some time, he returned to the house; but his thoughts reverted to the shoe with such intensity, that he reappeared at the stall the next day; but the cobbler could give no other clew to the owner than that it had been left, in his absence, for the purpose of being repaired. Day after day did Trevenard return to his post to watch the reintegration of this slipper, which proceeded slowly; nor did the proprietor appear to claim it. Although he had completed the sixtieth year of his age, so extravagant became his passion for the unknown fair one that he became (were it possible for a Frenchman at that day to be so) melancholy and miserable. His pain was, however, somewhat appeased by the avatar of the little foot itself, appertaining to a pretty and youthful girl in the very humblest class of life. All distinctions were levelled at once by love; the actor sought the parents of the female, procured their consent to the match, and actually made her his wife.

1257. JOHNSON'S MODE OF RAISING MONEY.

Johnson, being pushed for money to defray the expenses of his mother's funeral, and to settle some little debts she had left, sat down to his Rasselas, which, he afterwards informed Sir Joshua Reynolds, he composed in the evenings of a single week, having it printed as rapidly as it was written, and even not reading it over until several years afterwards, whilst travelling in company with Mr. Boswell. Yet this work, so hastily written, enabled the publisher to pay him the sum of one hundred and twenty-five pounds.

1258. SKETCH OF DANIEL DEFOE.

The name of the interesting writer of Robinson Crusoe was not originally Defoe, but Foe—the prefix being added by himself. He was born in London in 1663. His early education and habits were such as to promise almost any other results than works of fiction. And yet we find him, at twenty-one years of age, the author of a treatise against the Turks. He joined the insurrection of the Duke of Monmouth, but had the good fortune to escape to London unscathed, where he engaged, first as a horse factor, and then as a brickmaker. Failing in business, however, he became insolvent, and compounded with his creditors as best he could. It is to his credit, however, that when his circumstances were afterwards improved, he paid the full amount of all his obligations. In 1697, he again became an author; and more than twenty years later—when about fifty years of age—his romance of Robinson Crusoe appeared. His subsequent productions were very numerous; and a few of them were works of merit.

1259. LADY CAROLINE LAMB.

The history of Lady Caroline Lamb, the novelist, is painfully interesting. She was united, before the age of twenty, to the Honorable William Lamb, (afterwards Lord Melbourne,) and was long the delight of fashionable circles, from the singularity, as well as the grace of her manners, her literary accomplishments, and personal attractions. On meeting with Lord Byron, she contracted an unfortunate attachment for the noble poet, which continued three years, and was the theme of much remark. The poet is said to have trifled with her feelings, and a rupture took place. For many years Lady Caroline led a life of comparative seclusion, principally at Broomfield Hall. This was interrupted by a singular and somewhat romantic occurrence. Riding, with Mr. Lamb, she met, just by the park gates, the hearse which was conveying the remains of Lord Byron to Newstead Abbey. She was taken home insensible: an illness of length and severity succeeded. Some of her medical attendants imputed her fits, certainly of great incoherence and long continuance, to partial insanity. At this supposition she was invariably and bitterly indignant. Whatever be the cause, it is certain from that time her conduct and habits materially changed; and, about three years before her death, a separation took place between her and Mr. Lamb, who continued, however, frequently to visit, and, to the day of her death, to correspond with her. It is just to both parties to add, that Lady Caroline constantly spoke of her husband in the highest and most affectionate terms of admiration and respect. A romantic susceptibility of temperament and character seems to have been the bane of this unfortunate lady. Her fate illustrates the wisdom of Thomson's advice:—

"Then keep each passion down, however dear:
Trust me, the tender are the most severe."

1260. DICKENS IN A DILEMMA.

Having stated, in the original preface to Nicholas Nickleby, that the Brothers Cheeryble were portraits from the life, and that they yet exercised their unbounded benevolence in the town of which they are the pride and honor, Dickens thus laments over the applications to which his statement has given rise:—

"If I were to attempt to sum up the hundreds upon hundreds of letters from all sorts of people, in all sorts of latitudes and climates, to which this unlucky paragraph has since given rise, I should get into an arithmetical difficulty from which I could not easily extricate myself. Suffice it to say that I believe the applications for loans, gifts, and offices of profit that I have been requested to forward to the originals of the Brothers Cheeryble (with whom I never interchanged any communication in my life) would have exhausted the combined patronage of all the lord chancellors since the accession of the house of Brunswick, and would have broken the rest of the Bank of England."

1261. SCOTT'S "OLD MORTALITY."

The only occupation of the old man was wandering about the country, repairing the tombstones of the Covenanters, travelling from one churchyard to another, mounted on his old white pony, till he was found dead one day by the roadside. His family experienced a singular variety of fortune. One of his sons went to America, and settled at Baltimore, where he made a large fortune. He had a son who married an American lady, and the latter, outliving her husband, became Marchioness of Wellesley! His daughter was married to Jerome Bonaparte, and after her separation from him, wedded Monsieur Surruer, the French consul at Baltimore. What would Old Mortality have said, as he pored among the neglected gravestones in Scotland, had he foreseen that the widow of his grandson was to become an English marchioness, sister-in-law of the Duke of Wellington, and his granddaughter Queen of Westphalia, and sister-in-law of Napoleon!

1262. THE WANDERING JEW.

We are not acquainted with any popular English ballad on the subject of the Wandering Jew, though the adventures of this extraordinary being have afforded themes to the poets of the people in almost every other country in Europe. France, especially, is rich in legends connected with this fabled personage; songs and sermons equally relate the horrors to which "the undying one" was subjected, and the heritage of woe conjoined to his unparalleled length of life. Most of the notices are announcements of his speedy appearance at some specified place, or anecdotes supposed to have been related by those who had the good fortune of meeting with him. They all agree in describing him as aged, care-worn, with a white beard of immense length, and grizzled hair. His dress, though ragged and torn, was said to retain traces of Oriental finery; but he also wore a leather apron, which, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, was the usual cognizance of laborers, and the lower class of mechanics. Xeniola declares that, in Spain, he appeared with a very awful mark, which is not mentioned either by the French or Germans. According to this worthy father, whom Lewis has followed in the Monk, the Jew wore a black bandage on his forehead, which concealed a crucifix of flame, ever burning a brain that grew as fast as it was consumed. It is intimated that the familiars of the Inquisition had orders to keep a sharp lookout for the Wanderer, and that the crucifix was designated as the mark by which he might be known. The Inquisitors never caught him, though they often had information of his practising as a conjurer, and exhibiting the blazing cross on his forehead in the dark—a trick often practised by schoolboys with a bit of phosphorus. They arrested, indeed, a juggler at Seville; but, on inquiry, he proved to be "no conjurer," and had the good luck to be liberated, after having endured "only the moderate torture."

While the Spaniards were taught to regard the Wandering Jew as an object of horror, the French and Brabantine legends always spoke of him as deserving the warmest sympathy and compassion.

Alasuerus was the name usually given to the Wandering Jew in the last century; but in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries he was known as Isaac Lackedem, or Lackedion—names which point to an Armenian or Greek origin of the story. The Chanson, of which we are about to lay a version before our readers, as nearly in the original metre as the structure of our language will admit, is believed to have been composed in Brabant, rather earlier than the age of the reformation. The language has been softened and modernized, as it passed down the stream of tradition; but the air possesses the psalmic character of those slow and plaintive chants, with which, in the middle ages, the relics of martyrs were venerated, and the sufferings of the saints lamented.

We have preserved in the translation some of the roughness which characterizes the original ballad, particularly in the verses spoken by the burghesses to the Wanderer.

Can life with each transaction,
From bright to darkest hue,
Show one of worse condition
Than the poor Wandering Jew?
How horrid is his state!
His wretchedness how great!

One day before the city
Of Brussels, in Brabant,
We saw, with fear and pity,
This man of comforts scant;
And ne'er before our sight
Was heard so long and white.

His garments, torn and streaming,
The winds could not withstand,
And we knew by his seeming
He came from Eastern land;
A leathern bag before
He, like some workman, wore.

We said, "Good morrow, master;
One little moment stay,
And tell us the disaster
Which has brought you this way.
Come, do not plead excuse,
Nor sympathly refuse."

Then he replied, "Believe me,
I suffer bitter woe;
Incessant travels grieve me;
No rest for me's below.
A respite I have never,
But march on, on forever!"

"Come, join us, good old father,
And drink a cup of ale;
We've come out here together
On purpose to regale.
And, if you'll be our guest,
We'll give you of the best."

"I cannot take your proffer;
I'm hurried on by fate;
But for your hearty offer
My gratitude is great.
I'll ever bear in mind
Strangers so good and kind."

"You seem so very aged,
That, looking on with tears,
We find ourselves engaged
In gossipping at your years.
We'd ask, if not too bold,
Are you a century old?"

"Years more than eighteen hundred
Have rolled above my head,
Since fate has kept me Sundered
Both from the quick and dead.
I was twelve years that morn
When Christ our Lord was born."

"Are you that man of sorrow,
Of whom our authors write,
Grief comes with every morrow,
And wretchedness at night?
O, let us know — are you
Isaac, the Wandering Jew?"

"Yes; Isaac Lakedion
To me was given for name,
And the proud hill of Zion
As place of birth I claim.
Children, in me you view
The hapless Wandering Jew!"

"Good Lord, how sad, how weary,
This length of life is found!
Now, for the fifth time, hear ye,
I've paced the earth's wide round.

All else to rest have gone,
But I must still live on.

"I've cast me in the ocean —
The waves refused to drown;
I've faced the storm's commotion
In Heaven's darkest frown;
But elemental strife
Went by, and left me life.

"I've passed through fields of battle,
Where men in thousands fell,
While the artillery's rattle
Pealed forth their funeral knell.
The mangle shell and shot
Whizzed by, and harmed me not.

"Beyond the broad Atlantic
I've seen the fever spread,
Where orphans, driven frantic,
Lay dying on the dead;
I gazed with hope, not fear;
But still death came not near.

"Beneath the cross, when sinking,
He passed before my door;
From the crowd's insults shrinking,
He stepped the threshold o'er,
And made a mild request
That I would let him rest.

"I have no home to hide me;
Nor wealth can I display;
But unknown powers provide me
Five farthings every day.
This always is my store;
'Tis never less nor more."

"We used to think your story
Was but an idle dream;
But, when thus wan, and hoary,
And broken down, you seem,
The sight cannot deceive,
And we the tale believe.

"But you must have offended
Most grievously our God,
Whose mercy is extended
To all on earth who plod;
Then tell us for what crime
You bear his wrath sublime."

"'Twas by my rash behavior
I wrought this fearful scath:
As Christ, our Lord and Savior,
Was passing on to death,
His mild request I spurned,
His gentle pleading scorned.

"'Begone,' said I, 'thou vile one!
Move on, and meet thy fate;
I know it would defile one
To suffer thee to wait;
Blasphemer! haste! begone!
To death — to death move on!"

"Then Jesus, turning mildly,
Looked on my angry brow,
And said, 'Thou speakest wildly,
For onward, too, must thou.
March onward! 'tis thy doom,
And TARRY TILL I COME!'"

"A secret force expelled me
That instant from my home;
And since the doom has held me
Unceasingly to roam;
For neither day nor night
Must check my onward flight.

"Farewell, ye pitying strangers,
For I must now away;
Ye cannot know the dangers
Which menace my delay;
Farewell, ye kindly men,
We never meet again!"

Thus ends this most singular and beautiful legend, in which the simplicity, and almost ruggedness, of the style greatly enhances the miracle of the story. It is scarcely necessary to say, that there is no historical authority for the legend; but the Wandering Jew may be regarded as an allegorical impersonation of the destiny of the Jewish nation, which, since the death of Jesus Christ, has been outcast and wandering among the nations of the earth, still subject to that fearful imprecation, "His blood be upon us and upon our children!" The words, "Tarry thou till I come," were actually addressed to the apostle John; and, as this evangelist himself informs us, they led many of the disciples to believe that John would be one of those who should be found alive at the second coming of the Messiah. Another prophetic declaration of our Lord was similarly misunderstood—"Verily I say unto you, that there be some of them which stand here, which shall not taste of death until they have seen the kingdom of God come with power." This prophecy, which the best commentators apply to the destruction of Jerusalem, was, by many Greek Christians, supposed to refer to the second advent; and the story of the Wandering Jew was probably invented to support the truth of the interpretation. This was very naturally suggested to the Greeks by their own national legend of Prometheus, whose immortality of woe, fettered to the rocks of the Caucasus, with a vulture eternally preying upon his liver, had been rendered familiar to them by the noblest poem that ever proceeded from an uninspired pen.

The first direct mention of the Wandering Jew dates in the year 1215, when his story was made known to the learned of that day by an Armenian prelate who came on a pilgrimage to the relics of the saints, which the crusaders had brought from the Levant to England. According to this episcopal pilgrim, who avowed that he had seen and conversed with the Wanderer, the name of the hapless Jew was Cartophilus—a name which not a little strengthens the theory of the Greek origin of the legend. He was a subordinate officer in Pilate's court; one of the many chronicles which have repeated the story calls him "the crier;" and, when Jesus was condemned, he struck him a violent blow on the back, and pushing him towards the infuriated crowd, exclaimed, "On with thee, Jesus; wherefore dost thou tarry?" Jesus turned round, and with a severe accent, replied, "I go; but thou must tarry until I come!" The doom was no sooner pronounced than Cartophilus found himself irresistibly hurried onwards from his family and friends, compelled to be a vagabond and wanderer on the face of the earth, without ever finding any relaxation from his toils. After wandering over the whole of the East, he was converted and baptized by the same Ananias who baptized Paul, when he took the name of Joseph. Baptism, however, could not efface the curse; he still continues his erratic life, and looks daily for the second coming of the Messiah. Every hundred years he is seized with a strange malady, which brings him to the very point of death; but after remaining several days in a trance, he awakes, restored to the same condition of youth and health which he possessed when he insulted our Savior. The chroniclers of the fourteenth century, in relating this legend, changed the name of Joseph into Isaac Lackedem, or Lackedion, and omitted the fine incident of his periodical renovation. The ballad which we have translated is founded on this version of the story, which was generally received in Brabant. Indeed, he visited this country, according to the Brabantine chronicle, in 1575. Notwithstanding the meanness of his apparel, he was found to be a man of superior education, for "he spoke better Spanish than any nobleman in the court of the Duke of Alva."

Goethe's travestie of the story is derived from an earlier appearance of the Wandering Jew in Europe. On the Easter Sunday of the year 1542, two German students encountered him in a church in Hamburg, listening to the sermon with great attention and devotion. He was a very tall man, with white hair that reached below the middle of his back, and a beard that extended to his girdle; though the weather was still cold, his feet were naked; his dress, which the chroniclers describe with edifying peculiarity, consisted of a sailor's trousers, "a world too wide for his shrunk shank," a tight-fitting vest, and a large, loose cloak. He readily entered into conversation with the students, telling them his name was Ahasuerus, and that he had been a thriving shoemaker at the time of Christ's crucifixion. Impelled by the vulgar passion for excitement, which collects crowds to witness executions, rather than by religious bigotry, or personal rancor, he formed one of the multitude which surrounded the judgment seat of Pilate, and clamored for the release of Barabbas.

When Jesus was condemned, he hastened home to give his wife and children an opportunity of seeing the procession, which was to pass by their doors. When Jesus came up the street, he staggered under the weight of the cross, and fell against the wall of the house. Ahasuerus repulsed him rudely, and pointing to Calvary, the appointed place of punishment, which was visible in the distance, said, "Get on, blasphemer, to thy doom!" Jesus replied, "I will stop and rest; but you shall march onward until I return." He was instantly hurried forward by an irresistible impulse, and never afterwards knew rest. Ahasuerus, according to the report of the students, was a man of few words, very abstemious in his mode of living, accepting alms only for the purpose of distributing them to the poor, and at the same time soliciting their prayers, that he might be blessed with the boon of death. Twenty years later, Ahasuerus appeared in Strasburg, where he reminded the magistrate that he had passed through the place two centuries before—a fact which was verified by a reference to the police registers of the city! He inquired rather affectionately after the students with whom he had spoken at Hamburg, and declared that since his conversation with them he had visited the remotest parts of the East Indies. It is recorded that he spoke German with very great purity, and had not the slightest foreign accent.

In 1604, the Wandering Jew visited France. The true history of his life, taken from his own lips, was printed at Bourdeaux, in 1608; and his "Complaint," set to a popular air, was a very favorite ballad. The learned Louvt saw him, on a Sunday, at Beauvais, coming from mass. He was surrounded by a crowd of women and children, to whom he related anecdotes of Christ's passion in so affecting a manner as to draw tears from the most obstinate eyes, and to unloose the strings of the tightest purses. On this occasion, he asked for alms with a lofty tone of superiority, as if he were conferring, instead of receiving, a favor. His appearance excited great emotion throughout France; some being alarmed at such a portentous apparition, and others affecting to be edified by the instructing narratives he related. Indeed, for nearly twenty years, about this time, several impostors made large sums of money by personating the Wandering Jew.

Passing over some vague accounts of his being seen at Salamanca, Venice, and Naples, in which last city he was rather successful as a gambler, we find that he visited Brussels on the 22d of April, 1771, and sat for his portrait, to illustrate the ballad composed on his interview with certain of the burgesses, some centuries before. The portrait was graven on wood, and copies of it may be seen suspended in most of the cottages of Belgium, where his legend has always been more popular than any where else. In fact, the two great objects of hero-worship among the Flemings are the Wandering Jew and Napoleon.

Dr. Southey has based the Curse of Kehama on this legend; and Dr. Croly has made it the subject of his gorgeous romance, Salathiel; but the fiction has never laid hold of the popular mind in England, as it has in France and Germany, though there are few superior to it in the power of captivating the imagination.

§ 123. INCIDENTS RESPECTING FICTITIOUS WORKS.

1263. THE HAPPY VALLEY.

"I looked," says Mr. Green, "over Rennell's Memoir of his Map of Hindostan. The secluded valley of Cashmere—forming, between the parallels of 34° and 35° an oval hollow, eighty miles by fifty, blooming with perennial spring, refreshed with cascades, and streams, and lakes, and enriched with mountainous ridges, towering into the regions of eternal snow—was, perhaps, Johnson's prototype for the happy valley of Amhara in 'Rasselas.'" 1264. JOHNSON'S INQUISITIVENESS.

Dr. Johnson once called upon Mr. Garrick, in Southampton Street, and was shown into his study; but unfortunately, the door being left open, he strayed into an adjoining room, which contained all the novels and lighter works which had been presented as elegant tributes to this most admired actor. Johnson read first a bit of one, then another, and threw all down; so that, before the host arrived, the floor was strewn with splendid octavoes. Garrick was exceedingly angry at finding Johnson there, and said, "it was a private cabinet, and no company was admitted there." "But," says Johnson, "I was determined to examine some of your valuables, which I find consist of three sorts,—stuff, trash, and nonsense."

1265. THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD.

This beautiful little work remained unnoticed, and was attacked by the reviews, until Lord Holland, who had been ill, sent to his bookseller for some amusing book. This was sent, and he was so pleased that he spoke of it in the highest terms to a large company who dined with him a few days after. The consequence was, that the whole impression was sold off in a few days.

1266. ROBINSON CRUSOE.

The fascination of this extraordinary work is not limited to the juvenile reader. Mr. Tawney, a respectable alderman of Oxford, used to read Robinson Crusoe through every year with great delight, and thought every part of it as much matter of fact as his Bible. A friend at last asked him how he could be such a child as to credit a story so marvellous. "The original Crusoe," added he, "was Alexander Selkirk; and Daniel Defoe, an ingenious writer, embellished the plain story of his shipwreck upon the Island of Juan Fernandez, with almost all the adventures and remarks you so much admire." "Your information," said the alderman, with a sigh, "may be correct, but I had rather you had withheld it; for by thus undeceiving me, you have deprived me of one of the greatest pleasures of my old age."

1267. FICTION MISTAKEN FOR REALITY.

When the Utopia was first published, it occasioned a pleasant mistake. This political romance represents a perfect but visionary republic, in an island supposed to have been somewhere in the Atlantic, near these western shores. "As this was the age of discovery," says Granger, "the learned Budæus and others took it for genuine history, and deemed it expedient to send missionaries thither to convert the people," &c.

1268. RAPIDITY IN COMPOSING.

Matthew Gregory Lewis.

Lewis's Monk, on its first appearance, roused the attention of all the literary world of England, and even spread its writer's name to the continent. The author, "wonder-working Lewis," was a stripling under twenty when he wrote the Monk in the short space of ten weeks! Sir Walter Scott, probably the most rapid composer of fiction upon record, hardly exceeded this, even in his latter days, when his facility of writing was the greatest.

1269. NARROW ESCAPE.

Bernardin de St. Pierre, the celebrated author of the Studies of Nature, would probably never have given his exquisite tale of Paul and Virginia to the world but for M. Vernet, the eminent marine painter. St. Pierre had one evening read this tale at the house of M. Necker, to a company, among whom were Buffon, Thomas, and the Abbé Galiani; and from the manner in which those eminent writers listened to his production, St. Pierre was convinced that it was unworthy to see the light, and even formed the idea of committing the manuscript to the flames. A short time afterwards, he received a visit from Vernet, who dissuaded him from his intention, and, by his warm commendation of the work, prevailed on him to publish it. The extraordinary success of the work confirmed the opinion of his friend, increased the popularity, and greatly improved the pecuniary resources of the author.

1270. FIELDING'S TOM JONES.

Henry Fielding.

Fielding, having finished the manuscript of Tom Jones, and being at the time hard pressed for money, took it to a second-rate publisher, with the view of selling it for what it would fetch at the moment. He left it with the trader, and called upon him next day for his decision. The bookseller hesitated, and requested another day for consideration; and at parting, Fielding offered him the manuscript for twenty-five pounds.

On his way home, Fielding met Thomson, the poet, whom he told of the negotiation for the sale of the manuscript; when Thomson, knowing the high merit of the work, conjured him to be off the bargain, and offered to find a better purchaser.

Next morning, Fielding hastened to his appointment, with as much apprehension lest the bookseller should stick to his bargain as he had felt the day before lest he should altogether decline it. To the author's great joy, the ignorant trafficker in literature declined, and returned the manuscript to Fielding. He next set off, with a light heart, to his friend Thomson; and the novelist and the poet then went to Andrew Millar, the great publisher of the day. Millar, as was his practice with works of light reading, handed the manuscript to his wife, who, having read it, advised him by no means to let it slip through his fingers.

Millar now invited the two friends to meet him at a coffee-house in the Strand, where, after dinner, the bookseller, with great caution, offered Fielding two hundred pounds for the manuscript. The novelist was amazed at the largeness of the offer. "Then, my good sir," said Fielding, recovering himself from his unexpected stroke of good fortune, "give me your hand—the book is yours. And waiter," continued he, "bring a couple of bottles of your best Port." Before Millar died, he had cleared eighteen thousand pounds by the publication of Tom Jones.

1271. A TECHNICAL DISTINCTION.

The following note has made a deal of fun in London: "Dear Sir: How comes it that I have had no proofs of Love from you since last Saturday? I have waited with the utmost impatience?" Signed, Charlotte Burry. But the fun vanishes when the reader learns that Lady Charlotte Burry had a novel entitled Love in press, and that the note was to her printer.

1272. REMARKABLE FASCINATION.

A beauty of the court of Louis XVI., while dressing for a ball at Versailles, cast, by chance, her eyes on La Nouvelle Héloïse, which was then just out. She purposed only to read the preface. However, the toilet was finished, and she still continued reading. The last puff of powder was sprinkled on the towering hair, the last mauche affixed on the swelling cheek, but her eyes were as strongly riveted on the book as ever. The diamond necklace, the bracelets, even the gloves were put on; the mantle thrown round her elegant form; the waiting-maids retired; still no sign of departure from their mistress. The carriage is announced: she would only end the chapter. The coachman sends up word that people are already returning from the ball: she must read another chapter. One, two, three, strike on the Horloge du Palais, with no better effect on the all-absorbed reader, whose absence, by that time, is bewailed by one half of the assembled multitude under the royal roof, and sneeringly remarked upon by the other. The carriage is sent back, and another volume taken up. A new pair of bougies brought in only stimulates the rapidity of the lecture. The waiting-women are ordered to bed. Their mistress will, for the first time in her life, undress herself, take off the hoop, unlace her stays with her own "prentice hand." The morning sun, the breakfast hour, find her still poring over the glowing pages; and when, at last, the goal is reached, time does not allow her to change the dress, and obliges the fair enthusiast, with tearful eyes and a wan cheek, to sit down to dinner in her yesterday's ball attire, and to announce her weakness to her numerous guests. Rousseau considered this, as well he might, the finest compliment ever paid to his work.

1273. SINGULAR APPLICATION FOR THE PLACE OF A POLICEMAN.

Monsieur Gisquet, prefect of the French police under Louis Philippe, in his chapter on the secret agents of the police employed under his administration, observes, "I will now cite another instance of a very rare and uncommon variety of men, who became agents of the police from motives of patriotism. These are persons of a romantic turn of mind, who feel the necessity for strong excitement, and for whom the incidents of real life are too uniform and prosaic. When such men are not placed in situations to satisfy their cravings, and are unable to gain for themselves celebrity by some remarkable act, they are compelled to lower their pretensions, and seek for distinction by the singularity of their conduct. Among the thousands of my police agents, there was one individual of this species. A succession of ordinary occurrences had made him acquainted with the secrets of a correspondence between the Legitimists and the Duchess de Berri. This man, who could not disengage himself from the position which he occupied, and would not aid the opposite party with his opinions, demanded an audience. He made me comprehend the peculiarity of his situation, and revealed all the advantages which I might derive from it. I expected very elevated pretensions on his part; but judge of my surprise, when my new agent declared his determination of serving his country without fee or reward, by rescuing France from the evils of a civil war, which then threatened her. Struck with the reading of one of Cooper's novels called the Spy, he aspired to the sort of ambition which distinguishes the hero of that work, and was desirous of playing in France the part which Cooper has assigned to Harvey Birch during the American war of independence. He only stipulated, in behalf of his friends, my promise that no rigorous measures should be taken with regard to the several persons whom he designated, and who had a friendship for him. 'Harvey Birch'—for he adopted this name in all his reports—never belied his professions of fidelity. He rendered services which would have merited a competent fortune; but when the term of them arrived, he contented himself with asking for a humble employment, barely enough to supply his daily necessities."

1274. POPULARITY OF THE PICKWICK PAPERS.

Mr. Davy, who accompanied Colonel Cheney up the Euphrates, was for a time in the service of Mehemet Ali Pacha. Pickwick happening to reach Davy while he was at Damascus, he read a part of it to the pacha, who was so delighted with it, that Davy was, on one occasion, called up in the middle of the night to finish the reading of the chapter in which he and the pacha had been interrupted. Mr. Davy read, in Egypt, upon another occasion, some passages from these unrivalled "Papers" to a blind Englishman, who was in such ecstasy with what he heard, that he exclaimed he was almost thankful he could not see he was in a foreign country; for that while he listened, he felt completely as though he were again in England.

1275. HOGG'S TALES.

"Are you fond of 'Hogg's Tales?'" said a rather verdant lady to a shepherd.

"Yes, I likes 'em roasted, wi' salt on 'em," was the response.

"No—but I mean—have you read 'Hogg's Tales?'"

"Nos," said the bumpkin, "our hogs are all white or black—I doant think there is a red one among 'em."

1276. DICKENS AND SQUEERS.

Prefixed to Dickens's new edition of Nicholas Nickleby, we find the following allusion to Yorkshire schools:—

"I cannot call to mind, now, how I came to hear about Yorkshire schools, when I was not a very robust child, sitting in by-places, near Rochester Castle, with a head full of Partridge, Strap, Tom Pipes, and Sancho Panza; but I know that my first impressions of them were picked up at that time, and that they were somehow or other connected with a suppurated abscess that some boy had come home with, in consequence of his Yorkshire guide, philosopher, and friend, having ripped it open with an inky penknife. The impression made upon me, however made, never left me. I was always curious about them—fell, long afterwards, and at sundry times, into the way of hearing more about them—at last, having an audience, resolved to write about them. With that intent I went down into Yorkshire before I began this book, in very severe winter time, which is pretty faithfully described herein. As I wanted to see a schoolmaster or two, and was forewarned that those gentlemen might, in their modesty, be shy of receiving a visit from the author of the Pickwick Papers, I consulted with a professional friend here, who had a Yorkshire connection, and with whom I concerted a pious fraud. He gave me some letters of introduction, in the name, I think, of my travelling companion: they bore reference to a supposititious little boy who had been left with a widowed mother who didn't know what to do with him; the poor lady had thought, as a means of thawing the tardy compassion of her relations in his behalf, of sending him to a Yorkshire school. I was the poor lady's friend, travelling that way, and if the recipient of the letter could inform me of a school in his neighborhood, the writer would be very much obliged. I went to several places in that part of the country where I understood these schools to be most plentifully sprinkled, and had no occasion to deliver a letter until I came to a certain town which shall be nameless. The person to whom it was addressed was not at home; but he came down at night, through the snow, to the inn where I was staying. It was after dinner, and he needed little persuasion to sit down by the fire in a warm corner, and take his share of the wine that was on the table. I am afraid he is dead now. I recollect he was a jovial, ruddy, broad-faced man; that we got acquainted directly; and that we talked on all kinds of subjects, except the school, which he showed a great anxiety to avoid. Was there any large school near? I asked him, in reference to the letter. 'O, yes,' he said, 'there was a pratty big 'un.' 'Was t a good one?' I asked. 'Ey,' he said, 'it was as good as another; that was a matter of opinion;' and fell to looking at the fire, staring round the room, and whistling a little. On my reverting to some other topic that we had been discussing, he recovered immediately; but, though I tried him again and again, I never approached the question of the school, even if he were in the middle of a laugh, without observing that his countenance fell and that he became uncomfortable. At last, when we had passed a couple of hours or so, very agreeably, he suddenly took up his hat, and leaning over the table, and looking me full in the face, said, in a low voice. 'Weel, misther, we've been vary pleasant toogather, and ar'll spak' my moind tiv'ee. Dinnot let the weedur send her lattle boy to yan o' our schoolmeasthers, while there's a harse to hold in a' Lunnun, or a gootther to lie asleep in. Ar wou'dn't mak' ill words amang my neeburs, and ar spak' tiv'ee quiet loike. But I'm doom'd if ar cau gang to bed and not tellee, for weedur's sak', to keep the lattle boy from a' sike scoundrels while there's a harse to hold in a' Lunnun, or a gootther to lie asleep in.' Repeating these words with great heartiness, and with a solemnity on his jolly face that made it look twice as large as before, he shook hands and went away."

1277. COOPER AND HIS PUBLISHER.

James Fenimore Cooper.

Mr. Cooper, in the preface to his new edition of the Spy, tells us that when the second volume of that work was slowly printing, from manuscript that was barely dry when it went into the compositor's hands, the publisher intimated that the work might grow to a length that would consume the profits. To set his mind at rest, the last chapter was actually written, printed, and paged, several weeks before the chapters which preceded it were even thought of. Few authors could have acted as he has done.

1278. MR. HOFFMAN AND THE CHAMBERMAID.

Some years since, an historical novel by Mr. Hoffman was announced, called the Red Spur of the Ramapo; but it has never appeared, and the public, probably, are ignorant of the cause of its non-appearance. The cause was remarkable, and may be set down among the calamities of authors; but it was not unique, for we have heard of many similar disasters. Mr. Hoffman had been employed some six months upon his romance; he had taken unusual care in its composition, and an eminent book publisher's firm had contracted with him for the copyright, and it was nearly completed; the public were talking about it, and all the romance readers were anxiously anticipating a treat in its perusal. The author, as he wrote it, placed the manuscript sheets in a large portfolio by the side of his writing-table, to secure them from being lost. One day he happened to look into his literary sub-treasury, and, to his astonishment and alarm, discovered that there were not more than half a dozen sheets of manuscript in it. None but an author could judge of an author's feelings in such an emergency; but there were few men of any profession who could have acted as calmly as did the author of Greyslear on this occasion, and as the great Newton is reported to have done on a similar one.

Mr. Hoffman called to the chambermaid, who had been intrusted with the care of his room, and said,—

"Mary, have you ever taken any papers from this place?"

"Sure, I have, sir," replied she, with innocent frankness.

"For what purpose have you taken them, Mary?" said the author.

"Sure, sir, to kindle the fire; and I thought you were very good to put them there," replied Mary.

"And pray, Mary, how long have you been in the habit of taking papers out of here?"

"All the winter, sure," said Mary; "but I didn't think there was any good to them, for they were scribbled all over."

"Ah! Mary," exclaimed the ruined author, "do you know that you have done me an irreparable injury?"

"A reparable injury!" exclaimed Mary: "what's that? Sure, but I am very sorry, sir."

"And so am I," said the author; but he said nothing more.

1279. SINGULAR INCREDULITY.

The Prussian novelist Cosmar began one of his novels with the incident of the breaking down of a mail coach in the Leipziger Strasse of Berlin. The censor struck out this passage as inadmissible, "because his excellency the general postmaster, Von Nagler, manages the arrangement of the mails with so much care that such an accident is impossible."

1280. GALLANTRY OF FRENCH TROOPS.

M. de Rocca, in his memoirs of the invasion of Spain by Bonaparte, states that, when the French troops entered Toboso, so celebrated as the residence of Don Quixote's Dulcinea, they spared the inhabitants from the usual horrors of war from regard to the heroine of Cervantes. As soon as the French soldiers saw a woman at the windows, they cried out laughingly, "There is Dulcinea!" Their gaiety tranquillized the inhabitants; and witticisms upon Dulcinea and Don Quixote became a bond of union between our soldiers and the inhabitants, and the French, being well received, treated their hosts with civility.

1281. THE AUTHORSHIP OF WAVERLY.

Mrs. Murray Keith, a venerable Scotch lady, from whom Sir Walter Scott derived many of the traditionary stories and anecdotes wrought up in his novels, taxed him one day with the authorship, which he, as usual, stoutly denied. "What!" exclaimed the old lady, "d'ye think I dinna ken my ain groats among other folks' kail?"

§ 124. MISCELLANEOUS.

1282. DIRECTIONS FOR TRAVELLERS.

"The little incidents and characters that we met with in our journey," says Leigh Hunt, "reminded us of passages in Fielding and his brother novelists. They lay in the same path of reality. Fielding and Smollett did but meet with similar things, and describe them better. One little passage, insignificant in itself, or only amusing from its apparent caricature, was identical with one that we had met with in books; and I here relate it, to show how a seeming caricature may be simple matter of fact. Inquiring our way of a countryman, he began his answer by inquiring in turn which way we came. On obtaining that favorite and superfluous piece of information, he directed us to go by 'Miss Shore's house.' We asked whereabouts we should have the pleasure of seeing Miss Shore's house, and what sort of a house it was. 'Lord!' cried he in amazement, 'what, don't you know Miss Shore's house?'

"These absurd answers were precisely the same they had been a hundred years before; probably a thousand or ten thousand. Chaucer met with them on the road to Canterbury. Koo Moo gave them, in China, to Confucius. They are the last oracles that will retreat before the diffusion of knowledge."

1283. HUNT'S COMPANION.

"The Companion," says Leigh Hunt, "was written at Highgate; but the opening of the court scenes in Sir Ralph Esher was suggested by the locality of Epsom, to which place we had removed, and which saw the termination of what it had commenced.

"Those who are not acquainted with the work may be told that it is the fictitious autobiography of a gentleman of the court of Charles II., including the adventures of another, and notices of Cromwell, the Puritans, and the Catholics. It was given to the world anonymously, and, notwithstanding my wishes to the contrary, as a novel; but the publisher pleaded hard for the desirableness of so doing, and as he was a good-natured man, and had liberally enabled me to come from Italy, I could not say nay. It is not destitute of adventure; and I took a world of pains to make it true to the times which it pictured; but whatever interest it may possess is so entirely owing, I conceive, to a certain reflecting exhibition of character, and to fac-simile imitations of the courts of Charles and Cromwell, that I can never present it to my mind in any other light than that of a veritable set of memoirs.

"The reader may judge of the circumstances under which authors sometimes write, when I tell him that the publisher had entered into no regular agreement respecting this work; that he could decline receiving any more of it whenever it might please him to do so; that I had nothing else at the time to depend on for my family; that I was in very bad health, never writing a page that did not put my nerves into a state of excessive sensibility, starting at every sound; and that whenever I sent my copy up to London for payment, which I did every Saturday, I always expected, till I got a good way into the work, that he would send me word he had had enough. I waxed and waned in spirits accordingly, as the weeks opened and terminated; now being as full of them as my hero, Sir Ralph, and now as much otherwise as his friend Sir Philip Herne; and these two extremes of mirth and melancholy, and the analogous thoughts which they fed, made a strange kind of harmony with the characters themselves; which characters, by the way, were wholly fictitious, and probably suggested by the circumstance. Merry or melancholy, my nerves equally suffered by the tension occasioned them in composition.

"A few months ago, when I had occasion to look at Sir Ralph Esher again, after some lapse of time, I was not a little pleased to find how glibly and at their ease the words appeared to run on, as though I had suffered no more in writing it than Sir Ralph himself. But thus it is with authors who are in earnest. The propriety of what they are saying becomes a matter of as much nervous interest to them as any other exciting cause; and I believe that if a writer of this kind were summoned away from his work to be taken to the scaffold, he would not willingly leave his last sentence in an erroneous condition."

1284. A COMPLETE SURPRISE.

Sir Thomas Robinson was a tall, uncouth man, and his stature was rendered still more striking by his hunting-dress, which consisted of a postilion's cap, a tight green jacket, and buckskin breeches. He was liable to sudden whims, and once set off on a sudden, in his hunting-suit, to visit his sister, who was married and settled at Paris. He arrived there while there was a large company at dinner. The servant announced M. Robinson, and he came in, to the great amazement of the guests. Among others, a French abbé thrice lifted his fork to his mouth, and thrice laid it down, with an eager air of surprise. Unable to restrain his curiosity any longer, he burst out with, "Excuse me, sir. Are you the famous Robinson Crusoe, so remarkable in history?"

FORGERIES AND FRAUDS.

§ 125. MISCELLANEOUS.

1285. INGENIOUS FABRICATION.

A literary forgery, supposed to have been grafted on those of Annius, involved the Inghirami family. It was by digging in their grounds that they discovered a number of Etruscan antiquities, consisting of inscriptions, and also fragments of a chronicle, pretended to have been composed sixty years before the vulgar era. The characters on the marbles were the ancient Etruscan, and the historical work tended to confirm the pretended discoveries of Annius. They were collected and enshrined in a magnificent folio by Curtius Inghirami, who, a few years after, published a quarto volume exceeding one thousand pages to support their authenticity. Notwithstanding the erudition of the forger, these monuments of antiquity betrayed their modern condition. There were uncial letters which no one knew; but these were said to be undiscovered ancient Etruscan characters; it was more difficult to defend the small Italic letters, for they were not used in the age assigned to them; besides that there were dots on the letter i, a custom not practised till the eleventh century. The style was copied from the Latin of the Psalms and the Breviary; but Inghirami discovered that there had been an intercourse between the Etruscans and the Hebrews, and that David had imitated the writings of Noah and his descendants. Of Noah the chronicle details speeches and anecdotes.

The Romans, who have preserved so much of the Etruscans, had not, however, noticed a single fact recorded in these Etruscan antiquities. Inghirami replied that the manuscript was the work of the secretary of the college of the Etrurian augurs, who alone was permitted to draw his materials from the archives, and who, it would seem, was the only scribe who has favored posterity with so much secret history. It was urged, in favor of the authenticity of these Etruscan monuments, that Inghirami was so young an antiquary at the time of the discovery, that he could not even explain them; and that when fresh researches were made on the spot, other similar monuments were also disinterred, where evidently they had long lain; the whole affair, however contrived, was confined to the Inghirami family. One of them, half a century before, had been the librarian of the Vatican, and to him is ascribed the honor of the forgeries which he buried where he was sure they would be found. This, however, is a mere conjecture. Inghirami, who published and defended their authenticity, was not concerned in their fabrication; the design was probably merely to raise the antiquity of Volaterra, the family estate of the Inghirami; and for this purpose one of its learned branches had bequeathed his posterity a collection of spurious historical monuments, which tended to overturn all received ideas on the first ages of history.

1286. A HINDOO FORGERY.

A singular forgery was practised on Captain Wilford by a learned Hindoo, who, to ingratiate himself and his studies with the too zealous and pious European, contrived, among other attempts, to give the history of Noah and his three sons in his Purana, under the designation of Satyavrata. Captain Wilford, having read the passage, transcribed it for Sir William Jones, who translated it as a curious extract; the whole was an interpolation by the dexterous introduction of a foreign sheet, discolored and prepared for the purpose of deception, and which, having served his purpose for the moment, was afterwards withdrawn. As books in India are not bound, it is not difficult to introduce loose leaves. To confirm his various impositions, this learned forger had the patience to write two voluminous sections, in which he connected all the legends together in the style of the Puranas, consisting of twelve thousand lines. When Captain Wilford resolved to collate the manuscript with others, the learned Hindoo began to disfigure his own manuscript, the captain's, and those of the college, by erasing the name of the country, and substituting that of Egypt. With as much pains, and with a more honorable direction, our Hindoo Lander might have immortalized his inverted invention.

1287. WHAT STERNE DID.

Lawrence Sterne, well known by his productions of wit, was detected by Dr. Ferrier, in his Illustrations of Sterne, in drawing some of the best thoughts in his most admired performances from Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy.

1288. LENDING AN AUTHOR'S NAME.

William Guthrie, a very laborious and voluminous writer on history, politics, and other subjects, is said to have lent his name to booksellers for publications in which he had no concern. Such is asserted to have been the case with respect to the work called Guthrie's Geographical Grammar. Butler says he only wrote the introduction

§ 126. ADROIT AND SUCCESSFUL.

1289. AN ARCH DECEIVER

A German writer named Braune, resident at Naumburg, published an account of the siege of that town by the Hussites, and gravely asserted in the preface that he had discovered documents, in the archives of Naumburg, which enabled him to throw new light upon the subject. He combined such facts as were historically true, in a most dexterous manner, with his own fictions. These he illustrated with notes, containing passages from the pretended documents, composed by himself in ancient style, and thus confuted the opinions of other writers. At the same time, he amused himself with giving to the nobles and gentlemen, whom he introduced as the leaders of the defenders, or in other interesting characters, burlesque names, after shoemakers, tailors, bakers, butchers, and other tradesmen yet living at Naumburg, and in his description of the persons and qualities of these imaginary heroes, he delineated, in the most ludicrous manner, those whose names he transferred to them. This hoax produced the desired effect. Several critical journals represented the pamphlet as a highly important work; and in one periodical production, which claimed an eminent literary rank, it was mentioned as a book to which the public was indebted for the most extraordinary discoveries.

1290. STRANGE, BUT TRUE.

A number of good books have been sold this year in Paris, for new year's gifts. "The eccentricity of our age," observes a French writer, "has revived the taste for sound and healthful reading, which invigorates and rejuvenates the soul." As apropos to this taste for good books, we translate an amusing anecdote for the benefit of our book-loving readers of the Model Courier:—

There was once a bookworm, whose taste for books went farther than their contents, he admired handsome type, beautiful binding, &c.; but as it too frequently happens with such amateurs, his purse was often empty. He was not deficient in wit, as he subsequently proved; but a bookseller would not be paid in wit.

He went frequently to Gosselin's, a celebrated Parisian bookseller, where, among other wonders, he observed two copies of Victor Hugo's Orientales, printed on Chinese rose-colored paper.

Day after day he went to the bookseller's store, and his admiring eyes were never weary of contemplating the various beauties of those volumes. He opened them, he turned over the leaves, he coveted them, but he did not purchase. The price of each copy was fifty crowns—a frightful sum! Yet our amateur would as willingly have given the mines of Potosi as fifty crowns, did he possess either.

It happened one day, whilst he was in an ecstasy before the Orientales on rose-colored paper, that a young lady, attended by a footman, entered the store; she was simply dressed, and the expression of her countenance was gentle and agreeable.

"I wish," said she, "some curious and elegant book—something original, unlike what one sees every day."

"Mon Dieu madame," answered the amateur, boldly, "we have here just what you want—a marvellous book, that will charm you at the first glance."

"What is it?"

"Les Orientales, by Victor Hugo. You are certainly acquainted with it; it is unnecessary for me to say a word in its praise; but you will be dazzled with the beauty of the type and paper."

"Let us see," replied the lady.

"Here it is," said the amateur, opening the book.

"Beautiful indeed; and the price?"

"A hundred crowns."

"A mere trifle," and the lady put down the book, and asked M. Gosselin to send it to her at once; then taking a hundred crowns in gold pieces from her purse, she laid them on the counter and departed.

It was the Princess Marie of Orleans, then in the freshness and brilliancy of youthful beauty, which was, alas! so soon to fade.

"Diable!" said Gosselin to our amateur: "do you know that you do things admirably? Why not change your situation? Commerce is surely your vocation. What steadiness! What an eye! What presence of mind!"

"Ma foi, mon cher," answered the amateur, "your two copies are worth a hundred crowns. There is your money. I have sold one copy; the other is mine."

And he went off with the book, which is still in his library.

1291. VOLATILITY OF EDWARD WORTLEY MONTAGUE.

Mr. Foster had, in the early part of life, been selected by old Edward Wortley Montague, the husband of the celebrated Lady Mary, to superintend the education of that very eccentric character, the late Edward Wortley Montague. Foster was perfectly qualified for the station of a private tutor, but his pupil was so exceedingly volatile as to render it utterly impossible to fix his attention to any worthy pursuit. After thrice running away, and being discovered by his father's valet crying flounders about the streets of Deptford, he was sent to the West Indies, whither Foster accompanied him. On their return to England, a good-natured stratagem was practised to obtain a temporary supply of money from old Montague, and, at the same time, to give him a favorable opinion of his son's attention to a particular species of erudition. The stratagem was this. Foster wrote a book, which he entitled the Rise and Fall of the Roman Republics. To this he subjoined the name of Edward Wortley Montague, Jun., Esq. Old Wortley, seeing the book advertised, sent for his son, and gave him a bank note of one hundred pounds, promising him a similar present for every new edition which the book should pass through. It was well received by the public, and therefore a second edition occasioned a second supply. It is now in libraries with the name of Wortley Montague prefixed as the author, although he did not write a line of it. Mr. Foster was afterwards chaplain to the celebrated Sir William Wyndham; he then went to Petersburg in the suite of the English ambassador.

1292. A MULISH JOKE.

One De Grassis engraved on marble the epitaph of a mule, which he buried in his vineyard. Some time after, having ordered a new plantation on the spot, the diggers could not fail of disinterring what lay ready for them. The inscription imported that one Publius Grassus had raised this monument to his mule. De Grassis gave it out as an odd coincidence of names, and a prophecy about his own mule. It was a simple joke. The marble was thrown by, and no more thought of. Several years after, it rose into celebrity, for with the crudities it then passed for an ancient inscription, and the antiquary Porcacchi inserted the epitaph in his work on Burials. Thus De Grassis and his mule, equally respectable, would have come down to posterity, had not the story by some means got wind.

1293. FACILITY OF IMITATION.

Goltzius, being disgusted at the preference given to the works of Albert Durer, Lucas of Leyden, and others of that school, and having attempted to introduce a better taste, which was not immediately relished, he published what was afterwards called his masterpieces. These are six prints in the style of these masters, merely to prove that Goltzius could imitate their works, if he thought proper. One of these, the Circumcision, he had painted on soiled paper, and, to give it the brown tint of antiquity, had carefully smoked it, by which means it was sold as a curious performance, and deceived some of the most capital connoisseurs of the day, one of whom bought it as one of the finest engravings of Albert Durer. Even Strutt acknowledges the merit of Goltzius's masterpieces.

1294. A PORTUGUESE ORACLE.

An incident is recorded in Portuguese history, contrived with the intention to keep up the national spirit, and diffuse hopes of the new enterprise of Vasco de Gama, who had just sailed on a voyage of discovery to the Indies. Three stones were discovered near Cintra, bearing, in ancient characters, a Latin inscription—a sibylline oracle addressed prophetically “To the inhabitants of the West;” stating that when these three stones shall be found, the Ganges, the Indus, and the Tagus should exchange their commodities! This was the pious fraud of a Portuguese poet, sanctioned by the approbation of the king. When the stones had lain a sufficient time in the damp earth, so as to become apparently antique, our poet invited a numerous party to dinner at his country-house: in the midst of the entertainment, a peasant rushed in, announcing the sudden discovery of this treasure! The inscription was placed among the royal collections as a sacred curiosity. The prophecy was accomplished, and the oracle was long considered genuine.

§ 127. SINGULAR FRAUDS DETECTED.

1295. LITERARY DISHONESTY OF MONKS.

Myles Davies, in his Icon Libellorum, or a Critical History of Pamphlets, relates a curious anecdote respecting the forgeries of the monks. Archbishop Usher detected in a manuscript of St. Patrick's Life, pretended to have been found at Louvain, as an original of a very remote date, several passages taken, with little alteration, from his own writings.

1296. FALSE COPY OF THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES.

There is, says Prideaux, in the Church of St. Dominic, in Bononia, a copy of the Hebrew Scriptures, kept with a great deal of care, which they pretend to be the original copy, written by Ezra himself; and therefore it is there valued at so high a rate that great sums of money have been borrowed by the Bononians upon the pawn of it, and again repaid for its redemption. It is written in a very fair character, upon a sort of leather, and made up in a roll, according to the ancient manner; but it having the vowel points annexed, and the writing being fresh and fair, without any decay, both these particulars prove the novelty of the copy.

1297. A BOLD FABRICATION.

At Rome, a pretended Count of Mariano began to issue inedited works of Tasso, Guarini, Strozzi, Petrarch, with a collection of letters of other literary and historical personages, which he averred to be from autograph manuscripts in his possession. The works were welcomed at first, in Italy and elsewhere, as authentic, and some monarchs transmitted tokens of honor to the patriotic editor. An Italian nobleman, who was vexed by the tenor of a letter ascribed to his ancestor, raised a doubt, and obtained a legal inquiry. The whole body of the publications was discovered to be a sheer fabrication. Our ingenious count occupies a cell in one of the pope's prisons; his indictment consists of one hundred and sixty close pages, being a descriptive catalogue of his works.

1298. DATING WRONG.

When Dr. Berkenhout was busied in writing, without much knowledge or skill, a history of our English authors, Steevens allowed the good man to insert a choice letter by George Peele, giving an account of “a merry meeting at the Globe,” wherein Shakspeare, and Ben Jonson, and Ned Alleyn are admirably made to perform their respective parts. As the nature of the Biographia Literaria required authorities, Steevens ingeniously added, “Whence I copied this letter I do not recollect.” However, he well knew it came from the Theatrical Mirror, where he had first deposited the precious original, to which he had unguardedly ventured to affix the date of 1600. Unluckily, Peele was discovered to have died two years before he wrote his own letter. The date is adroitly dropped in Berkenhout. Steevens did not wish to refer to his original, which is often seen quoted as authority.

1399. GEORGE PSALMANAZAR, THE LITERARY IMPOSTOR.

George Psalmanazar, a man of learning, of unknown origin, and subsequently one of the writers employed in compiling the Universal History—a task which he appears to have executed with sufficient skill and fidelity,—actually took the pains to invent a language, which he wrote and spoke to the satisfaction of curious inquirers, alleging it to be that of the Island of Formosa, where he pretended to have been born.

This adventurer, who attracted, in his time, no small attention, was first noticed by a Colonel Lauder, in the garrison of Sluys, at which place, a wanderer from his parents and country, and under the pressure of extreme poverty, he had enlisted as a private soldier; but he industriously and artfully circulated a strange story that he was a native of the above island, converted from idolatry by certain missionaries of the Society of Jesus, and that he was obliged to fly from the vengeance of the Japanese, whose hatred used to be described as particularly virulent against Christianity in all its forms.

The singularity of this relation, and the apparent simplicity of the stranger's manner, induced the colonel, and Innes, his regimental chaplain, an unprincipled profligate, to take him under their protection. Psalmanazar accompanied them to England, and was soon after introduced to the Bishop of London, who listened to his account with pity and implicit faith, became his patron, contributed generously towards his support, and rewarded with considerable preferment the chaplain Innes, who was aware of, and had early detected, the cheat, but considered it as a convenient step to patronage.

The artful conduct of the stranger, in producing and speaking a language, alphabet, and grammar purely of his own invention, and of his eating raw meat, roots, and herbs, soon rendered him an object of public notice, and occasioned much curious disquisition between many characters of the first rank in church and state. The keen-eyed scepticism of the Drs. Halley, Mead, and Woodward, rescued them, however, from the charge of blind credulity, in which many of their respectable contemporaries were involved: these gentlemen had cried down Psalmanazar as an arrant rogue from the beginning.

The most sanguine hopes of the impostor, could he have silenced the accusation of his own heart, appear to have been crowned with success, and he derived liberal contributions from the pity, the curiosity, or the folly of mankind, who considered it their duty, as Christians and as men, to protect an unfortunate fugitive, who had suffered in the cause of truth.

Psalmanazar drew up, in Latin, an account of the Island of Formosa, a consistent and entertaining work, which was translated and hurried through the press, had a rapid sale, and is quoted without suspicion by Buffon; while his adherence to certain singularities in his manners and diet, gathered from popular opinion or from books, considerably strengthened the imposition; for the carrying on of which he was eminently qualified, by possessing a command of countenance, temper, and recollection, which no perplexity, rough usage, or cross examination could ruffle or derange.

His memory was, at the same time, so correctly tenacious, that after the exercise of habit in verbal arrangement, on being desired to translate a long list of English words into the Formosan language, they were marked down without his knowledge; and his credit was considerably corroborated by his correctly fixing the same terms to the same words three, six, or even twelve months afterwards. In this manner his imposture had been first discovered by Innes; but this disgrace to his cloth suppressed what he knew, and joined in the fraud, from sinister motives.

By favor of the Bishop of Oxford, who proved a warm advocate in his cause, Psalmanazar was enabled to improve himself in his studies, and convenient apartments were provided for him in one of the colleges of that university. To impress his neighbors at this place with proper ideas of his intense and unceasing application, it was his custom to have lighted candles in his room during the night, and to sleep in an easy chair, that his bed-maker, finding his bed untumbled, might not suppose he indulged in so unphilosophical and illiterate a refreshment as going to bed; he would also occasionally lament the noise and interruptions of certain young men in an adjoining apartment, who preferred the joys of wine and good fellowship to solitude and midnight studies.

On his return to London, he drew up, at the desire of his ecclesiastic friends, a version of the Church Catechism, in what he called his native tongue, which was examined by the learned, found regular and grammatical, and pronounced a real language, and no counterfeit. By these and other conciliating arts, the supplies of his patrons continued liberal, and he was enabled to lead an idle, and in some instances, when he was thrown off his guard, an extravagant life. The person of our Formosau was far from being attractive, but his qualities, it is said, were thought otherwise by some fashionable ladies, one of whom is reported to have exclaimed, "I positively shall never be easy till I have been introduced to this strange man with a hard name, who has fled from Japan and eats raw meat."

But many of his friends were offended by such conduct, and the critics, and among others Dr. Douglas, "the scourge of impostors, the terror of quacks," could not rest till their doubts and incredulity were justified. They pointed out various absurdities and many contradictions in his narratives, as well as in his declarations: he was gradually lowered in the general esteem; his benefactors silently withdrew their support; the fraud was at length understood; the favor of the public converted by a natural process into resentment; and those who had originally given warning of the imposture did not forget to increase the confusion of their opponents by ridicule and sarcasm.

The situation of Psalmanazar thus became critical. Detected, and almost deserted, his subsistence was precarious; but having displayed in his assumed character considerable abilities, and having cultivated an extensive acquaintance with a class of men who have been pronounced the best patrons of literary adventure, he was employed by the booksellers in a periodical publication, and lastly in a Universal History, a considerable portion of the ancient part of which was committed to his care.

By degrees he became quiet, untalked of, and comparatively respectable, and he privately confessed his imposture. He could never be prevailed on to disclose his real name and country. (supposed to be the south of France;) he was afraid, he said, of disgracing his family; but his imposition he confessed thoroughly, adding to his confession all the marks of remorse. His repentance was sincere, in the opinion of Dr. Johnson, who used to say that the sorrows of Psalmanazar, in speaking of his deception, were heartfelt, strong, and energetic, like those of Peter, after the denial of his Savior, when he went out and wept bitterly. It was no common grief, arising from blasted hopes, but a real hatred of himself for the crime he had committed, and a dread of that punishment which he thought he deserved. His frame on these occasions was shaken and convulsed, his face drowned in tears, and his utterance choked with sobs—a spectacle which no feeling man could behold without emotion, or consider as produced by any thing short of real anguish.

1300. RABBI BENJAMIN.

The travels, written in Hebrew, of Rabbi Benjamin, of Tudela, of which we have a curious translation, are considered apocryphal. He describes a journey, which if ever he took, it must have been with his nightcap on—being a perfect dream! It is said that to inspire and give importance to his nation, he pretended he had travelled to all the synagogues in the East; places he mentions he does not appear ever to have seen, and the different people he describes no one has known. He calculates that he has found near eight hundred thousand Jews, of which about half are independent, and not the subjects of any Christian or Gentile sovereign. These fictitious travels have been a source of much trouble to the learned, particularly to those whose zeal to authenticate them induced them to follow the aerial footsteps of the Hippogriff of Rabbi Benjamin. He affirms that the tomb of Ezekiel, with the library of the first and second temples, were to be seen in his time at a place on the banks of the River Euphrates. Wesselius, of Groningen, and many other literati, travelled on purpose to Mesopotamia to reach the tomb and examine the library; but the fairy treasures were never to be seen, nor even heard of!

§ 128. FRAUDS UPON ANCIENT CLASSICAL WRITERS.

1301. ANNIUS.

In this class we must place Annius, of Viterbo, who published a pretended collection of historians of the remotest antiquity, some of whose names had descended to us in the works of ancient writers, while their works themselves had been lost. Afterwards he subjoined commentaries to confirm their authority, by passages from unknown authors. These, at first, were eagerly accepted by the learned. The blunders of the presumed editor—one of which was his mistaking the right name of the historian he forged—were gradually detected, till at length the imposture was apparent. The pretended originals were more remarkable for their number than their volume, for the whole collection does not exceed one hundred and seventy-one pages, which lessened the difficulty of forgery, while the commentaries, which were afterwards published, must have been manufactured at the same time as the text. In favor of Annius, the high rank he occupied at the Roman court, his irreproachable conduct, and his declaration that he had recovered some of these fragments at Mantua, and that others had come from Armenia, induced many to credit these pseudo-historians. A literary war was soon kindled. Nicéron had discriminated between four parties engaged in conflict. One party desisted the whole of the collection as gross forgeries; another obstinately supported their authenticity; a third decided that they were forgeries before Annius possessed them, who was only credulous; while a fourth party considered them as partly authentic, and ascribed their blunders to the interpolation of the editor, to increase their importance. Such as they were, they scattered confusion over the whole face of history.

1302. DR. HAYWARD'S FELONY.

Queen Elizabeth, being much enraged against Dr. Hayward, author of the Life of Henry IV., had ordered her law officers to proceed against him, and, amongst others, inquired of Bacon "if there was not treason in the book." The witty lawyer readily answered, "No, madam, I cannot answer for there being treason in it, but I am certain it contains much felony." "How!" eagerly exclaimed her majesty; "how, and wherein?" "In many passages," replied he, "which he has stolen from Tacitus."

1303. VANITY AND MEANNESS OF ALCYONIUS.

A fraud, which perhaps occasioned the greatest regret that ever was felt in the literary world, has been attributed to Peter Alcyonius, one of the learned Italians who cultivated literature in the sixteenth century. He had considerable knowledge of the Greek and Latin tongues, and wrote rhetorical treatises. He was a long time corrector of the press at Venice, in the house of Aldus Manutius, and sought to participate in the praises given to that eminent printer and classical scholar. He translated some treatises of Aristotle into Latin; but the execution of them was so severely criticized by Sepulveda, that Alcyonius, at a great expense, bought up the criticisms of his Spanish enemy, to burn them. Paul Jovius says of him, in his quaint language, that he was a man of downright plebeian and sordid manners, and such a slave to his appetite, that in one and the same day he would dine three or four times, but always at the expense of another; nor was he altogether so bad a physician in this beastly practice, since, before he went to bed, he discharged the intemperate load from his stomach.

Alcyonius published a treatise De Exilio, containing many fine passages; so elegant, in fact, was it, that he was accused of having tacked several parts of Cicero's De Gloria to his own composition, and then, to prevent being convicted of the theft, thrown the manuscript of Cicero, which was the only one in the world, into the fire. Cicero, in his twenty-seventh epistle, fifteenth book, writing to Atticus, says, "I will speedily send you my book De Gloria."

That the manuscript was extant till nearly the period in question would seem to be indubitable, as it was enumerated by Bernard Giustiniani, the learned Governor of Padua, among the works which he possessed. Along with the rest of his library, it is said to have been bequeathed to a convent of nuns; but from that time it could never be found.

It was believed by many, that Peter Alcyonius, who was physician to the monastery, and to whom the nuns intrusted the management of the library, having copied into his own treatise all that suited his purpose from that of Cicero, had secretly made away with it. This charge was first brought against Alcyonius by Paul Manutius, and was repeated by Paul Jovius, and subsequently by other writers; but Tiraboschi thinks that it is a calumny. It is probable that it was provoked by the excessive vanity and propensity to sarcasm and satire which distinguished Alcyonius.

1304. SIGONIUS AND CICERO.

Sigonius was a great master of the style of Cicero, and ventured to publish a treatise De Consolatione as a composition of Cicero, recently discovered. Many were deceived by the counterfeit, which was executed with great dexterity, and was long received as genuine; but he could not deceive Lipsius, who, after reading only ten lines, threw it away, exclaiming, "Bah! Non est Ciceronis."

1305. AN ADROIT IMPOSTOR.

One of the most extraordinary literary impostures was that of one Joseph Vella, who, in 1794, was an adventurer in Sicily, and pretended that he possessed seventeen of the lost books of Livy, in Arabic. He had received this literary treasure, he said, from a Frenchman, who had purloined it from a shelf in St. Sophia's Church, at Constantinople. As many of the Greek and Roman classics have been translated by the Arabians, and many were first known in Europe in their Arabic dress, there was nothing improbable in one part of his story. He was urged to publish these long-desired books, and Lady Spencer, then in Italy, offered to defray the expenses. He had the effrontery, by way of specimen, to edit an Italian translation of the sixtieth book; but that book took up no more than one octavo page! A professor of Oriental literature, in Prussia, introduced it in his work, never suspecting the fraud. It proved to be nothing more than the epitome of Florus. He also gave out that he possessed a code which he had picked up in the Abbey of St. Martin, containing the ancient history of Sicily, in the Arabic period, comprehending above two hundred years, and of which ages their own historians were entirely deficient in knowledge. Vella declared he had a genuine official correspondence between the Arabian governors of Sicily and their superiors in Africa, from the first landing of the Arabians in that island.

Vella was now loaded with honors and pensions. It is true he showed Arabic manuscripts, which, however, did not contain a syllable of what he said. He pretended he was in continual correspondence with friends at Morocco and elsewhere. The King of Naples furnished him with money to assist his researches. Four volumes, in quarto, were at length published. Vella had the adroitness to change the Arabic manuscripts he possessed, which entirely related to Mahomet, to matters relative to Sicily; he bestowed several weeks' labor to disfigure the whole, altering page for page, line for line, and word for word, but interspersed numberless dots, strokes, and flourishes, so that when he published a fac simile, every one admired the learning of Vella, who could translate what no one else could read. He complained he had lost an eye in this minute labor; and every one thought his pension ought to have been increased. Every thing prospered about him, except his eye, which some thought was not so bad either. It was at length discovered, by his blunders, &c., that the whole was a forgery, though it had now been patronized, translated, and extracted throughout Europe. When this manuscript was examined by an Orientalist, it was discovered to be nothing but a history of Mahomet and his family. Vella was condemned to imprisonment.

1306. INGENUITY OF PÈRE COMMIRE.

Père Commire, when Louis XIV. resolved on the conquest of Holland, composed a Latin fable, entitled the Sun and the Frogs, in which he assumed, with such felicity, the style and character of Phædrus, that the learned German critic Wolfius was deceived, and innocently inserted it in his edition of that fabulist.

1307. DISHONESTY OF MURETUS.

Muretus rendered Joseph Scaliger, a great stickler for the ancients, highly ridiculous by an artifice which he practised. He sent some verses which he pretended were copied from an old manuscript. The verses were excellent, and Scaliger was credulous. After having read them, he exclaimed they were admirable, and affirmed that they were written by an old comic poet, Trabeus. He quoted them in his commentary on Varo De Re Rustica, as one of the most precious fragments of antiquity. It was then, when he had fixed his foot firmly in the trap, that Muretus informed the world of the little dependence to be placed on the critical sagacity of one so prejudiced in favor of the ancients, and who considered his judgment as infallible.

§ 129. FRAUDS UPON EUROPEAN WRITERS.

1308. W. H. IRELAND'S DECEPTION.

Mr. William Henry Ireland has furnished a striking instance of the misapplication of youthful talents; and certainly never did any man suffer more severely for his duplicity. This young man, whose literary fraud furnished the counterpart to that of Chatterton, when only sixteen years of age forged a series of papers, which he ascribed to the immortal Shakspeare; and so successfully managed was the imposition, that he not only imposed upon his own father, but on several literary gentlemen who prided themselves much on their critical acumen, as will appear by the following certificate:—

"We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, have, in the presence and by the favor of Mr. Ireland, inspected the Shakspeare papers, and are convinced of their authenticity. Samuel Parr; John Tweddell; Thomas Burgess; John Byng; James Bindley; Herbert Croft; Somerset; Isaac Heard, Garter King of Arms; T. Webb; R. Valpy; James Boswell; Lauderdale; Rev. J. Scott; Kinnaid; John Pinkerton; Thomas Hunt; Henry James Pye; Rev. N. Thornbury; Jonathan Hewlett, Translator of old Records, Common Pleas Office, Temple; Mat. Wyatt; John Frank Newton." After fabricating a great number of papers, which he attributed to Shakspeare and his contemporaries, Ireland presumed so far as to write a tragedy, which he said was by the great dramatist, and even succeeded in having it represented at Drury Lane Theatre. It was called Vortigern and Rowena, and was condemned. To Mr. Malone, who had always denied the authenticity of the papers, the public were principally indebted for the detection of the fraud; and Ireland afterwards acknowledged it, in a curious work, entitled Confessions of W. H. Ireland.

1309. MACPHERSON'S OSSIAN

About the year 1760, much speculation was excited in the literary world by the publication of a series of poems, purporting to have been translated by Mr. Macpherson, from the original Gaelic of the famous poet Ossian, whose compositions had been handed down from his own times by oral tradition. The occasion of Mr. Macpherson's giving them to the world was as follows: Mr. Home, author of Douglas, in company with other gentlemen, being at Moffat, in the summer of 1759, met there Mr. Macpherson, then tutor to Mr. Graham, and from him they heard some specimens of Gaelic poetry, which so much pleased them that they begged Mr. Macpherson to publish them in a small volume. He complied; and this specimen having attracted a good deal of attention, he proposed to make a tour, by subscription, through the Highlands, for the purpose of collecting more complete specimens of the ancient poetry. This journey he performed in 1760, and speedily published the poems in a more complete form. They were received, however, by many, with suspicion; it being thought, from the remoteness of the period at which they were said to have been produced, that they could not be genuine.

The first regular attack on the authenticity of Ossian's poems was made in 1781, by Mr. Shaw, the author of a Gaelic dictionary and grammar; and it was a vigorous one. He contended, from internal evidence, that the poems were forgeries; he asserted that many of the Highland persons who had vouched for their genuineness had never seen a line of the supposed originals, and that Macpherson himself had constantly evaded showing them to him; and he maintained that both the fable and the machinery of the principal poems were Irish, and that if, as a blind, any manuscripts had ever been shown, they must have been in the Irish language, the Earse dialect of the Gaelic never having been written or printed till, in 1754, Mr. Macfarlane printed a translation of Baxter's Call to the Unconverted. An answer was attempted by Mr. Clarke, a member of the Scottish Antiquarian Society; but, though he succeeded in some points, he failed in his principal object.

After a lapse of nearly twenty years, a more powerful antagonist of Ossian took the field. This was Mr. Malcolm Laing, author of a History of Scotland. To that history he added an elaborate dissertation, in which he skillfully investigated the claim of the poems to antiquity. The principal grounds on which he decided against it were, the many false and inaccurate allusions to the history of Britain, while the country was under the dominion of the Romans; the flagrant difference between Highland manners, as described in the poems and by historians; the many palpable imitations from the classics and the Scriptures; the resemblance which the strains of the pretended Ossian bore to the Highlander, one of Macpherson's acknowledged compositions; and, lastly, certain startling expressions used in print by Macpherson, which seemed almost to render it certain that he was not the translator, but the author, of the works which he had given to the world under the name of Ossian.

Anxious that the truth should be elicited on a subject so interesting to them as their national poetry, the Highland Society had already, as far back as 1797, appointed a committee to inquire into the nature and authenticity of Ossian's poems. Mr. Laing's Dissertation, of which a second edition was published in 1804, seems to have quickened the movements of the committee. To assist in elucidating the subject, a series of queries was circulated throughout the Highlands and the Scottish islands. The series consists of six articles, of which the first is the most important. "Have you ever heard repeated, or sung, any of the poems ascribed to Ossian, translated by Mr. Macpherson? By whom have you heard them so repeated, and at what time or times? Did you ever commit any of them to writing, or can you remember them so well as to set them down?" The same answer was requested as to any other ancient poems of the same kind; and the committee likewise expressed a wish to obtain as much information as possible "with regard to the traditional belief of the country concerning the history of Fingal and his followers, and that of Ossian and his poems."

It was not till 1810 that the society published the result of the inquiry which it had set on foot. The answers to the queries were certainly by no means satisfactory. The report, which was drawn up by Henry Mackenzie, stated that the committee had directed its inquiry to two points: First, what poetry, of what kind, and of what degree of excellence, existed anciently in the Highlands of Scotland, which was generally known by the denomination of Ossianic; and, secondly, how far that collection of such poetry, published by Mr. James Macpherson, is genuine. On the first point the committee spoke decidedly. It declared its firm conviction that such poetry did exist; that it was common, general, and in great abundance; that it was of a most striking and impressive sort, in a high degree eloquent, tender, and sublime. On the second point there was a woful falling off in confident assertion. "The committee," says the reporter, "is possessed of no documents to show how much of his collection Mr. Macpherson obtained in the form in which he has given it to the world. The poems, and fragments of poems, which the committee has been able to procure, contain, as will appear from the article in the Appendix, No. 15, often the substance, and sometimes almost the literal expression, (the ipsissima verba,) of passages given by Mr. Macpherson in the poems of which he has published the translations. But the committee has not been able to obtain one poem the same in title and tenor with the poems published by him. It is inclined to believe that he was in use to supply chasms, and to give connection, by inserting passages which he did not find, and to add what he conceived to be dignity and delicacy to the original composition, by striking out passages, by softening incidents, by refining the language; in short, by changing what he considered as too simple or rude for a modern ear, and elevating.

what, in his opinion, was below the standard of good poetry. To what degree, however, he exercised these liberties, it is impossible for the committee to determine. The advantages he possessed, which the committee began its inquiries too late to enjoy, of collecting from the oral recitations of a number of persons, now no more, a very great number of the same poems, on the same subjects, and then collating those different copies, or editions, if they may be so called, rejecting what was spurious or corrupted in one copy, and adopting, from another, something more general and excellent in its place, afforded him an opportunity of putting together what might fairly enough be called an original whole, of much more beauty, and with fewer blemishes, than the committee believe it now possible for any one person, or combination of persons, to obtain."

1310. REGNIER DESMARAIS.

The Abbé Regnier Desmarnais, having written an ode, or, as the Italians call it, canzone, sent it to the Abbé Strozzi at Florence, who used it to impose on three or four academicians of Della Crusca. He gave out that Leo Allatius, librarian of the Vatican, in examining carefully the manuscripts of Petrarch preserved there, had found two pages slightly glued, which having separated, he had discovered this ode. The fact was not at first easily credited; but afterwards the similarity of style and manner rendered it highly probable. When Strozzi deceived the public, it procured the Abbé Regnier a place in the academy, as an honorable testimony of his ingenuity.

1311. BRYAN EDWARDS.

The case of Bryan Edwards, who composed the first accounts of Mungo Park, is one of evident fraud. Bryan Edwards, whose personal interests were opposed to the abolishment of the slave trade, would not suffer any passage to stand in which the African traveller had expressed his conviction of its inhumanity. Park, among confidential friends, frequently complained that his work did not only not contain his opinions, but was even interpolated with many which he utterly disclaimed.

1312. STEEVENS'S FRAUD UPON MILTON.

One of the sort of inventions attributed to Steevens was got up with a deal of romantic effect, to embellish the poetical life of Milton; and unquestionably must have sadly perplexed his last matter-of-fact editor, who is not a man to comprehend a flimflam; for he has sanctioned the whole fiction, by preserving it in his biographical narrative. The first impulse of Milton to travel in Italy is ascribed to the circumstance of his having been found asleep at the foot of a tree in the vicinity of Cambridge, when two foreign ladies, attracted by the loveliness of the youthful poet, alighted from their carriage, and having admired him for some time, as they imagined, unperceived, the youngest, who was very beautiful, drew a pencil from her pocket, and, having written some lines, put the paper with her trembling hand into his own. But it seems — for something was to account how the sleeping youth could have been aware of these minute particulars, unless he had been dreaming them — that the ladies had been observed at a distance by some friends of Milton, and they explained to him the whole silent adventure.

Milton, on opening the paper, read four verses from Guarini, addressed to those "human stars," his own eyes. On this romantic adventure, Milton set off for Italy, to discover the fair "incognita," to which undiscovered lady, we are told, we stand indebted for the most impassioned touches in the Paradise Lost. We know how Milton passed his time in Italy, with Dati, and Gaddi, and Frescobaldi, and other literary friends, amidst its academies, and often busied in book-collecting. Had Milton's tour in Italy been an adventure of knight-errantry, to discover a lady whom he had never seen, at least he had not the merit of going out of the direct road to Florence and Rome, nor of having once alluded to this dame de ses pensées, in his letters or inquiries among his friends, who would have thought themselves fortunate to have introduced so poetical an adventure in the numerous canzoni they showered on our youthful poet.

This historiette, scarcely fitted for a novel, first appeared where generally Steevens's literary amusements were carried on — in the General Evening Post, or the St. James's Chronicle; and Mr. Todd, in the improved edition of Milton's Life, obtained this spurious original, where the reader may find it.

1313. ARCH DECEPTION OF GEORGE STEEVENS.

If we possessed the secret history of the literary life of George Steevens, it would display an unparalleled series of arch deception and malicious ingenuity. He has been happily characterized by Mr. Gifford as "the Puck of commentators." Steevens loved to assist the credulous in getting up for them some strange, new thing, dancing them about with a will o' the wisp; now alarming them by a shriek of laughter, and now, like a grinning Pigwigin, sinking them chin-deep into a quagmire. Once he presented them with a fictitious portrait of Shakspeare; and when the brotherhood were sufficiently divided in their opinions, he pounced upon them with a demonstration, that every portrait of Shakspeare partook of the same doubtful authority.

The marvellous narrative of the upas tree of Java, which Darwin adopted in his plan of "enlisting imagination under the banner of science," appears to have been another forgery which amused our "Puck." It was first given in the London Magazine, as an extract from a Dutch traveller; but the extract was never discovered in the original author, and "the effluvia of this noxious tree, which through a district of twelve or fourteen miles had killed all vegetation, and had spread the skeletons of men and animals, affording a scene of melancholy beyond what poets have described or painters delineated," is perfectly chimerical — a splendid flimflam.

FRIENDSHIPS.

§ 130. COMMENCEMENT AND ORIGIN.

1314. LANGTON, BEAUCLERC, AND JOHNSON.

Bennet Langton and Topham Beauclerc were members of the "Literary Club originated by Sir Joshua Reynolds." They were doubtless induced to join the club through their devotion to Johnson; and the intimacy of these two very young and aristocratic young men with the stern and somewhat melancholy moralist is among the curiosities of literature.

Bennet Langton was of an ancient family, who held their ancestral estate of Langton in Lincolnshire, a great title to respect with Johnson. "Langton, sir," he would say, "has a grant of free-warren from Henry II.; and Cardinal Stephen Langton, in King John's reign, was of this family."

Langton was of a mild, contemplative, enthusiastic nature. When but eighteen years of age, he was so delighted with reading Johnson's Rambler, that he came to London chiefly with a view to obtain an introduction to the author. Boswell gives us an account of his first interview, which took place in the morning. It is not often that the personal appearance of an author agrees with the preconceived ideas of his admirer. Langton, from perusing the writings of Johnson, expected to find him a decent, well-dressed, in short a remarkably decorous philosopher; instead of which, down from his bed-chamber about noon, came, as newly risen, a large, uncouth figure, with a little dark wig which scarcely covered his head, and his clothes hanging loose about him. But his conversation was so rich, so animated, and so forceful, and his religious and political notions so congenial with those in which Langton had been educated, that he conceived for him that veneration and attachment which he ever preserved.

Langton went to pursue his studies at Trinity College, Oxford, where Johnson saw much of him during a visit which he paid to the university. He found him in close intimacy with Topham Beauclerc, a youth two years older than himself, very gay and dissipated, and wondered what sympathies could draw two young men together of such opposite characters. On becoming acquainted with Beauclerc, he found that, rake though he was, he possessed an ardent love of literature, an acute understanding, polished wit, innate gentility, and high aristocratic breeding.

1315. GOLDSMITH, HOGARTH, AND REYNOLDS.

Among the intimates who used to visit the poet Goldsmith occasionally, in his retreat at Islington, was Hogarth, the painter. Goldsmith had spoken well of him in his essays in the Public Ledger, and this formed the first link in their friendship. He was at this time upwards of sixty years of age, and is described as a stout, active, bustling little man, in a sky-blue coat, satirical and dogmatic, yet full of real benevolence and the love of human nature. He was the moralist and philosopher of the pencil; like Goldsmith, he had sounded the depths of vice and misery, without being polluted by them; and though his picturings had not the pervading amenity of those of the essayist, and dwelt more on the crimes and vices than the follies and humors of mankind, yet they were all calculated, in like manner, to fill the mind with instruction and precept, and to make the heart better.

Hogarth does not appear to have had much of the rural feeling with which Goldsmith was so amply endowed, and may not have accompanied him in his strolls about ledges and green lanes; but he was a fit companion with whom to explore the mazes of London, in which he was continually on the lookout for character and incident.

A frail memorial of this intimacy between the painter and the poet exists in a portrait in oil, called Goldsmith's Hostess. It is supposed to have been painted by Hogarth in the course of his visits to Islington, and given by him to the poet as a means of paying his landlady. There are no friendships among men of talents more likely to be sincere than those between painters and poets. Possessed of the same qualities of mind, governed by the same principles of taste and natural laws of grace and beauty, but applying them to different yet mutually illustrative arts, they are constantly in sympathy, and never in collision with each other.

A still more congenial intimacy of the kind was that contracted by Goldsmith with Mr., afterwards Sir Joshua Reynolds. The latter was now about forty years of age, a few years older than the poet, whom he charmed by the blandness and benignity of his manners, and the nobleness and generosity of his disposition, as much as he did by the graces of his pencil and the magic of his coloring. They were men of kindred genius, excelling in corresponding qualities of their several arts, for style in writing is what color is in painting; both are innate endowments, and equally magical in their effects. Certain graces and harmonies of both may be acquired by diligent study and imitation, but only in a limited degree, whereas by their natural possessors they are exercised spontaneously, almost unconsciously, and with ever-varying fascination. Reynolds soon understood and appreciated the merits of Goldsmith, and a sincere and lasting friendship ensued between them.

1316. JOHNSON AND GOLDSMITH.

Dr. Johnson, on the 31st of May, 1761, was to make his appearance as a guest at a literary supper given by Goldsmith to a numerous party, at his new lodgings in Wine Office Court. It was the opening of their acquaintance. Johnson had felt and acknowledged the merit of Goldsmith as an author, and been pleased by the honorable mention made of himself in the Bee and the Chinese Letters. Dr. Percy called upon Johnson to take him to Goldsmith's lodgings: he found Johnson arrayed with unusual care, in a new suit of clothes, a new hat, and a well-powdered wig, and could not but notice his uncommon spruceness. "Why, sir," replied Johnson, "I hear that Goldsmith, who is a very great slob, justifies his disregard of cleanliness and decency by quoting my practice, and I am desirous this night to show him a better example."

The acquaintance thus commenced ripened into intimacy in the course of frequent meetings at the shop of Davies, the bookseller, in Russell Street, Covent Garden, one of the great literary gossiping places of the day, especially to the circle over which Johnson presided.

As the two authors became more and more acquainted, their esteem for each other strengthened. Johnson was one of Goldsmith's best friends and advisers. He knew all the weak points of his character, but he knew also his merits; and while he would rebuke him like a child, and rail at his errors and follies, he would suffer no one else to undervalue him. Goldsmith knew the soundness of his judgment and his practical benevolence, and often sought his counsel and aid, amid the difficulties into which his heedlessness was continually plunging him.

"I received one morning," says Johnson, "a message from poor Goldsmith that he was in great distress, and, as it was not in his power to come to me, begging that I would come to him as soon as possible. I sent him a guinea, and promised to come to him directly. I accordingly went as soon as I was dressed, and found that his landlady had arrested him for his rent, at which he was in a violent passion. I perceived that he had already changed my guinea, and had a bottle of Madeira and a glass before him. I put the cork into the bottle, desired he would be calm, and began to talk to him of the means by which he might be extricated. He then told me he had a novel ready for the press, which he produced to me. I looked into it, and saw its merit; told the landlady I should soon return; and, having gone to a bookseller, sold it for sixty pounds. I brought Goldsmith the money, and he discharged his rent, not without rating his landlady in a high tone for having used him so ill."

The novel in question was the Vicar of Wakefield. The bookseller to whom Johnson sold it was Francis Newbery, nephew to John. Strange as it may seem, this captivating work, which has obtained and preserved an almost unrivalled popularity in various languages, was so little appreciated by the bookseller, that he kept it by him nearly two years unpublished.

FRIENDSHIPS, LITERARY.

§ 131. INTERESTING EXHIBITIONS.

1317. MILTON, GRAY, AND OTHERS.

MILTON has not only given the exquisite Lycidas to the memory of a young friend, but in his Epitaphium Damonis, to that of Deodatus, has poured forth some interesting sentiments. These alone, had we no other evidence of the kind, would demonstrate to the most careless reader, that his heart was formed for friendship. The Epitaphium has been versified by Langhorne. "Now," says the poet,—

"To whom shall I my hopes and fears impart,
Or trust the cares and foibles of my heart?"

The sonnet of Gray to the memory of West is a beautiful effusion, and a model for English sonnets.

Helvetius was the protector of men of genius, whom he assisted not only with his criticism, but his fortune. At his death, Saurin read in the French Academy an epistle to the manes of his friend. Saurin, wrestling with obscurity and poverty, had been drawn into literary existence by the supporting hand of Helvetius. Our poet thus addresses him in the warm tones of gratitude:—

"C'est toi qui me cherchant au sein de l'infortune
Relevas mon sort abattu,
Et sous mon rendre cher, une vie importune.

*Qu'important ces pleurs —
O douleur impuissante! O regrets superflus!
Je vis, hélas! Je vie, et mon ami n'est plus!"*

IMITATED.

"In misery's haunts thy friend thy bounties seize.
And give an urgent life some days of ease;
Ah, ye vain griefs, superfluous tears I chide;
I live, alas! I live—and thou hast died!"

1318. COWLEY AND HARVEY.

Among the most fascinating effusions of genius are those little pieces which it consecrates to the cause of friendship. In that poem of Cowley, composed on the death of his friend Harvey, the following stanza presents a pleasing picture of the employments of two young students:—

"Say, for ye saw us, ye immortal lights,
How oft, unwearied, have we spent the nights!
Till the Lædan stars, so fated for love,
Wondered at us from above.

"We spent them not in toys, in lust, or wine;
But search of deep philosophy,
Wit, eloquence, and poetry,
Arts which I loved; for they, my friend, were thine."

1319. BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.

That perfect unity of feeling, that making of two individuals but one being, is displayed in such memorable friendship as that of Beaumont and Fletcher; whose labors were so combined that no critic can detect the mingled production of either, and whose lives were so closely united, that no biographer can compose the memoirs of the one without running into the life of the other. Their days were as closely interwoven as their verses.

1320. CLOSE ATTACHMENT.

Metastasio and Farinelli were born about the same time, and early acquainted. They called one another Gemello, or twin. Both the delight of Europe, both lived to an advanced age, and died nearly at the same time. Their fortunes bore, too, a resemblance; for they were both pensioned, but lived and died separated in the distant courts of Vienna and Madrid.

1321. QUEER MAXIM OF MARIGNY.

Ménage mentions that when Marigny contracted a friendship with him, he told him he was upon his nail. It was a method he had of speaking to all his friends; he also used it in his letters; one which he wrote to Ménage begins thus: "O! illustrious of my nail."

When Marigny said to any one, You are upon my nail, he meant two things—one, that the person was always present, nothing being more easy than to look at his nail; the other was, that good and real friends were so scarce, that even he who had the most might write their names on his nail.

1322. FRIENDLY RIVALSHIP.

Montaigne and Charron were rivals, but always friends. Such was Montaigne's affection for Charron, that he permitted him by his will to bear the full arms of his family; and Charron evinced his gratitude to the manes of his departed friend, by leaving his fortune to the sister of Montaigne, who had married Poggius.

Forty years of friendship, uninterrupted by rivalry or envy, crowned the lives of Poggius and Leonard Arctin, two of the illustrious revivers of letters.

1323. ST. PIERRE'S GENEROSITY.

The Abbé de St. Pierre gave an interesting proof of literary friendship. When he was at college, he formed a union with Varignon, the geometer. They were of congenial dispositions. When he went to Paris, he invited Varignon to accompany him; but Varignon had nothing, and the abbé was far from rich. A certain income was necessary for the tranquil pursuits of geometry. Our abbé had an income of eighteen hundred livres; from this he deducted three hundred, which he gave to the geometer, accompanied by a delicacy which few but a man of genius could conceive. "I do not give it to you," he said, "as a salary, but an annuity, that you may be independent, and quit me when you dislike 1324. MAGNANIMITY OF BAYLE.

Jurien denounced Bayle as an impious writer, and drew his conclusions from the Avis aux Réfugiés. This work is written against the Calvinists, and therefore becomes impious in Holland. Bayle might have exculpated himself with facility, by declaring the work was composed by La Roque; but he preferred to be persecuted, rather than to ruin his friend; he therefore was silent, and was condemned.

1325. RARE LITERARY ATTACHMENTS.

The literary friendship of a father with his son is one of the rarest alliances in the republic of letters. It was gratifying to the feelings of young Gibbon, in the fervor of literary ambition, to dedicate his first fruits to his father. The too lively son of Crebillon, though his was a very different genius to the grandeur of his father's, yet dedicated his works to him, and for a moment put aside his wit and railery for the pathetic expressions of filial veneration.

We have had a remarkable instance in the two Richardsons; and the father, in his original manner, has, in the most glowing language, expressed his affectionate sentiments. He says, "My time of learning was employed in business; but, after all, I have the Greek and Latin tongues, because a part of me possesses them, to whom I can recur at pleasure, just as I have a hand when I would write or paint, feet to walk, and eyes to see. My son is my learning, as I am that to him which he has not. We make one man, and such a compound man may probably produce what no single man can." And further, "I always think it my peculiar happiness to be as it were enlarged, expanded, made another man by the acquisition of my son; and he thinks in the same manner concerning my union with him." This is as curious as it is uncommon; however the cynic may call it egotism.

§ 132. THEIR INFLUENCE AND RESULTS.

1326. GENEROUS AFFECTION.

How pathetically Erasmus mourns over the death of his beloved Sir Thomas More!—"In Moro mihi videtur extinctus," ("I seem to see myself extinct in More.") It was a melancholy passage of his own death, which shortly after followed. The Doric sweetness and simplicity of old Izaak Walton, the angler, were reflected in a mind as clear and generous, when Charles Cotton continued the feelings, rather than the little work, of Walton. Goguet, the author of the Origin of the Arts and Sciences, bequeathed his manuscripts and his books to his friend Fugere, with whom he had long united his affections and his studies, that his surviving friend might proceed with them; but the author had died of a slow and painful disorder, while Fugere had watched by the side of his dying friend, in silent despair. The sight of those manuscripts and books was his death-stroke; half his soul, which had once given them animation, was parted from him, and a few weeks terminated his own days. When Loyd heard of the death of Churchill, he neither wished to survive him nor did.

1327. REMARKABLE AFFECTION.

The friendship between Montaigne and Etienne de la Boetie was remarkable. The account of it is given by Montaigne himself. "The greatest man I ever knew," he writes, "was Etienne de la Boetie. His was indeed a soul full of perfections, a soul of the old stamp, and which would have produced great effects had fate permitted, having by learning and study added greatly to his rich natural gifts. We sought each other," he writes, "before we met, on account of what we heard of each other, which influenced our inclinations more than there seems to have been reason for, I think through a command of Heaven. We, as it were, embraced each other's names; and at our first meeting, which was by chance, and at a large assembly, we found ourselves so drawn together, so known to each other, that nothing hereafter was nearer than we were, one to the other. He wrote a beautiful Latin poem to excuse the precipitation of our intimacy, which so promptly arrived at its perfection. As it was destined to last so short a time, and began so late, — for we were both arrived at manhood, and he was several years the elder, — it had no time to lose; it could not regulate itself by slow and regular friendships, which require the precaution of a long prelude acquaintance. Ours had no idea foreign to itself, and could refer to itself alone; it did not depend on one special cause, nor on two, nor three, nor four, nor a thousand, but was the quintessence of all which seized on my will, and forced it to merge and lose his in mine, with equal desire and eagerness. I use the word lose as the proper one, for we neither reserved any thing that was not common to both. Our souls mingled so entirely, and penetrated with such ardent affection into the very essence of each other, that not only was I as well acquainted with his as with my own, but certainly I should have more readily trusted him with myself. This attachment must not be put in the same rank with common friendships. I have known the most perfect of a slighter kind; and, if the rules are confounded, people will deceive themselves. In other friendships you must proceed bridle in hand; in the more exalted one, the offices and benefits which support our intimacies do not deserve even to be named. The perfect union of the friends causes them to hate and banish all those words that imply division and difference, such as benefit, obligation, gratitude, entreaty, thanks, and the like. All is in common with them; and if, in such a friendship, one could give to the other, it would be him who received that would benefit his companion. Menander pronounced him happy who should meet only with the shadow of such a friend: he was right; for if I compare the rest of my life, though, with the blessing of God, I have passed it agreeably and peacefully, and, save from the loss of such a friend, exempt from any poignant affliction, with a tranquil mind, having taken the good that came to me originally and naturally, without seeking others, — yet, if I compare the whole of it, I say, with the four years during which it was given me to enjoy the dear society of this person, it is mere smoke; it is a dark and wearisome night. I have dragged it out painfully since I lost him; and the very pleasures that have offered themselves to me, instead of consoling, doubled the sense of my loss. We used to share every thing, and methinks I rob him of his portion. I was so accustomed to be two in every thing, that I seem now but half of myself. There is no action nor idea that does not present the thought of the good he would have done me, for, as he surpassed me infinitely in every talent and virtue, so did he in the duties of friendship."

1328. MADAME DE LAFAYETTE AND ROCHEFOUCAULD.

Rochefoucauld's best and dearest friend was Madame de la Fayette, the authoress of La Princesse de Clèves, and other works that mark her excellent taste and distinguished talents. Madame de la Fayette was, in her youth, a pupil of Ménage and Rapin. She learned Latin under their tuition, and rose above her masters in the quickness of her comprehension. In general society she carefully concealed her acquirements. "She understood Latin," Segrias writes, "but she never allowed her knowledge to appear, so as not to excite the jealousy of other women." She was intimately allied to all the clever men of the time, and respected and loved by them. She was a woman of a strong mind, witty and discerning, frank, kind-hearted, and true. Rochefoucauld owed much to her, while she had obligations to him. Their friendship was of mutual benefit. "He gave me intellect," said she, "and I reformed his heart."

1329. GOGUET AND FUGERE.

The learned Goguet bequeathed his manuscripts and library to his friend Fugere, with whom he had united his affections and his studies. His work on the Origin of the Arts and Sciences had been much indebted to his aid. Fugere, who knew his friend to be past recovery, preserved a mute despair, during his slow and painful disease, and on the death of Goguet, the victim of sensibility perished amidst the manuscripts which his friend had in vain bequeathed to prepare for publication.

1330. HERDER AND GOETHE.

It was at Strasburg Herder became acquainted with Goethe, who was then a student of law at Strasburg. Goethe attributes great value to this acquaintance in his autobiography, and makes much of Herder's influence on his mind and character at that forming period of his life. "I might count myself fortunate," he says, "that by an unexpected acquaintance, whatever of self-complacency, of self-mirroring, of vanity, pride, and high-mindedness might slumber or work in me, was subjected to a very severe trial which was unique in its kind, by no means proportionate to the time, but so much the more penetrating and sensible.

"For the most significant occurrence, and that which was to have the most important consequences for me, was an acquaintance and a consequent nearer connection with Herder. He had accompanied the Prince of Holstein-Eutin, who was afflicted with melancholy, in his travels, and had come with him as far as Strasburg. Our society, as soon as they were aware of his presence, felt an earnest desire to approach him; and this gratification happened to me first in a quite unexpected and accidental manner. I had gone to the hotel Zum Geist, to visit I know not what distinguished stranger. At the foot of the stairs I met a man who was also on the point of ascending, and whom I might have taken for a clergyman. His powdered hair was rolled up into a round lock; a black dress likewise distinguished him, but still more a long black silk mantle, the end of which he had gathered together and thrust into his pocket. This somewhat striking, but, on the whole, gentlemanly and agreeable appearance, of which I had already heard speak, left me no doubt that he was the celebrated arrival, and my address must have convinced him at once that I knew who he was. He asked my name, which could be of no importance to him; but my frankness appeared to please him, for he responded to it with great kindness, and, as we ascended the stairs together, showed himself ready at once for a lively communication. It has escaped me whom we then visited. Enough, at parting, I begged permission to call upon him at his lodgings, which he accorded to me in a manner sufficiently friendly. I did not fail to avail myself repeatedly of this permission, and was more and more attracted by him. He had somewhat gentle in his carriage that was exceedingly fitting and graceful, without being exactly adrett—a round face, a significant brow, a somewhat blunt nose, a somewhat prominent, but highly individual, agreeable, amiable mouth, under black eyebrows a pair of coal-black eyes, which did not fail of their effect, although one of them was wont to be red and inflamed. By manifold questions he sought to make himself acquainted with me and my condition, and his power of attraction operated even more strongly upon me. I was generally of a confiding nature, and for him, especially, I had no secret. But it was not long before the repellent pulse of his nature came in and occasioned me no little discomfort.

"Herder had now separated himself from the prince, and removed to quarters of his own, resolved to submit himself to an operation by Lobstein. Here I found the benefit of those exercises by which I had endeavored to blunt my sensitiveness. I was able to assist at the operation, and, in various ways, to be helpful and serviceable to so worthy a man. I had every reason to admire his great fortitude and patience; for neither under the various wounds inflicted by the surgeon, nor under the oft-repeated painful bandage, did he manifest the least vexation; and he appeared to be the one among us who suffered the least. But then, in the intervals, we had to bear in various ways the mutations of his humor.

"Herder could be most sweetly engaging and genial; but he could as easily also turn forth a vexatious side.

"During the whole time of this cure, I visited Herder morning and evening; I also remained with him sometimes the whole day, and accustomed myself in a short time to his chiding and fault-finding, the rather that I learned every day to estimate more highly his great and beautiful qualities, his extended knowledge, and his deep insight. The influence of this good-natured grumbler was great and important. He was five years older than I, which makes a great difference in our younger days; and since I acknowledged him for what he was, since I knew how to value what he had already produced, he necessarily acquired a great superiority over me. But the relation was not an agreeable one. Older people, with whom I had hitherto conversed, had spared me while endeavoring to educate me; perhaps they had spoiled me by their yieldingness; but no approbation was ever to be had from Herder, whatever pains one might take to obtain it. While, therefore, on the one hand, my great attachment and reverence for him, and on the other, the discomfort which he awakened in me, forever contended together, there arose in me a contradiction, the first in its kind I had ever experienced. As his conversations were always significant, whether asking or answering, or in whatever way he imparted himself, it could not fail that I should be daily and hourly led on by him to new views.

"During so vexatious and painful a cure, our Herder lost nothing of his vivacity; but that vivacity grew ever less beneficent. He could not write a note containing a request, without spicing it with some kind of jeer. Thus, for example, he wrote to me once,—

"If the epistles of Brutus thou hast in Cicero's Letters, Thou whom, from well polished shelves, the school-com-solers — the classics Comfort in splendid editions; but outwardly rather than inly; —
Thou who from Gods or from Goths, or, it may be, from mud art descended,
Goethe send them to me."

"To be sure, it was not handsome that he allowed himself this jest with my name; for the proper name of a man is not like a cloak, which merely hangs round him, and at which one can pluck and twitch, but a close-fitting garment; nay, it is something which grows to him like the skin itself, and which cannot be scratched or wounded without injury to himself.

"On the other hand, the preceding reproof was better founded. I had taken the authors which I had received in exchange from Langer, together with some beautiful editions out of my father's collection, with me to Strasburg, and arranged them in a neat book-case, with the best intention to use them. But how should the time which was broken into fragments by a hundred different kinds of activity suffice for this? Herder, who was a great observer of books, because he needed them every moment, noticed my beautiful collection on his first visit; but he noticed, too, that I made no use of it; wherefore, as the greatest enemy of all seeming and ostentation, he used, with every occasion, to twit me on that point."

1331. MENDELSSOHN AND LESSING.

At fourteen we find Mendelssohn an adventurer at Berlin, without the means of procuring a single meal. In his distress he applied to Rabbi Frankel, who had been his teacher at Dessau; "and there he happened to meet with Mr. Hyam Bamberg, a benevolent man, and an encourager of aspiring young Jews, who allowed him, on the rabbi's intercession, an attic to sleep in, and two days' board, weekly." His first object was not to get a living, but to get an education. He had come to Berlin for this purpose, and to this he devoted several successive years of intense application, under all the difficulties and discouragements which may be supposed to hamper a youth so circumstanced; without teachers, without books, with seldom enough to satisfy his hunger, and to whom a belly-full was, as Lamb says, "a special providence." The manner in which he studied Latin illustrates his indomitable energy in the pursuit of knowledge. Having mastered the nouns and the verbs, and procured an old second-hand dictionary, he set himself to translate into Latin Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding—a task which he actually accomplished at that early stage of his progress, fighting his way through difficulties, metaphysical and philological, with a painful laboriousness unknown out of Germany in modern times.

His only means of support during this period, in addition to the charity of Herr Bamberg, was an occasional grochen obtained by copying Hebrew for his old master. He subsisted principally on dry brown bread; and when purchasing a loaf, "he would notch it, according to the standard of his means, into so many meals; never eating according to his appetite, but according to his finances."

In this way he spent several years of hardship and suffering, during which, however, he had, by dint of incredible exertions, made himself thoroughly acquainted with the principal language and the mathematics. But now a kind Providence led him to one Lessing, a wealthy manufacturer, of the Jewish faith, who received him into his house as the tutor of his children, then into his counting-room as clerk, and finally into his silk-manufactory, first as manager, and soon after as partner. A new tide in his affairs set in with this connection. An immediate support, not ample at first, but sufficient for his wants, was secured to him, and he now commenced his career as an author, devoting his days to business, and his nights to letters.

With Lessing, Mendelssohn formed an intimate friendship, from which he derived incalculable benefit in the way of literary and philosophic culture, and which he always regarded as among the most fortunate circumstances of his life. "Lessing loved Mendelssohn," says his biographer, "for his excellent heart and highly-cultivated understanding, and Mendelssohn was no less attached to Lessing, for his inflexible consistency and his transcendent abilities. A union founded on esteem and friendship was cemented between them, which neither time nor long separation — nothing indeed but death — could dissolve. The noble monument of their mutual affection, preserved to posterity in the latter pages of the Morgenstunden, will endure as long as virtue and science are cherished and cultivated among mankind." In Lessing, than whom no man was ever more free from the prejudices of creed and nation, Mendelssohn found a hearty sympathy and an effective fellow-laborer in his various projects for bettering the condition of the German Jews — an object which, then and at all times, lay nearest his heart. Indeed, the known friendship of so eminent a man for one of that tribe, in defiance of all the prejudices of his age, was scarcely less important to the Jews in general than it was to Mendelssohn in particular.

One of the first, perhaps the very first literary effort by which he became distinguished beyond the pale of his own communion, was his Philosophical Dialogues, a work which owed its origin to the following circumstances. Lessing once brought to Mendelssohn a work written by a celebrated character, to hear his opinion upon it. Having given it a reading, he told his friend that he deemed himself a match for the author, and would refute it. Nothing could be more welcome to Lessing and he strongly encouraged the idea. Accordingly, Mendelssohn sat down and wrote his Philosophical Dialogues, in which he strictly redeemed his pledge of confuting the author, and carried the manuscript to Lessing for examination. "When I am at leisure," said Lessing, "I will peruse it." After a convenient interval, he repeated his visit, when Lessing kept up a miscellaneous conversation, without once mentioning the manuscript in question; and the other, being too bashful to put him in mind of it, was obliged to depart. The same thing happened at several subsequent meetings. At last he mustered sufficient resolution to inquire after it. Want of leisure was pleaded, as before; but now "he would certainly read it. Mr. Mendelssohn might, in the mean while, take yonder small volume home with him, and let him know his opinion of it." On opening it, Mendelssohn was not a little surprised to see his own Dialogues in print. "Put it into your pocket," said Lessing, good-naturedly, "and this Mammon along with it. It is what I got for the copyright; it will be of service to you." He afterwards, at the instigation of Nicolai and Lessing, collected all his philosophical lucubrations, and published them under the title Philosophische Schriften. Three editions of this work, which appeared anonymously at first, but afterwards with the author's name, were exhausted in a short time.

§ 133. FRIENDSHIP INTERRUPTED.

1332. DR. JOHNSON AND HIS LANDLADY.

Several years were passed by Dr. Johnson in the family of Mr. and Mrs. Thrale; and the latter, who was a great admirer of "the lion of English literature," and much admired of him in return, gives us a little volume of anecdotes respecting him. The account of her rupture with the doctor, and separation from him, we give in her own language. "All these exactnesses, in a man who was nothing less than exact himself, made him extremely impracticable as an inmate, though most instructive as a companion and useful as a friend. Mr. Thrale, too, could sometimes overrule his rigidity, by saying coldly, 'There, there, now we have had enough for one lecture, Dr. Johnson; we will not be upon education any more till after dinner, if you please,' or some such speech; but when there was nobody to restrain his dislikes, it was extremely difficult to find any body with whom he could converse, without being always on the verge of a quarrel, or of something too much like a quarrel to be pleasing.

"I came into the room, for example, one evening, where he and a gentleman, whose abilities we all respect exceedingly, were sitting. A lady, who walked in two minutes before me, had blown 'em both into a flame, by whispering something to Mr. Seward, which he endeavored to explain away, so as not to affront the doctor, whose suspicions were all alive. 'And have a care, sir,' said he, just as I came in; 'the old lion will not bear to be tickled.' The other was pale with rage. The lady wept at the confusion she had caused; and I could only say, with Lady Macbeth, —

'You've displaced the mirth, broke the good meeting,
With most admired disorder.'

Such accidents, however, occurred too often, and I was forced to take advantage of my lost lawsuit, and plead inability of purse to remain longer in London or its vicinity. I had been crossed in my intentions of going abroad, and found it convenient, for every reason of health, peace, and pecuniary circumstances, to retire to Bath, where I knew Mr. Johnson would not follow me, and where I could, for that reason, command some little portion of time for my own use—a thing impossible while I remained at Streatham or at London, as my hours, carriage, and servants had long been at his command, who would not rise in the morning till twelve o'clock, perhaps, and oblige me to make breakfast for him till the bell rang for dinner, though much displeased if the toilet was neglected, and though much of the time we passed together was spent in blaming or deriding, very justly, my neglect of economy, and waste of that money which might make many families happy.

"The original reason of our connection, his particularly disordered health and spirits, had been long at an end, and he had no other ailments than old age and general infirmity, which every professor of medicine was ardently zealous and generally attentive to palliate, and to contribute all in their power for the promulgation of a life so valuable. Veneration for his virtue, reverence for his talents, delight in his conversation, and habitual endurance of a yoke my husband first put upon me, and of which he contentedly bore his share for sixteen or seventeen years, made me go on so long with Mr. Johnson; but the perpetual confinement I will own to have been terrifying in the first years of our friendship, and irksome in the last; nor could I pretend to support it without help, when my coadjutor was no more.

"To the assistance we gave him, the shelter our house afforded to his uneasy fancies, and to the pains we took to soothe or repress them, the world, perhaps, is indebted for the three political pamphlets, the new edition and correction of his Dictionary, and for the Poets' Lives, which he would scarce have lived, I think, and kept his faculties entire, to have written, had not incessant care been exerted at the time of his first coming to be our constant guest in the country; and several times after that, when he found himself particularly oppressed with diseases incident to the most vivid and fervent imaginations. I shall forever consider it as the greatest honor which could be conferred on any one to have been the confidential friend of Dr. Johnson's health, and to have in some measure, with Mr. Thrale's assistance, saved, from distress at least, if not from worse, a mind great beyond the comprehension of common mortals, and good beyond all hope of imitation from perishable creatures."

1333. GRAY AND WALPOLE.

"Gray," says Walpole, "was a Deist, but a violent enemy of atheists, such as he took Voltaire and Hume to be. The quarrel between Gray and me arose from his being too serious a companion. I had just broke loose from the restraints of the university, with as much money as I could spend, and I was willing to indulge myself. Gray was for antiquities, &c., while I was for perpetual balls and plays. The fault was mine."

1334. FREDERIC, KING OF PRUSSIA, AND VOLTAIRE.

In a fit of disgust with the favor shown to his rivals, and the distrust and indifference manifested towards him at the court of France, Voltaire at last accepted the reiterated invitations of Frederic the Great to take up his residence in Prussia. Frederic received his friend with transports of joy. His undisguised delight, his earnest request that he would exchange Paris for Berlin permanently, the charm that his talents spread over the poet's life, and the security he enjoyed, were all alluring. Frederic spared no professions of friendship, no mark of real personal attachment, more than once he kissed the poet's hand in a transport of admiration. This singular demonstration of affection from man to man, more singular from king to author, helped, with many others in addition, to enchain Voltaire. He himself assures us that they turned his head. "How could I resist," he writes, "a victorious king, a poet, a musician, a philosopher, who pretended to love me? I believe that I loved him. I arrived in Potsdam in the month of June, 1750. A-tolpcho was not better received in the palace of Alcina. To lodge in the apartment which the Marshal de Saxe had occupied, to have the king's cooks at my orders, when I chose to eat in my rooms, and his coachmen when I wished to drive out, were the least favors shown me. The suppers were delightful. Unless I deceive myself, the conversation was full of wit and genius. The king displayed both; and what is strange, I never at any repast enjoyed more freedom. I studied two hours a day with his majesty. I corrected his works, taking care to praise greatly all that was good, while I erased all that was bad. I gave him a reason in writing for all my emendations, which composed a work on rhetoric and poetry for his use. He profited by it, and his genius was of more service to him than my lessons. I had no court to pay, no visits to make, no duties to fulfil. I established myself on an independent footing, and I can conceive nothing more agreeable than my situation."

But the treaty of equal friendship between king and poet did not last long. Various petty provocations were given by both. We find neither the magnanimity of the hero in the one, nor the calmness of a philosopher in the other. Voltaire accordingly retired from Prussia.

§ 134. MISCELLANEOUS.

1335. AN ODD INTRODUCTION.

Wycherley was a very handsome man. His acquaintance with the Duchess of Cleveland commenced oddly enough. One day, as he passed that Duchess's coach in the ring, she leaned out of the window, and cried out loud enough to be heard distinctly by him, "Sir, you're a rascal; you're a villain." Wycherley, from that instant, entertained hopes. He did not fail waiting on her the next morning, and, with a very melancholy tone, begged to know how it was possible for him to have so much disoblighed her grace. They were very good friends from that time forth.

1336. MONTAIGNE AND HIS WARD.

One of the last events of Montaigne's life was his friendship with Mademoiselle Marie de Gournay le Jars, a young person of great merit, and afterwards esteemed one of the most learned and excellent ladies of the day, and honored by the abuse of pedants, who attacked her personal appearance and her age, in revenge for her transcending even their sex in accomplishments and understanding; while, on the other hand, she was regarded with respect and friendship by the first men of her time. She was very young when Montaigne first saw her, which happened during a long visit he made to Paris, after his mayorship at Bourdeaux was ended.

Having conceived an enthusiastic love and admiration of him from reading his essays, she called on him, and requested an acquaintance. He visited her and her mother at their Château de Gournay, and allied himself to her by adopting her as his daughter, and entertaining for her a warm affection and esteem. His picture of her is not only delightful, as a testimony of the merits of this young lady,* but a proof of the unfeeling enthusiasm and warmth of his own heart, which, even in suffering and decay, eagerly allied itself to kindred merit.

GRAMMAR AND GRAMMARIANS.

§ 135. HISTORICAL ITEMS.

1337. A VALUED RELIC.

In his remarks at the dedication of the Dana Hill School-house, in Cambridge, George Livermore, Esq., said he had had in his possession, within a week, an old worn school-book, bearing the name of the boy who used it more than a century ago. It was not larger than Colburn's Arithmetic, nor half as good looking a book; yet an offer of fifty dollars had been refused for it, and one hundred dollars could not buy it. It was George Washington's grammar.

coach, happened to confound the sex of it, by calling out "Ou est mon carrosse?" This was quite sufficient to stamp the word (carrosse) masculine, of which gender it has continued to the present moment. Ménage, who furnishes this anecdote, concludes by remarking, "Such a trifling, puerile error is not to be wondered at; but that a whole nation should adopt a change of gender, in compliment to it, is a palpable absurdity, of no common magnitude; only that when we reflect upon what courtiers are, the wonder ceases."

1338. CHANGING OF GENDER.

Who would think that the very gender of a substantive could be entirely changed, and forever, solely by the obsequiousness of courtiers? Louis XIV. came to the crown in 1643, at the age of five years; and soon afterwards, on inquiring for his

1339. THE TERM "WE."

The plural style of speaking ("we") among kings was begun by King John of England, A. D. 1119. Before that time sovereigns used the singular person in their edicts. The German and the French sovereigns followed the example of King John in 1200. When editors began to say "we" is not known.

§ 136. GRAMMATICAL BLUNDERS.

1340. WITTY RETORT.

Judge R., who presided in the county court of an American state, was fond of indulging himself occasionally in a joke at the expense of Counsellor B., a practising attorney in the same court, with whom he was very intimate, and for whom he had a high regard. On a certain occasion, when pleading a cause at the bar, Mr. B. observed that he would conclude his remarks on the following day, unless the court would consent to set late enough for him to finish them that evening. "S*it*, sir," said the judge, "not set: hens set." "I stand corrected, sir," said the counsellor, bowing. Not long after, while giving an opinion, the judge remarked that, under such circumstances, an action would not lay. "L*ie*, may it please your honor," said the counsellor; "not lay: hens lay."

1341. THE MAYOR'S DISCRIMINATION.

The mayor of a provincial town, conceiving that the word clause was in the plural number, always talked of a claw in an act of Parliament.

1342. SINGULAR USE OF THE ARTICLE.

A village parish clerk, who employed a grammarian to teach his daughter the syntax of her native tongue, heard him with much surprise define the use of the articles, a, an, and the. "You cannot place a, the singular article, before plural nouns—no one can say a houses, a horses, a ——" "Hold there," said the parish clerk; "I must contradict

* "J'ai pris plaisir de publier en plusieurs lieux l'espérance que j'ai de Marie de Gournay le Jars, ma fille d'alliance, et certes aimée de moi beaucoup plus que paternellement, et enveloppée en ma retraite et solitude comme l'une des meilleures parties de mon propre être: je ne regrette plus qu'elle au monde. Si l'adolescence peut donner présage, cette âme sera que que jour capable des plus belles choses et entre autre de la perfection de cette treisante amitié, ou nous ne lisons point que son sexe ait pu monter exorces: la modestie et la solidité de ses mœurs y sont déjà bastantes: son affection vers moi, plus que surabondante, et telle, en somme, qu'il n'y a rien a souhaiter, sinon que l'appréhension qu'elle a de moi fin par les cinquante et cinq ans auxquels elle m'arrivera, la travaillant moins cruellement. Le jugement qu'elle fait de mes premières Essais, et femme, et si jeune, et seule en son quartier, et la véhémence faineuse dont elle m'aime et me desira longtemps, sur la seule estime qu'elle en prims de moi, longtemps avant m'avoir me, sont des accidens de très digne considération."

you in that. Don't I at church every Sunday say a-men? and the Prayer-book knows better than you."

it ought to have been given. "For the correction of this one solecism," said he, "I give, besides my former gift, five thousand measures of corn more."

1343. MAGNANIMITY OF DEMETRIUS.

When Demetrius took Athens by assault, he found the inhabitants in extreme distress for want of corn. He called the principal citizens before him, and announced to them, in a speech full of humanity and conciliation, that he had ordered a large supply of grain to be placed at their free disposal. In the course of speaking, he chanced to commit an error in grammar; on which one of the Athenians immediately corrected him, by pronouncing aloud the phrase as 1344. ACTIVE AND PASSIVE VERBS.

A teacher, one day, endeavoring to make a pupil understand the nature and application of a passive verb, said, —

"A passive verb is expressive of the nature of receiving an action; as, Peter is beaten. Now, what did Peter do?"

"Well, I don't know," said the boy, pausing a moment, with the gravest countenance imaginable, "without he hollered!"

§ 137. HUMOROUS FACTS.

1345. A TENDER CONSCIENCE.

A parish priest was sent for to attend the death bed of a poor old village schoolmistress. She had a sin to confess; she could not die in peace till she had confessed it. With broken speech, she sobbed, and hesitated, and sobbed again. "I—I—I," she stammered out, and hid her face again. "There I must, I must tell it; and may I be forgiven! You know, sir, I have kept school forty years—a poor sinful creature—I—I——"

"My good woman," said the parish priest, "take comfort; it will be pardoned if you are thus penitent. I hope it is not a very great sin."

"O, yes," said she, "and pray call me not good woman. I am—not—good," (sobbing:) "alas! there, I will out with it. I put down that I taught grammar, and" (sobbing) "I—I did not know it myself!"

1346. WITTY REPLY.

Walter Scott does not seem to have been the fool at school which some have stated. Once, a boy in the same class was asked by the "dominic" what part of speech with was.

"A noun, sir," said the boy.

"You young blockhead," cried the pedagogue, "what example can you give of such a thing?"

"I can tell you, sir," interrupted Scott; "you know there's a verse in the Bible which says, 'they bound Samson with withs.'" 1347. THE RULE AND THE REASON.

Horne Tooke, when at Eaton, was one day asked by the master the reason why a certain verb governed a particular case. He answered, "I don't know." "That is impossible," said the master: "I know you are not ignorant, but obstinate." Horne, however, persisted, and the master flogged. After the punishment, the master quoted the rule of grammar which bore on the subject, and Horne instantly replied, "I know that very well, but you did not ask me for the rule,—you demanded the reason."

1348. HAPPY CONSOLATION.

When Dangeau, a Parisian author, heard that all rank and merit were threatened with destruction on the breaking out of the revolution, he exclaimed, "Well, come what will, I have two hundred verbs, well conjugated, in my escritoire."

1349. ETYMOLOGY WITH A VENGEANCE.

Johnson once made a bet with Boswell that he could go into the flesh market, and put a Bilingsgate woman in a passion without saying a word that she could understand. The doctor commenced by silently indicating with his nose that her fish had passed the state in which a man's olfactory could endure their flavor. The Bilingsgate lady made a verbal attack common in vulgar parlance, which impugned the classification in natural history of the doctor's mother. The doctor answered, "You are an article, madam." "No more an article than yourself, you b——y misbegotten villain." "You are a noun, woman." "You—you." "You—you." "You are a verb—an adverb—an adjective—a conjunction—a preposition—an interjection!" suddenly continued the doctor, applying the harmless epithets at proper intervals. The nine parts of speech completely conquered the old woman, and she dumped herself down in the mud, crying with rage at being thus "blackguarded" in a set of unknown terms, which not understanding, she could not answer.

HISTORY AND HISTORIANS.

§ 138. SUFFERINGS AND TRIALS OF HISTORIANS.

1350. STOWE A LICENSED BEGGAR

TOWE, the famous historian, devoted his life, and exhausted his patrimony, in the study of English antiquities; he travelled on foot throughout the kingdom, inspecting all the monuments of antiquity, and rescuing what he could from the dispersed libraries of the monasteries. His stupendous collection, in his own handwriting, still exists, to provoke the feeble industry of literary loiterers. He felt through life the enthusiasm of study, and seated himself in his monkish library, living with the dead more than with the living, he was still a student of taste, for Spenser, the poet, visited the library of Stowe, and the first good edition of Chaucer was made so chiefly by the labors of our author. Late in life, worn out by study and the cares of poverty, neglected by his friends, yet his good humor did not desert him; for, being afflicted with sharp pains in his feet, he observed that "his affliction lay in that part he had made so much use of." Many a mile had he wandered, many a pound had he yielded, for those treasures of antiquities which had exhausted his fortune, and with which he had formed works of great public utility. It was in his eightieth year that Stowe at length received a public acknowledgment of his services, which will appear to us of a very extraordinary nature. He was so reduced in his circumstances, that he petitioned James I. for a license to collect alms for himself! "as a recompense for his labor and travel of forty-five years in setting forth the Chronicles of England, and eight years taken up in the survey of the cities of London and Westminster, towards his relief now in his old age; having left his former means of living, and only employed himself for the service and good of his country." Letters patent under the great seal were granted. After a penurious commendation of Stowe's labors, he is permitted "to gather the benevolence of well-disposed people within this realm of England; to ask, gather, and take the alms of all our loving subjects." These letters patent were to be published by the clergy from the pulpits. They produced so little, that they were renewed for another twelvemonth; an entire parish in the city contributing seven shillings and sixpence! Such, then, was the patronage received by Stowe to be a licensed beggar throughout the kingdom for one twelvemonth! Such was the public remuneration of a man who had been useful to his nation, but not to himself!

1351. IMPRISONMENT OF RUSHWORTH.

It appears by the Harleian manuscripts, 1524, that Rushworth, the author of Historical Collections, passed the last years of his life in jail, where, indeed, he died. After the restoration, when he presented to the king several of the privy council's books, which he had preserved from ruin, he received for his only reward the thanks of his majesty.

1352. MISFORTUNES OF PRIDEAUX.

When the learned Prideaux was, for his adherence to the royal cause, so reduced in circumstances as to be obliged to sell his library for the means of support, he became, as Dr. Gauden remarked, literally a helluo librorum. He seems to have borne his misfortunes with patience, and even good humor. On one occasion, a friend came to see him, and asked how he did. He answered, "Never better in my life, only I have too great a stomach; for I have eaten the little plate which the sequestrators left me; I have eaten a great library of excellent books; I have eaten a great deal of linen; much of my brass; some of my pewter; and now am come to eat of my iron; and what will come next, I know not." Such was the treatment which this great and good man, one of the best scholars and ablest promoters of learning in the kingdom, experienced at the hands of men who professed to contend for liberty and toleration.

A singular circumstance is related of Prideaux's first rise in life. After he had learned to read and write, having a good voice, he stood candidate for the place of parish clerk of the Church of Ugborough, near Harford. Mr. Price informs us, that "he had a competitor for the office, who had made great interest in the parish for himself, and was likely to carry the place from him. The parishioners, being divided in the matter, did at length agree in this, being unwilling to disoblige either party, that the Lord's day following should be the day of trial; the one should tune the psalm in the forenoon, the other in the afternoon; and he that did best please the people should have the place; which accordingly was done, and Prideaux lost it, to his very great grief and trouble." When he was afterwards advanced to one of the first dignities of the church, he used often to say, "If I could but have been clerk of Ugborough, I had never been Bishop of Worcester."

1353. SMOLLETT.

Tobias George Smollett.

As a relief from literary labor, Smollett once went to revisit his family, and to embrace the mother he loved; but such were the irritation of his mind, and the infirmity of his health, exhausted by the hard labors of authorship, that he never passed a more weary summer, nor ever found himself so incapable of indulging the warmest emotions of his heart. On his return, in a letter, he gave this melancholy narrative of himself: "Between friends I am now convinced that my brain was in some measure affected; for I had a kind of coma vigil upon me from April to November, without intermission. In consideration of this circumstance, I know you will forgive all my peevishness and discontent. Tell Mrs. Moore that, with regard to me, she has as yet seen nothing but the wrong side of the tapestry."

Thus it happens in the life of authors, that they whose comic genius diffuses cheerfulness create a pleasure that they themselves participate.

The coma vigil may be described by a verse of Shakspeare: "Still waking sleep! that is not what it is!" "Of praise and censure," says Smollett, in a letter to Dr. Moore, "indeed I am sick of both, and wish to God my circumstances would allow me to consign my pen to oblivion."

1354. THE INDISCRETION OF AN HISTORIAN. THOMAS CARTE.

"Carte," says Mr. Hallam, "is the most exact historian we have;" and Danes Barrington prefers his authority to that of any other, and many other writers confirm this opinion. Yet, had this historian been an ordinary compiler, he could not have incurred a more mortifying fate; for he was compelled to retail in shilling numbers that invaluable history which we have only learned of late times to appreciate, and which was the laborious fruits of self-devotion.

When Carte's project of preparing and publishing his history was made known, a large subscription was raised to defray the expense of transcripts, and afford a sufficient independence to the historian. Many of the nobility and the gentry subscribed ten or twenty guineas annually, and several of the corporate bodies in the city honorably appeared as the public patrons of the literature of the nation. He had, perhaps, nearly a thousand a year subscribed, which he employed on the history. Thus every thing promised fair, both for the history and for the historian of our fatherland.

It was in 1743 that this work was projected: in 1747 the first volume appeared. One single act of indiscretion—an unlucky accident rather than a premeditated design—overturned in a moment this monument of history; for it proved that Carte, however enlarged were his views of what history ought to consist, and however experienced in collecting its most authentic materials, and accurate in its statement, was infected by a superstitious Jacobitism which seemed likely to spread itself through his extensive history. Carte indeed was no philosopher, but a very faithful historian.

Having, unhappily, occasion to discuss whether the King of England had, from the time of Edward the Confessor, the power of healing inherent in him before his unction, or whether the gift was conveyed by ecclesiastical hands, to show the efficacy of the royal touch, he added an idle story, which had come under his own observation, of a person who appeared to have been so healed. Carte said of this unlucky personage, so unworthily introduced five hundred years before he was born, that he had been sent to Paris to be touched by "the eldest lineal descendant of a race of kings who had indeed for a long succession of ages cured that distemper by the royal touch." The insinuation was unquestionably in favor of the pretender, although the name of the prince was not avowed, and was a sort of promulgation of the right divine to the English throne.

The first news our author heard of his elaborate history was the discovery of this unforeseen calamity; the public indignation was roused, and subscribers, public and private, hastened to withdraw their names. The historian was left forlorn and abandoned amid his extensive collections, and truth, which was about to be drawn out of her well by this robust laborer, was no longer imagined to lie concealed at the bottom of the waters.

1355. PERSECUTION OF GIANNONE.

Giannone's Civil History of the Kingdom of Naples is remarkable for its profound inquiries concerning the civil and ecclesiastical constitution, the laws and customs of that kingdom. With some interruptions from his professional avocations at the bar, twenty years were consumed in writing this history. Researches on ecclesiastical usurpations, and severe strictures on the clergy, are the chief subjects of his bold and unreserved pen. These passages, curious, grave, and indignant, were afterwards extracted from the history by Vernet, and published in a small volume, under the title of Anecdotes Ecclesiastiques, (1738.) When Giannone consulted with a friend on the propriety of publishing his history, his critic, in admiring the work, predicted the fate of the author. "You have," said he, "placed on your head a crown of thorns, and of very sharp ones." The historian set at naught his own personal repose; and in 1723 this elaborate history saw the light. From that moment the historian never enjoyed a day of quiet! Rome attempted at first to extinguish the author with his work, all the books were seized on, and copies of the first edition are of extreme rarity. To escape the fangs of inquisitorial power, the historian flew from Naples on the publication of his immortal work. The fugitive and excommunicated author sought an asylum at Vienna, where, though he found no friend in the emperor, Prince Eugene and other nobles became his patrons. Forced to quit Vienna, he retired to Venice, when a new persecution arose from the jealousy of the state inquisitors, who one night landed him on the borders of the pope's dominions. Escaping unexpectedly with his life to Geneva, he was preparing a supplemental volume to his celebrated history, when, enticed by a treacherous friend to a catholic village, Giannone was arrested by an order of the King of Sardinia, his manuscripts were sent to Rome, and the historian imprisoned in a fort. It is curious that the imprudent Giannone wrote a vindication of the rights of the King of Sardinia against the claims of the court of Rome. This powerful appeal to the feelings of this sovereign was at first favorably received, but, under the secret influence of Rome, the Sardinian monarch, on the extraordinary plea that he kept Giannone as a prisoner of state that he might preserve him from the papal power, ordered that the vindicator of his rights should be more closely confined than before, and, for this purpose, transferred his state prisoner to the citadel of Turin, where, after twelve years of persecution and of agitation, our great historian closed his life.

1356. EXILE OF BUCHANAN.

This illustrious scholar, compelled to fly from his own country by the blood-seeking animosity of a priestly cabal, whose vices he had made the theme of his satire, sought refuge and protection under Henry VIII. of England. His appeal to that monarch was couched in terms of great pathos and elegance. "Look not," said the poet, "with an unrelenting countenance upon the humble advances of a man whose soul is devoted to your service; one who, a beggar, a vagrant, and an exile, has endured every species of misfortune which a perfidious world can inflict. A savage host of inveterate enemies pursues him, and the palace of his sovereign resounds with their menaces. O'er mountains covered in snow, and valleys flooded with rain, I come a fugitive to the Athenian altar of Mercy, and, exhausted by calamities, cast myself at your feet." Alas! London was not the Athens the fugitive sought, nor Henry the Pericles, whose generosity was to succor him. But who can wonder, that, after sacrificing to the axe that beauty on which he once reposed with delight, neither the misfortunes of greatness nor the eloquence of genius should have been able to make the least impression on the heart of the savage Henry?

1357. HUME.

Hume one day complained, in a mixed company, that he considered himself as very ill treated by the world, by its unjust and unreasonable censures; adding that he had written many volumes, throughout the whole of which there were but a few pages that could be said to contain any reprehensible matter; and yet for those few pages he was abused and torn to pieces.

The company for some time paused; when at length a gentleman dryly observed, that he put him in mind of an old acquaintance, a notary public, who, having been condemned to be hanged for forgery, lamented the extreme injustice and hardship of his case, inasmuch as he had written many thousand inoffensive sheets; and now he was to be hanged for a single line.

1358. HYDE'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

Hyde, afterwards Lord Clarendon, wrote his history in very trying circumstances. He was devoted to the cause of Charles I., and during the times of the civil war, having the young Prince Charles under his protection, he sought safety for his charge in the Isle of Jersey. But Queen Henrietta having succeeded in getting the young prince away to France, Clarendon, who would not accompany him, was left behind as a sort of exile. He remained in a sequestered island above two years, having entirely sacrificed his profession, without office or employment, without the occupation and excitement now afforded by parliamentary opposition to the leaders of a discomfited party, even without the comforts and solaces of domestic life. But instead of indulging in dependency, or in idleness, or in frivolous amusements, he employed his time with well-directed industry and vigor, and he rendered his name immortal. Seeing that the struggle in which he had been engaged was the most important that had ever occurred in English history, and knowing that it must be interesting to all future generations of Englishmen, he had long resolved, for his own fair fame and for the benefit of his country, to become its historian. This purpose was strengthened as he saw the royal cause decline, from the apprehension that the domination of the opposite faction would taint the sources of historic truth. So intent had he become on his object, that he began his great work the moment he set his foot on the rock of Scilly; and he seriously applied himself to it amidst the distractions and difficulties of his short and anxious sojourn there,—in danger, if taken prisoner by the forces of Parliament, of being brought to trial as a malignant, and deeply occupied in counteracting the selfish plans of Queen Henrietta Maria, by which she was injuring the royal cause, and cutting off all hope of a happy settlement. Now, released from other engrossing duties, he earnestly and devotedly applied himself to his great undertaking, of which we can distinctly trace the progress as well as the commencement. He had with him original papers and memoranda, which he had been some time collecting, and he taxed his memory with great anxiety respecting events which had come under his own observation. He endeavored, by application in various quarters, to supply his deficiency of materials with respect to military operations and distant transactions. He wrote to Lord Witherington, the friend of the Marquis of Newcastle, entreating from both of them a narration of those affairs in which they had borne a part. From Lord Bristol he asked information respecting the treaty of Berwick, the great Council of the Peers at York, and that nobleman's own commitment by the Parliament. To Lord Digby he wrote, "I pray let your secretaries collect all material passages concerning Ireland you may think fit to impart to me. I would be glad you would yourself collect as many particulars of Count Harcourt's negotiation in England; of Duke Hamilton's commitment, and of the Marquis of Montrose's managing in Scotland, and many other things you imagine conducive to my work." He had great reliance on Secretary Nicholas, to whom he says, "You will, by all your diligence, intercourse, and dexterity, procure me such materials for my history as you know necessary, which I take to be so much your work that if I fail in it I will put marginal notes into the history that shall reproach you for your want of contribution. By your care I must be supplied with all the acts of countenance and confederacy which have passed from France, Holland, and Spain." His application to Colepepper is particularly interesting, from the allusion to Falkland, and the confidence which the writer displays in his own powers. After asking him for his recollections of Edge Hill, he says, "The like care I expect from you concerning the siege of Gloucester, the raising yt siege and retrete, the oversight there, the quick march after, and ye first battle of Newbury, where wee lost deareo Falkland, whom ye next age shall be taught to vaeue more than ye present did."

He thus communicated his intention to Charles I., now in the power of the Parliament, but allowed considerable liberty of correspondence, and still treated with respect: "I flatter myself with the opinion, that I am doing your majesty some service in this island, whilst I am preparing the story of your sufferings, that posterity may tremble at the reading of what the present age blushes not to execute." The king took the most lively interest in the work, and contributed a narrative of all important matters between the time when Hyde quitted Oxford to attend the prince in the west, and of the king's own escape to the Scottish camp. The expectation of further assistance from the same quarter was disappointed, as we learn from a letter from Hyde, in December, 1647, in which he says, "Your majesty's sudden remove from Hampden Court hath for the present taken away the opportunity of deriving those materials which your majesty graciously intimated by Mr. Secretary Nicholas you intended for me, which renewed my courage when I was even ready to faint for want of some supply." But from Prince Charles he unexpectedly received useful memorials of the campaigns of Prince Rupert.

He devoted not less than ten hours a day to his work, being generally employed three hours a day in writing, and the rest of the time in examining authorities and collating materials. From the unspeakable advantage of having a great and worthy object to pursue, he not only escaped the tedium which must otherwise have devoured him, but, with much to mortify and alarm, he preserved equanimity, and even cheerfulness. He thus describes his course of life at Jersey till he was left in entire solitude: "Whilst the Lords Capel and Hopton staid there, they lived and kept house together in St. Hilary's, which is the chief town of the island, where, having a chaplain of their own, they had prayers every day in the church at ten of the clock in the morning; till which hour they enjoyed themselves in their chambers, according as they thought fit, the chancellor betaking himself to the continuance of the history which he had begun in Scilly, and spending most of his time at that exercise. The other two walked or rode abroad or read, as they were disposed. But at the hour of prayer they always met, and then dined together at the Lord Hopton's lodgings, which was the best house, they being lodged at several houses with convenience enough. Their table was maintained at their joint expense, only for dinner, they never using to sup, but met always upon the sands in the evening to walk, after going to the castle to Sir George Carteret, who treated them with extraordinary kindness and civility."

After a few months he was deprived of the society of his friends, Lord Capel leaving Jersey for Holland, and Lord Hopton for Normandy, with a view to their return to England. He was too obnoxious to Parliament to venture to put himself in its power, and he was too poor to send for his wife and children, who were sheltered by relations in Wiltshire. Speaking of Lady Hyde at this time, he says, "She bears her part with miraculous constancy and courage, which truly is an unspeakable comfort to me."

He now left the town of St. Hilary's, and, under the protection of Carteret, constructed for himself some convenient rooms among the ruins of an old castle, and over the door he set up his arms with this inscription, "Bene vixit qui bene latuit." Like most authors, he was occasionally discouraged by the difficulties he met with, saying that he wished he never had begun the work, and that he was determined to lay it aside; but it made steady progress, and in seven months he got as far as the erecting of the royal standard at Nottingham. To tune his mind to historical composition, and to improve his taste, he read over Livy and Tacitus, and almost all the works of Cicero. He likewise availed himself of the opportunity of improving himself in the French language, which he had hitherto neglected. He remained in his retreat at Jersey till the month of June, 1640.

1359. HUME'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

When Hume published the first portion of his history, he was himself sanguine in his expectations. He tells his own narrative:—

"I thought I was the only historian that had at once neglected present power, interest, and authority, and the cry of popular prejudices; and, as the subject was suited to every capacity, I expected proportional applause. But miserable was my disappointment. All classes of men and readers united in their rage against him who had presumed to shed a generous tear for the fate of Charles I. and the Earl of Strafford. . . . What was still more mortifying, the book seemed to sink into oblivion, and in a twelvemonth not more than forty-five copies were sold."

Even Hume, a stoic before in his literary character, was struck down and dismayed; he lost all courage to proceed; and, had the war not prevented him, he "had resolved to change his name, and never more to have returned to his native country."

But an author, though born to suffer martyrdom, does not always expire; he may be flayed like St. Bartholomew, and yet he can breathe without asking; stoned like St. Stephen, and yet write on with a broken head; and he has been even known to survive the flames, notwithstanding the most precious part of an author, which is obviously his book, has been burnt in an auto da fe. Still was the fall (as he terms it) of the first volume of his history haunting his nervous imagination, when he found himself yet strong enough to hold a pen in his hand, and ventured to produce a second, which "helped to buoy up its unfortunate brother." But the third part, containing the reign of Elizabeth, was particularly obnoxious, and he was doubtful whether he was again led to the stake. But Hume, a little hardened by a little success, grew, to use his own words, "callous against the impressions of public folly," and completed his history, which was now received "with tolerable, and but tolerable, success."

At length, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, our author began, a year or two before he died, as he writes, to see "many symptoms of my literary reputation breaking out at last with additional lustre, though I know that I can have but few years to enjoy it." What a provoking consolation for a philosopher, who, according to the result of his own system, was close upon a state of annihilation!

§ 139. BLUNDERS AND FALSEHOODS OF HISTORIANS.

1360. ROYALTY IN A TIGHT PLACE.

Lord Clarendon.

To illustrate my ideas of usefulness, and of the absolute necessity of secret history, it is often easy to expose the fallacious appearances of popular history by authorities indisputably genuine. In history, the restoration of Charles appeared in all its splendor; the king is joyfully received at Dover, and the shore is covered by his subjects on their knees; crowds of the great hurry to Canterbury; the army is drawn up in number and in splendor that has never been equalled. His enthusiastic reception is on his birthday, for that was the lucky day fixed on for his entrance into the metropolis: in a word, all that is told in history describes a monarch the most powerful and the most happy.

Turn to the faithful memorialist, who so well knew the secrets of the king's heart, and who was himself an actor behind the curtain. Lord Clarendon confessed that the king was not yet the master of the kingdom, nor his authority and security such as the general noise and acclamation, the bells and the bonfires, proclaimed it to be."

"The first mortification the king met with was as soon as he arrived at Canterbury, within three hours after he landed at Dover." Clarendon then relates how many the king found there, who, while they waited with joy to kiss his hand, also came with importunate solicitations for themselves; forced him to give them present audience, in which they reckoned up the insupportable losses undergone by themselves or their fathers; demanded some grant, or promise of such offices; some even for more; "pressing for two or three with such confidence and importunity, and with such tedious discourses, that the king was extremely nauseated with their suits, though his modesty knew not how to break from them; that he no sooner got into his chamber, which for some hours he was not able to do, than he lamented the condition to which he found he must be subject; and did, in truth, from that minute, contract such a prejudice against some of those persons." But a greater mortification was to follow, and one which had nearly thrown the king into despair.

General Monk had from the beginning to this instant acted very mysteriously, never corresponding with nor answering a letter of the king's, so that his majesty was frequently doubtful whether the general designed to act for himself or for the king — an ambiguous conduct which may be attributed to the power his wife had over him, who was in the opposite interest. The general, in his rough way, presented him a large paper, with about seventy names for his privy council, of which not more than two were acceptable. "The king," says Clarendon, "was in more than ordinary confusion, for he knew not well what to think of the general, in whose absolute power he was; so that at this moment his majesty was almost alarmed at the demand and appearance of things." The general afterwards undid this unfavorable appearance by acknowledging that the list was drawn up by his wife, who had made him promise to present it; but he permitted his majesty to act as he thought proper. At that moment General Monk was more king than Charles.

We have not yet concluded. When Charles met the army at Blackheath, fifty thousand strong, "he knew well the ill constitution of the army, the distemper and murmuring that were in it, and how many diseases and convulsions their infant loyalty was subject to; that, how united soever their inclinations and acclamations seemed to be at Blackheath, their affections were not the same, and the very countenances there of many officers, as well as soldiers, did sufficiently manifest that they were drawn thither to a service they were not delighted in. The old soldiers had little regard for their new officers; and it quickly appeared by the select and affected mixtures of sullen and melancholic parties of officers and soldiers." And then the chancellor of human nature adds, "And in this melancholic and perplexed condition the king and all his hopes stood, when he appeared most gay and exalted, and wore a pleasantness in his face that became him, and looked like as full an assurance of his security as was possible to put on."

1361. FORGERIES OF VARILLAS.

Varillas, the French historian, enjoyed for some time a great reputation in his own country for his historic compositions; but when they became more known, the scholars of other countries destroyed the reputation he had unjustly acquired. His continual professions of sincerity prejudiced many in his favor, and made him pass for a writer who had penetrated into the inmost recesses of the cabinet; but the public were at length undeceived, and were convinced that the historical anecdotes which Varillas put off for authentic facts had no foundation, being wholly his own inventing; though he endeavored to make them pass for realities by affected citations of titles, instructions, letters, memoirs, and relations, all of them imaginary. He had read almost every thing historical, printed and manuscript; but he had a fertile political imagination, and gave his conjectures as facts, while he quoted at random his pretended authorities. Burnet's book against Varillas is a curious little volume.

1362. ROBERTSON'S ABORTIVE HISTORY.

Robertson had projected a history of British America, of which we possess two chapters. When the rebellion and revolution broke out, he abandoned the work, and congratulated himself that he had not made any further progress.

"It is lucky my American history was not finished before this event; how many plausible theories that I should have been entitled to form are contradicted by what has now happened!" A fair confession.

1363. AN AUTHOR'S REVENGE.

Philip de Comines's violent enmity to the Duke of Burgundy, which appears in the Memoirs, has been traced by the minute researchers of anecdotes; and the cause is not honorable to the memoir writer, whose resentment was implacable. De Cominc. was born a subject of the Duke of Burgundy, and for seven years had been a favorite; but one day returning from hunting with the duke, then Count de Charolois, in familiar jocularly he sat himself down before the prince, ordering the prince to pull off his boots. The count laughed and did this, but in return for Comines's princely amusement, dashed the boot in his face, and gave Comines a bloody nose. From that time he was mortified in the court of Burgundy by the nickname of the booted head. Comines long felt a rankling wound in his mind; and after this family quarrel, — for it was nothing more, — he went over to the King of France, and wrote off his bile against the Duke of Burgundy in those Memoirs, which give posterity a caricature likeness of that prince, whom he is ever censuring for presumption, obstinacy, pride, and cruelty. This Duke of Burgundy, however, it is said, with many virtues, had but one great vice, the vice of sovereigns, that of ambition.

The impertinence of Comines had not been chastised with great severity; but the nickname was never forgiven. Unfortunately for the duke, Comines was a man of genius. When we are versed in the history of the times, we shall often discover that memoir writers have some secret poison in their hearts. Many, like Comines, have had the boot dashed on their nose. Personal rancor wonderfully enlivens the style of Lord Oxford and Cardinal de Retz. Memoirs are often dictated by its fiercest spirit; and then histories are composed from memoirs. Where is truth?

1364. ROBERTSON'S CHARLES V.

Dr. William Robertson.

When his successful History of Scotland invited Robertson to pursue this newly-discovered province of philosophical or theoretical history, he was long irresolute in his designs, and so unpractised in those researches he was desirous of attempting, that his admirers would have lost his popular productions, had not a fortunate introduction to Dr. Birch, whose life had been spent in historical pursuits, enabled the Scottish historian to open many a clasped book, and to drink of many a sealed fountain. Robertson was long undecided whether to write the history of Greece, of Leo X., that of William III., or Queen Anne, or that of Charles V., and perhaps many other subjects.

We have a curious letter of Lord Orford's detailing the purport of a visit Robertson paid to him, to inquire after materials for the reigns of William and Anne; he seemed to have little other knowledge than what he had taken upon trust. "I painted to him," says Lord Orford, "the difficulties and the want of materials, but the booksellers will outargue me." Both the historian and "the booksellers" had resolved on another history, and Robertson looked upon it as a task which he wished to have set to him, and not a glorious toil long matured in his mind. But how did he come prepared to the very dissimilar subjects he proposed! When he resolved to write the History of Charles V., he confesses to Dr. Birch, "I never had any access to any copious libraries, and do not pretend to any extensive knowledge of authors; but I have a list of such as I thought most essential to the subject, and have put them down as I found them mentioned in any book I happened to read. Your erudition and knowledge of books are infinitely superior to mine, and I doubt not you will be able to make such additions to my catalogue as may be of great use to me. I know very well, and to my sorrow, how scarcely historians copy from one another, and how little is to be learned from reading many books; but at the same time, when one writes upon any particular period, it is both necessary and decent for him to consult every book relating to it upon which he can lay his hands." This avowal proves that Robertson knew little of the history of Charles V. till he began the task, and he further confesses that "he had no knowledge of the Spanish or German," which, for the history of a Spanish monarch and a German emperor, was somewhat ominous of the nature of the projected history.

1305. HISTORICAL INCREDULITY.

Smollett's History of England was written in two years, and is very defective.

"Thinking to amuse my father, once," says Walpole, "after his retirement from the ministry, I offered to read a book of history." "Any thing but history," said he, "for history must be false."

1306. DANIEL NEAL AND. SANDYS.

Here is a specimen of Daniel Neal's honesty in his History of the Puritans. Speaking of Sandys, Archbishop of York, he says he was "a zealous defender of the laws against nonconformists of all sorts. When arguments failed, he would earnestly implore the secular arm, though he had no great opinion either of the discipline or ceremonies of the church, as appears by his last will and testament, in which are these remarkable expressions: 'I am persuaded that the rites and ceremonies by political institutions appointed in the church are not ungodly nor unlawful, but may, for order and obedience' sake, be used by good Christians. But I am now, and ever have been, persuaded that some of these rites and ceremonies are not expedient for this church now; but that in the church reformed, and in all this time of the gospel, they may better be disused by little and little, than more and more urged.' Such a testimony from the dying lips of one that had been a severe persecutor of honest men for things which he always thought had better be disused than urged, deserves to be remembered." Vol. i. p. 502.

For his authority Neal refers in the margin to Strype's Life of Whitgift, p. 287. There, in fact, the passage occurs, and it appears by Strype that, not long after Sandy's death, some Puritan, not more scrupulous than Daniel Neal, quoted it for the same purpose. To expose the falsehood which was thus practised, Strype gives the very words of the will, which follow immediately, thus: "Howbeit, as I do easily acknowledge our ecclesiastical policy in some points may be bettered, so do I utterly dislike, even in my conscience, all such rude and indigested platforms as have been more lately and boldly than either learnedly or wisely preferred, tending not to the reformation, but to the destruction, of this church of England, the particularities of both sorts reserved to the discretion of the godly wise. Of the latter, I only say thus—that the state of a small private church, and the form of a larger Christian kingdom, neither would long like, nor can all brook one and the same ecclesiastical government. Thus much I thought good to testify concerning these ecclesiastical matters, to clear me of all suspicion of double and indirect dealing in the house of God."

And with these words before him, Daniel Neal, the historian of the Puritans, presents in his history the mutilated passage for the sake of fixing upon one, whom even he allows to be a venerable man, a charge of double and indirect dealing.

1307. VERTOT'S PRESUMPTION.

In writing the History of the Knights of Malta, Vertot had sent to Italy for original materials concerning the siege of Rhodes; but, impatient of the long delay, he completed his narrative from his own imagination. At length the packet arrived, when Vertot was sitting with a friend. He opened it, and threw it contemptuously on the sofa behind him, saying coolly, "Mon siege est fait," (My siege is made.)

1308. VAGUE DESCRIPTION OF BATTLES.

"It is history, madam; you know how the tale goes," said Cardinal Mazarin to the Queen Dowager of France. But in no respect is history more uncertain than in the description of battles. Sully observes, that when, after the battle of Aumale, the officers were standing around the bed of Henry IV., not two of all the number could agree in their account of the engagement.

1309. GOLDSMITH'S CARELESSNESS.

The following anecdote illustrates the carelessness with which Goldsmith executed works requiring accuracy and research. On the 22d of June he had received payment in advance for a Grecian History, in two volumes, though only one was finished. As he was pushing on doggedly at the second volume, Gibbon, the historian, called in.

"You are the man of all others I wish to see," cried the poet, glad to be saved the trouble of reference to his books.

"What was the name of that Indian king who gave Alexander the Great so much trouble?"

"Montezuma," replied Gibbon, sportively.

The heedless author was about committing the name to paper, without reflection, when Gibbon pretended to recollect himself, and gave the true name—Porus.

1370. HUME'S CAREFUL COMPOSITION.

It is a curious fact, that when Hume was complimented by a noble marquis on the correctness of his style, particularly in his History of England, he observed, "If it had shown any peculiar correctness, it was owing to the uncommon care he took in the execution of his work, as he wrote it over three times before he sent it to the press." Yet, notwithstanding his extreme care, he made a most egregious blunder; for, having inserted in his history that if ever the national debt came up to one hundred millions, this country would be ruined, he was asked by a friend how he could make such a mistake, seeing that the debt was far above that sum, and likely to be much more. "Owing to a mistake, sir," says he, "common to writers by profession, who are often obliged to adopt sentiments on the authority of other people."

1371. STORY OF POLLY BAKER.

It has been justly observed, that several modern historians, who have pretended to write in a philosophical spirit, have been very inattentive to the truth or falsehood of the facts on which their philosophy rested. The celebrated Abbé Raynal appears to have been a writer of this class, as will be seen from the following anecdote: "Towards the end of the year 1777, the abbé called one evening on Dr. Franklin, at his lodgings in Paris, and found, in company with the doctor, their common friend, Silas Deane. 'Ah, Monsieur l'Abbé,' said Deane, 'we were just talking of you and your works. Do you know that you have been very ill served by some of those people who have undertaken to give you information on American affairs?' The abbé resisted this attack with some warmth; and Deane supported it, by citing a variety of passages from Raynal's works, which he alleged to be incorrect. At last they came to the anecdote of Polly Baker, on which the abbé had displayed a great deal of pathos and sentiment. 'Now, here,' says Deane, 'is a tale in which there is not one word of truth.' Raynal fired at this, and asserted that he had taken it from an authentic memoir received from America. Franklin, who had amused himself hitherto with listening to the dispute of his friends, at length interposed. 'My dear abbé,' said he, 'shall I tell you the truth? When I was a young man, and rather more thoughtless than is becoming at our present time of life, I was employed in writing for a newspaper; and as it sometimes happened that I wanted genuine materials to fill up my page, I occasionally drow on the stores of my imagination for a tale which might pass current as a reality. Now this very anecdote of Polly Baker was one of my inventions.' 'And upon my word,' cried Raynal, quitting at once the tone of dispute for that of flattery, 'I would much rather insert your fictions in my works than the truths of many other people.' Such is the way in which modern philosophers write history!

1372. QUEEN MARY'S TROUBLES.

Burnet informs us that, when Queen Mary held the administration of government, during the absence of William, it was imagined by some that as every woman of sense loved to be meddling, they concluded that she had but a small portion of it, because she lived so abstracted from all affairs. He praises her exemplary behavior; "regular in her devotions, much in her closet, read a great deal, was often busy at work, and seemed to employ her time and thoughts in any thing rather than matters of state. Her conversation was lively and obliging; every thing in her was easy and natural. The king told the Earl of Shrewsbury that, though he could not hit on the right way of pleasing England, he was confident she would, and that we should all be very happy under her." Such is the miniature of the queen which Burnet offers. We see nothing but her tranquillity, simplicity, and carelessness, amidst the important transactions passing under her eye; but let us lift the curtain from a longer picture. The distracted state amidst which the queen lived, the vexations, the secret sorrows, the agonies and the despair of Mary in the absence of William, nowhere appears in history, and, as we see, escaped the ken of the Scotch bishop. They were reserved for the curiosity and the instruction of posterity; and were found by Dalrymple, in the letters of Mary to her husband, in King William's cabinet. It will be well to place under the eye of the reader the suppressed cries of this afflicted queen, at the time when "every thing in her was so easy and natural, employing her time and thoughts in any thing rather than matters of state—often busy at work."

So far was the queen from not "employing her thoughts" on "matters of state," that every letter, usually written towards evening, chronicles the conflicts of the day; she records not only events, but even dialogues and personal characteristics; hints her suspicions, and multiplies her fears: her attention was incessant. "I never write but what I think others do not;" and her terrors were as ceaseless—"I pray God send you back quickly, for I see all breaking out into flames." The queen's difficulties were not eased by a single confidential intercourse. On one occasion she observes, "As I do not know when I ought to speak, and when not, I am as silent as can be." "I ever fear not doing well, and trust to what nobody says but you. It seems to me that every one is afraid of themselves. I am very uneasy in one thing, which is want of somebody to speak my mind freely to; for it's a great constraint to think and be silent; and there is so much matter that I am one of Solomon's fools, who am ready to burst."

For a final extract, take this full picture of royal misery: "I must see company on my set days; I must play twice a week; nay, I must laugh and talk, though never so much against my will; I believe I dissemble very ill to those who know me; at least, it is a great constraint to myself, yet I must endure it. All my motions are so watched, and all I do so observed, that if I eat less, or speak less, or look more grave, all is lost in the opinion of the world; so that I have this misery added to that of your absence, that I must grin when my heart is ready to break, and talk when my heart is so oppressed that I can scarce breathe. I go to Kensington as often as I can for air; but then I never can be quite alone, neither can I complain—that would be some ease; but I have nobody whose humor and circumstances agree with mine enough to speak my mind freely to. Besides, I must hear of business, which, being a thing I am so new in, and so unfit for, does but break my brains the more, and not ease my heart."

Thus different from the representation of Burnet was the actual state of Queen Mary; and our warm and vehement bishop probably had but little personal knowledge of her majesty, notwithstanding the elaborate character of the queen which he has given in her funeral eulogium. He must have known that she did not always sympathize with his party feelings; for the queen writes, "The bishop of Salisbury has made a long, thundering sermon this morning, which he has been with me to desire to print, which I could not refuse, though I should not have ordered it, for reasons which I told him."

1373. ENGLISH AND FRENCH HISTORIANS.

"The popular historians of England and of France," says D'Israeli, "have, in truth, made little use of manuscript researches. Life is very short for long histories, and those who rage with an avidity of fame or profit will gladly taste the fruit which they cannot mature. Researches too remotely sought after, or too slowly acquired, or too fully detailed, would be so many obstructions in the smooth texture of a narrative. Our theoretical historians write from some particular and preconceived result; unlike Livy, and De Thou, and Machiavel, who describe events in their natural order, these cluster them together by the fanciful threads of some political or moral theory, by which facts are distorted, displaced, and sometimes altogether omitted. One single original document has sometimes shaken into dust their palladian edifice of history. At the moment Hume was sending some sheets of his history to press, Murdin's State Papers appeared. And we are highly amused and instructed by a letter of our historian to his rival Robertson, who probably found himself often in the same forlorn situation. Our historian discovered in that collection what compelled him to retract his preconceived system: he hurries to stop the press, and paints his confusion and his anxiety with all the ingenuous simplicity of his nature. 'We are all in the wrong!' he exclaims. Of Hume I have heard, that certain manuscripts at the state paper office had been prepared for his inspection during a fortnight, but he never could muster courage to pay his promised visit. Satisfied with the common accounts, and the most obvious sources of history, when librarian at the Advocates' Library, where yet may be examined the books he used, marked by his hand, he spread the volumes about the sofa, from which he rarely rose to pursue obscure inquiries, or delay by fresh difficulties the page which every day was growing under his charming pen. A striking proof of his careless happiness I discovered in his never referring to the perfect edition of Whitelock's Memorials of 1732, but to the old truncated and faithless one of 1682."

140. ENERGY, INDUSTRY, AND PERSEVERANCE.

1374. RALEIGH'S HISTORY.

HE unfinished History of the World, by Sir Walter Raleigh, which leaves us to regret that later ages had not been celebrated by his eloquence, was the fruit of eleven years of imprisonment. It was written for the use of Prince Henry, as he and Dallington, who also wrote Aphorisms for the same prince, have told us; the prince looked over the manuscript. Of Raleigh it is observed, to employ the language of Hume, "They were struck with the extensive genius of the man, who, being educated amidst naval and military enterprises, had surpassed, in the pursuits of literature, even those of the most recluse and solitary lives; and they admired his unbroken magnanimity, which at his age, and under his circumstances, could engage him to undertake and execute so great a work as his History of the World. He was, however, assisted in this great work by the learning of several eminent persons—a circumstance which has not been noticed.

1375. PROLONGED LABORS OF AUTHORS.

It cost Lord Lyttleton twenty years to write the Life and History of Henry II.; the historian Gibbon was twelve years in completing his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire; and Adam Smith occupied ten years in producing his Wealth of Nations.

1376. M. THIERS' CAREER.

Thiers, the great ex-minister, seven years before the revolution of 1832 in France, was a poor boy at the office of the Constitutional. He afterwards supplied the editor's chair, led on the popular mind to revolt, and finally contributed to seat Louis Philippe on the throne of Charles X. He is one of the best writers his country has produced, and his great work, the History of the French Revolution, was written while he was engaged in the daily discharge of multifarious duties, which would have utterly appalled most other minds.

1377. ARDENT DEVOTION OF MORERI.

Moreri, the founder of our great biographical collections, conceived the design with such enthusiasm, and found such voluptuousness in the labor, that he willingly withdrew from the popular celebrity he had acquired as a preacher, and the preferment which a minister of state, in whose house he resided, would have opened to his views. After the first edition of his Historical Dictionary, he had nothing so much at heart as its improvement. His unyielding application was converting labor into death; but collecting his last renovated vigor, with his dying hands he gave the volume to the world, though he did not live to witness even its publication. All objects in life appeared mean to him, compared with that exalted delight of addressing to the literary men of his age the history of their brothers.

1378. INDUSTRIAL ENERGY OF MURATORI.

A long life and the art of multiplying that life, not only by an early attachment to study, but by that order and arrangement which shortens our researches, distinguished the historian Muratori.

With him time was a great capital, which he knew how to put out at compound interest; and this Varro of the Italians, who performed an infinite number of things in the circumscribed period of ordinary life, appears not to have felt any dread of leaving his voluminous labors unfinished, but rather of wanting one to begin. This literary Alexander thought he might want a world to conquer. Muratori was never perfectly happy unless employed in two large works at the same time, and so much dreaded the state of literary inaction, that he was incessantly importuning his friends to suggest to him objects worthy of his future composition. The flame kindled in his youth burnt clear in his old age; and it was in his senility that he produced the twelve quartos of his Annali d'Italia as an addition to the twenty-nine folios of his Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, and the six folios of the Antiquitates Medii Ævi; yet these vast edifices of history are not all which this illustrious Italian has raised for his fatherland. Gibbon, in his miscellaneous works, has drawn an admirable character of Muratori.

§ 141. INTERESTING FACTS RESPECTING HISTORIES.

1379. SUCCESS OF GIBBON'S HISTORY.

"The volume of my history, which had been somewhat delayed by the novelty and tumult of a first session, was now ready for the press. After the perilous adventure had been declined by my friend Mr. Elmsley, I agreed upon easy terms with Mr. Thomas Cadell, a respectable bookseller, and Mr. William Strahan, an eminent printer; and they undertook the care and risk of the publication, which derived more credit from the name of the shop than from that of the author. The last revision of the proofs was submitted to my vigilance; and many blemishes of style, which had been invisible in the manuscript, were discovered and corrected in the printed sheet. So moderate were our hopes, that the original impression had been stinted to five hundred, till the number was doubled by the prophetic taste of Mr. Strahan. The first impression was exhausted in a few days; a second and third edition were scarcely adequate to the demand. My book was on every table, and almost on every toilet; nor was the general voice disturbed by the barking of any profane critic."

1380. POPULARITY OF BAKER'S CHRONICLE.

Sir Richard Baker's Chronicle of the Kings of England was so popular a book that it became a common piece of furniture in every squire's hall in the country, for which it was not ill calculated by its easy style and variety of matter. It continued to be reprinted until 1733, when an edition appeared with a continuation to the end of the reign of George I., but still with many errors, although, perhaps, not of much importance to the plain people who delight in the book. This is called by the booksellers the best edition, and has lately been advancing in price; but they are not aware that many curious papers, printed in the former editions, are omitted in this. The late learned Danes Barrington gives the most favorable opinion of the Chronicle. "Baker is by no means so contemptible a writer as he is generally supposed to be: it is believed that the ridicule on this Chronicle arises from its being part of the furniture of Sir Roger de Coverley's hall, in one of the Spectators."

1381. GIBBON'S ROME SUGGESTED.

Accident has frequently occasioned the most eminent geniuses to display their powers. "It was at Rome," says Gibbon, "on the 15th of October, 1764, as I sat musing amid the ruins of the Capitol, while the barefooted friars were singing vespers in the Temple of Jupiter, that the idea of writing the decline and fall of the city first started to my mind."

1382. BERNARDO SEGNI'S CONSCIENTIOUSNESS.

Bernardo Segni composed a History of Florence still more valuable, which shared the same fate as that of Nerli. It was only after his death that his relatives accidentally discovered this History of Florence, which the author had carefully concealed during his lifetime. He had abstained from communicating to any one the existence of such a work while he lived, that he might not be induced to check the freedom of his pen, nor compromise the cause and the interests of truth. His heirs presented it to one of the Medici family, who threw it aside. Another copy had been more carefully preserved, from which it was printed in 1713, about one hundred and fifty years after it had been written. It appears to have excited great curiosity, for Lenglet du Fresnoy observes, that the scarcity of this history is owing to the circumstance "of the grand duke having bought up the copies." Du Fresnoy, indeed, has noticed more than once this sort of address of the grand duke; for he observes on the Florentine history of Bruto, that the work was not common; the grand duke having bought up the copies, to suppress them. The author was even obliged to fly from Italy, for having delivered his opinions too freely on the house of the Medici. This honest historian thus expresses himself at the close of his work: "My design has but one end; that our posterity may learn by these notices the root and the causes of so many troubles which we have suffered, while they expose the malignity of those men who have raised them up, or prolonged them; as well as the goodness of those who did all which they could to turn them away."

1383. IDRIANI'S HISTORY.

Idriani, whom his son entitles gentilium Fiorentino, the writer of the pleasing dissertation "on the ancient painters noticed by Pliny," prefixed to his friend Vasari's biographies, wrote, as a continuation of Guicciardini, a history of his own times, in twenty-two books, of which Denina gives the highest character for its moderate spirit, and from which De Thou has largely drawn, and commends for its authenticity. Our author, however, did not venture to publish his history during his lifetime. It was after his death that his son became the editor.

1384. SMOLLETT'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

This man of genius among trading authors, before he began to publish his history, wrote to the Earl of Shelburne, then in a whig administration, and informed him that, if the earl would procure for his work the patronage of government, he would accommodate his politics to the wishes of ministers; but if not, that he had high promises of support from the other party. Lord Shelburne, of course, treated the proffered support of a writer of such accommodating principles with silent contempt, and the work of Smollett became distinguished for its high Toryism. The history was published in sixpenny weekly numbers, of which twenty thousand were sold directly. This extraordinary popularity was created by the artifice of the publisher. He addressed a packet of the proposals to every parish clerk in England, carriage free, with half a crown enclosed as a compliment, to have them distributed through the pews of the church; which being generally done, the pious people read the papers instead of listening to the sermon, and the result was a universal demand for the work.

1385. MYSTERY UNFOLDED.

There is a large work, which is still celebrated, of which the composition has excited the astonishment even of the philosophic Hume, but whose secret history remains yet to be disclosed. This extraordinary volume is the History of the World, by Raleigh. Hume says, "they were struck with the extensive genius of the man, who, being educated amidst naval and military enterprises, had surpassed, in the pursuits of literature, even those of the most reclusive and sedentary lives; and they admired his unbroken magnanimity, which at his age, and under his circumstances, could engage him to undertake and execute so great a work as his History of the World." Now, when the truth is known, the wonderful in this literary mystery will disappear. True, his confinement in the Tower, which lasted several years, was sufficient for the composition of this folio volume, and of a second, which appears to have occupied him. But in that imprisonment it singularly happened that he lived among literary characters with the most intimate friendship. There he joined the Earl of Northumberland, the patron of the philosophers of his age, and with whom Raleigh pursued his chemical studies; and Serjeant Hoskins, a poet and a wit, and the poetical "father" of Ben Jonson, who acknowledged that it was "Hoskins who had polished him;" and that Raleigh often consulted Hoskins on his literary works, is learned from a manuscript. But however literary the atmosphere of the Tower proved to Raleigh, no particle of Hebrew, and perhaps little of Grecian lore, floated from a chemist and a poet. The truth is, that the collection of the materials of this history was the labor of several persons, who have not all been discovered. It has been ascertained that Ben Jonson was a considerable contributor; and there was an English philosopher, from whom Descartes, it is said, even by his own countrymen, borrowed largely—Thomas Hariot, whom Anthony Wood charges with infusing into Raleigh's volume philosophical notions, while Raleigh was composing his History of the World. But if Raleigh's pursuits surpassed even those of the most reclusive and sedentary lives, as Hume observed, we must attribute this to a "Dr. Robert Barrecl, rector of Northwold, in the county of Norfolk, who was a great favorite of Sir Walter Raleigh, and had been his chaplain. All or the greatest part of the drudgery of Sir Walter's history, for criticisms, chronology, and reading Greek and Hebrew authors, were performed by him, for Sir Walter." So says a manuscript in the London Collection. Thus a simple fact, when discovered, clears up the whole mystery; and we learn how that knowledge was acquired, which, as Hume sagaciously detected, required a "recluse and sedentary life," such as the studies and the habits would be of a country clergyman in a learned age.

1386. DELAYS OF PUBLICATION.

Nardi, of a noble family and high in office, famed for a translation of Livy, which rivals its original in the pleasure it affords, in his retirement from public affairs, wrote a History of Florence, which closes with the loss of the liberty of his country, in 1531. It was not published till fifty years after his death; even then, the editors suppressed many passages which are found in manuscript in the libraries of Florence and Venice, with other historical documents of this noble and patriotic historian.

About the same time, the senator Philip Nerli was writing his Commentarij de' Fatti civili, which had occurred in Florence. He gave them, with his dying hand, to his nephew, who presented the manuscripts to the grand duke; yet although this work is rather an apology than a crimination of the Medici family for their ambitious views and their overgrown power, probably some state reason interfered to prevent the publication, which did not take place till one hundred and fifty years after the death of the historian.

1387. PAPAL RESTRAINTS UPON HISTORY.

Among the Italian historians must be placed the illustrious Guicciardini, the friend of Machiavel. No perfect edition of this historian existed till recent times. The history itself was posthumous; nor did his nephew venture to publish it till twenty years after the historian's death. He only gave the first sixteen books, and these castrated. The obnoxious passages consisted of some statements relating to the papal court, then so important in the affairs of Europe; some account of the origin and progress of the papal power; some eloquent pictures of the abuses and disorders of that corrupt court; and some free caricatures on the government of Florence. The precious fragments were fortunately preserved in manuscript, and the Protestants procured transcripts which they published separately, but which were long very rare. All the Italian editions continued to be reprinted in the same truncated condition, and appear only to have been reinstated in the immortal history so late as in 1775. Thus it required two centuries before an editor could venture to give the world the pure and complete text of the manuscript of the lieutenant general of the papal army, who had been so close and so indignant an observer of the Roman cabinet.

§ 142. PRIVATE LIFE, HABITS, TALENTS, AND CHARACTERISTICS OF HISTORIANS.

1388. SELF-CONCEIT AND COMMENDATION.

Few ever felt self-exultation more potent than Hobbes, who, in his controversy with Wallis, asserted that there may be nothing more just than self-commendation.

De Thou, one of the most noble-minded, the most thinking, the most impartial of historians, in the Memoirs of his own life, composed in the third person, has surprised and somewhat puzzled the critics, by that frequent distribution of self-commendation which they knew not how to accord with the modesty and gravity with which he was so amply endowed. After his great and solemn labor, amidst the injustice of his persecutors, that great man had sufficient experience of his own merits to assert them.

1390. THUCYDIDES.

While Thucydides was yet a boy, he heard Herodotus recite his histories at the Olympic Games, and is said to have wept exceedingly. The "father of historians," observing how much the boy was moved, congratulated his father, Clorus, on having a child of such promise, and advised him to spare no pains in his education. The result showed how just Herodotus was in his anticipations. The young Thucydides lived to be one of the best historians Greece ever had.

1390. SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH'S HUMOR.

Sir James Mackintosh had a great deal of humor; and, among many other examples of it, he kept a dinner party at his own house for two or three hours in a roar of laughter, playing upon the simplicity of a Scotch cousin, who had mistaken the Rev. Sydney Smith for his gallant synonyme, the hero of Acre.

1391. ROLLIN.

The good conduct of a child often determines his after career, and throws open to him the road to fortune. Charles Rollin, born at Paris, in 1661, was the son of a poor cutler, and seemed destined to pass his days at a forge. A Benedictine of the Blancs Manteaux, whom he often served at mass, charmed with the amiability of his character, and having noticed his desire of instruction, induced his parents to give him an opportunity of studying. He did more; he obtained for him a pension in the college of Du Plessis. Young Rollin repayed this benefit by the progress which he made in his studies: it seldom happened that his excellence in composition failed of securing him the first place in his class. Among his fellow-pupils, he became intimately connected with the two sons of M. Le Pelletier. This minister, who was not ignorant of the benefits of emulation, viewed this intimacy with the greatest pleasure, and sought to employ it for his sons' advantage. When the young pensioner was emperor, which frequently happened, he sent him a gift similar to those which he was wont to give his own children, and they loved him, though their rival. They often carried him with them to their father's house; sometimes they conveyed him to his mother's dwelling, when he was desirous of seeing her, and waited for him in their carriage. On one occasion, when Rollin's mother remarked that he took the first place without ceremony, she was about to reprimand him, as deficient in politeness; but the preceptor informed her that M. Le Pelletier had ordered them to take their places in the carriage according to their rank in the class.

Rollin owed his talents to the university: he consecrated them to it. He became a professor, and remained so during his life, twice being rector or chief of the university. In his old age he employed his leisure in the composition of excellent works, which have, so to speak, perpetuated the wise lessons that he had given. His productions are, a Treatise on Education, an Ancient History, and a History of Rome.

1392. VALUABLE RECORD.

When Mr. Fox's furniture was sold by auction, amongst the books there happened to be Gibbon's first volume of the Roman History, and which appeared by the title page to have been given by the author to his honorable friend, who thought proper to insert on the blank leaf this anecdote: "The author at Brookes's said there was no salvation for this country until six heads of the principal persons in administration were laid on the table. Eleven days after, this same gentleman accepted a place of lord of trade, under those very ministers, and has acted with them ever since." Such was the avidity of bidders for the smallest production of so wonderful a genius, that by the addition of this little record, the book sold for three guineas.

1393. ECCENTRICITIES OF GEORGE DYER.

The late George Dyer, referred to by Mr. Southey, was a university man, who exercised his talents chiefly in writing for the periodicals. His chief work was the History of the Halls and Colleges of Cambridge. He published also several small works. The poem referred to above was complimentary, in which he noticed most of his literary friends.

The way in which he "brought in" the author of the Pleasures of Memory was very properly putting wit before wealth,—

"Was born a banker, and then rose a bard."

George Dyer was sincere, and had great simplicity of manners, so that he was a favorite with all his friends. No man in London encouraged so much as he did Bloomfield, the author of the Farmer's Boy; and he was equally prepared with kind offices for every body. He had some odd fancies, one of which was, that men ought to live more sparingly and drink plenty of water-gruel. By carrying this wholesome precept on one occasion rather too far, he unhappily reduced himself to death's door.

Charles Lamb says that, having once called on him, at his room in Clifford's inn, he found a little girl with him, (one of his nieces,) whom he was teaching to sing hymns. Mr. Coleridge related to me a rather ludicrous circumstance concerning George Dyer, which Charles Lamb had told him the last time he passed through London. Charles Lamb had heard that George Dyer was very ill, and hastened to see him. He found him in an emaciated state, shivering over a few embers. "Ah," said George, as Lamb entered. "I am glad to see you. You won't have me here long. I have just written this letter to my young nephews and nieces to come immediately and take final leave of their uncle."

Lamb found, on inquiry, that he had been living on water-gruel, and a low, starving diet, and readily divined the cause of his maladies. "Come," said Lamb, "I shall take you home immediately to my house, and I and my sister will nurse you." "Ah," said George Dyer, "it won't do." The hackney coach was soon at the door, and as the sick man entered it, he said to Lamb, "Alter the address, and then send the letter with all speed to the poor children." "I will," said Lamb, "and at the same time call the doctor." George Dyer was now seated by Charles Lamb's comfortable fire, while Lamb hastened to his medical friend, and told him that a worthy man was at his house who had almost starved himself on water-gruel. "You must come," said he, "directly, and prescribe some kitchen stuff, or the poor man will be dead. He won't take any thing from me; he says 'tis all useless." Away both the philanthropists hastened, and Charles Lamb, anticipating what would be required, furnished himself on the road with a pound of beef-steak. The doctor now entered the room, and advancing towards his patient, felt his pulse and asked him a few questions; when, looking grave, he said, "Sir, you are in a very dangerous way." "I know it, sir," said George Dyer. The doctor replied, "Sir, yours is a very peculiar case, and if you do not implicitly follow my directions, you will die of atrophy before to-morrow morning. It is the only possible way of saving your life. You must directly make a good meal of beefsteak, and drink the best part of a pot of porter." "Tis too late," said George, "but I'll eat, I'll eat." The doctor now withdrew, and so nicely had Lamb calculated on results, that the steaks were all this time broiling on the fire; and, as though by magic, the doctor had scarcely left the room, when the steak and the porter were both on the table. Just as George Dyer had begun voraciously to feast on the steak, his young nephews and nieces entered the room, crying, "Good-by, my dears," said George, taking a deep draught at the porter; "you won't see me much longer." After a few mouthfuls of the savory steak, he further said, "Be good children when I am gone."

Taking another draught at the porter, he continued, "Mind your books, and don't forget your hymns." "We won't," answered a little, shrill, silvery voice, from among the group; "we won't, dear uncle." He now gave them all a parting kiss; when the children retired in a state of wonderment, that "sick uncle" should be able to eat and drink so heartily. "And so," said Lamb, in his own peculiar phraseology, "at night I packed up his little nipped carcass snug in bed, and after stuffing him for a week, sent him home as plump as a partridge."

1394. SMOLLETT'S SNOWBALL REPARTEE.

"On a winter's evening," says Dr Moore, "when the streets were covered with snow, Smollett happened to be engaged in a snowball fight with a few boys of his own age. Among his associates was the apprentice of that surgeon who is supposed to have been delineated under the name Crab, in Rodenick Random. He entered his shop while his apprentice was in the heat of the engagement. On the return of the latter, the master remonstrated severely with him for quitting the shop. The youth excused himself by saying, that while he was employed in making up prescriptions, a fellow hit him with a snowball; and he had been in pursuit of the delinquent. "A mighty probable story, truly," said the master, in an ironical tone, "I wonder how long I should stand here," added he, "before it would enter any mortal's head to throw a snowball at me." While he was holding his head erect, with a most scornful air, he received a very severe blow in the face by a snowball. Smollett, who was concealed behind the pillar at the shop door, had heard the dialogue, and perceiving that his companion was puzzled for an answer, he extorted him by a repartee equally smart and apropos.

1395. VOLTAIRE'S DUPLICITY AND NARROW ESCAPE.

Voltaire was employed by that eccentric, great man, the famous Earl of Peterborough, to write some considerable work. His lordship supplied the money whenever importuned by Voltaire, then under his roof, for that purpose, and rather impatiently waited for its completion, urging Voltaire to expedite the publication, who replied, that booksellers and printers were dilatory.

The bookseller employed by Voltaire having frequently demanded from him more money, his constant reply was, that Lord Peterborough could not be prevailed upon to advance more until the completion of the work; for which event, Voltaire, it would seem, was in no great haste. The bookseller, at length, began to suspect Monsieur de Voltaire, and determined on making a personal application to the earl. He accordingly set out in a stage coach, and arrived at his lordship's in the afternoon. After dining, the earl and two or three gentlemen who had dined with him walked in the garden, when a servant came to announce that Mr. — wished an interview with his lordship, who immediately said, "Show him into the garden." On his being introduced, he told Lord Peterborough that the work had long stood still for want of money. His lordship's color, upon this, began to rise, saying, that he had never failed to send, immediately, all that was demanded. The poor bookseller declared that Monsieur de Voltaire had never given him more than ten pounds, at the same time informing him that he could not prevail on Lord Peterborough to advance any more; that he suspected Monsieur de Voltaire might have slandered his lordship, and he therefore took the liberty of obtaining an interview.

The indignation of his lordship overcame him for a time: he did at length utter, "The villain!" At that moment, Voltaire appearing at the end of a very long gravel walk, the earl exclaimed, "Here he comes, and I will kill him instantly." So saying, he drew his sword, and darted forward to the object of his revenge. A fatal catastrophe was prevented by M. St. André, then present, catching Lord Peterborough in his arms, and exclaiming, "My lord, if you murder him, you will be hanged." "I care not for that. I will kill the villain!" The walk being one of the old-fashioned garden walks of King William, was of great length. Voltaire proceeded some way before he observed the bookseller. At that moment M. St. André screamed out, "Fly for your life, for I cannot hold my lord many moments longer." Voltaire fled, concealed himself that night in the village, and the next day he went to London, where, on the following day, he embarked for the continent, leaving his portmanteau, papers, &c., at Lord Peterborough's.

1396. SERVILITY OF LORD BACON.

After Lord Bacon was deprived, for bribery, of his office of lord keeper of the seal, he devoted himself in his retirement to literature. Great expectation was excited, both at home and on the continent, by the announcement that he was engaged upon an historical work—the Life and Reign of Henry VII. He finished it at Gorhamburg, and was allowed to come to London to superintend the printing of it in the beginning of 1622. It was dedicated to the prince as a mark of gratitude for the generous interest Charles had taken in his misfortunes. He sent a copy to the Queen of Bohemia, with a letter strongly showing the feelings of a disgraced minister. "Time was when I had honor without leisure; and now I have leisure without honor."

Of all his works, this gave the least satisfaction to the public; and after recently again perusing it, I must confess that it is hardly equal to Sir Thomas More's History of Richard III., or to Camden's of Queen Elizabeth, leaving the reproach upon our literature of being lamentably deficient in historical composition till the days of Hume, Robertson, and Gibbon. Some have accounted for Bacon's failure by supposing a decline in his faculties; but he afterwards showed that they remained in their pristine vigor to the very close of his career. The true solution probably is, that he undertook the subject to please the king, with a view of doing honor to the ancestor of the reigning family, who had united the roses by his own marriage, and had united the kingdoms by the marriage of his daughter. The manuscript was from time to time submitted to James, and he condescended to correct it. Bacon was therefore obliged by anticipation to consider what would be agreeable to the regal censor, and could neither use much freedom with the character of his hero, nor introduce any reflections inconsistent with the maxims of government now inculcated from the throne. He therefore gives us a tame chronological narrative, filled up with proclamations and long speeches, descending to such minute facts as a call of sergeants, and not abounding in the delineations of men and manners we might have expected from so great an artist. James even made him expunge a legal axiom, "that on the reversal of an attainder, the party attainted is restored to all his rights."

1397. EVERY-DAY LIFE OF LORD BACON.

During meditation he often had music in another room, by which his fancy was enlivened. He had many little whims and peculiarities, some of which may excite a smile. For instance, in spring he would go out for a drive in an open coach while it rained, to receive (in the quiet language of Aubrey) "the benefit of irrigation," which he was wont to say was very wholesome, because of the nitre in the air, and the universal spirit of the world. He had extraordinary notions respecting the virtue of nitre, and conceived it to be of inestimable value in the preservation of health. So great was his faith, that he swallowed three grains of that drug either alone or with saffron, in warm broth, every morning during thirty years. He seems to have been very fond of quacking himself; once a week he took a dose of the "water of Mithridate" diluted with strawberry water. Once a month, at least, he made a point of swallowing a grain and a half of "castor" in his broth and breakfast for two successive days. And every sixth or seventh day he drank an effusion of rhubarb in white wine and beer immediately before his dinner. He made it a point to take air in some high and open place every morning, the third hour after sunrise, and, if possible, he selected a spot where he could enjoy the perfume of musk, roses, and sweet violets. Besides thus breathing the pure air of nature, he was fumigated with the smoke of lignaleos, with dried bays, and rosemary, adding once a week a little tobacco. On leaving his bed he was anointed all over with the oil of almonds, mingled with salt and saffron, and this was followed by gentle friction. He was rather a hearty feeder, and when young preferred game and poultry, but in after life gave the choice to butchers' meat, well beaten before roasted. At every meal his table was strewn with flowers and sweet herbs. Half an hour before supper he took a cup of wine, or ale, hot and spiced, and once during supper, wine, in which gold had been quenched. The first draught which he drank at dinner or supper was always hot, and on retiring to bed, he ate a piece of bread steeped in a mixture of wine, sirup of roses and amber, and washed it down with a cup of ale to compose his spirits and send him to sleep. In the spring he was fond of a glass of spiced pomegranate wine early in the morning, and greatly enjoyed watercresses.

These little points may be unimportant in themselves, but they assist us in drawing a mental portrait of the man.

1398. OLDYS AND THE FLEET PRISON.

Oldys, the historian, having been for several years in the Fleet prison, had contracted such habits and connections there, that when he was at length enlarged, he made a frequent practice to spend the evenings there, and lodge with some friend all night. Rapping at the door one night, rather late, the keeper reprimanded him for giving him such constant trouble, adding, that though he had a great regard for him, if he kept such hours in future, he must be under the necessity of locking him out.

1399. LITERARY PRECOCITY OF GUIZOT.

Guizot, the distinguished French statesman and historian, gave early promise of his great talents. He is called by a French writer "a child who had no childhood." When only seven years of age, young Guizot was placed at the gymnasium of Geneva, and devoted his whole soul to study. His first and only playthings were books; and at the end of four years the scholar was able to read, in their respective languages, the works of Thucydides and Demosthenes, of Cicero and Tacitus, of Dante and Alfieri, of Schiller and Goethe, of Gibbon and Shakspeare. His last two years at college were especially consecrated to historical and philosophical studies. Philosophy, in particular, had powerful attractions for the young man. His mind, endowed by nature with a remarkable degree of logical strength, was just the one to unfold and ripen in the little Genevan republic, which has presented something of the learned and inflexible physiognomy of its patron, John Calvin.

§ 143. MISCELLANEOUS.

1400. LE CLERC.

Some person observed to this acute and profound scholar, "I think 'De mortuis nil nisi bonum' is a good saying." "De mortuis nil nisi verum," said Le Clerc, "is a better." "Why so?" "Because truth can do no harm to the dead, and may do great good to the living."

1401. LORD NOTTINGHAM'S LIBERALITY.

Lord Nottingham was a great patron of learning. Bishop Burnet, in the preface to the History of the Reformation, pays the following compliment to his liberality and kindness: "The right honorable the Lord Finch, now lord high chancellor of England, whose great parts and greater virtues are so conspicuous that it were a high presumption to say any thing in his commendation, being in nothing more eminent than in his zeal for and care of this church, though it must be of some importance to have its history well digested; and therefore, as he bore a large share of my expense, so he took it more particularly under his care; and, under all the burdens of that high employment which he now bears, yet found time for reading it in manuscript, of which he must have robbed himself, since he never denies it to those who have a right to it on any public account, and hath added such remarks and corrections as are no small part of any finishing it may be judged to have."

A still more striking tribute to his protection of men distinguished for their literary acquisitions, we have in a letter from the famous Bishop Warburton to the granddaughter of Lord Nottingham, who was married to the first Lord Mansfield, the celebrated chief justice of the King's Bench:—

"Madam, you ought not to think strange of an address of this kind from a churchman to a granddaughter of that magistrate who, while he held the seals for the king and the constitution, besides the most exemplary attention to the business of his office, was elegantly ambitious to give the last polish to his country by a patronage of learning and science.

"He took early into his notice, and continued long in his protection, every great name in letters and religion, from Cudworth, who died in the reign of Charles II., to Prideaux, who lived under George I. It was the care and culture of an age, and, in spite of a dissolute and abandoned court, he made the reign of Charles II. to be what it is now likely to be always esteemed—the golden age of literature. The glory of bearing this relation to so faithful a guardian of the human faculties in their ménage, Providence, in the reward of your virtues, hath doubled in a still nearer relation to one who, in his high station, may with equal justice be esteemed the great supporter of civil liberty, and is now engaged in the like generous task for the very being of a free community, which the other so successfully accomplished for that chief ornament of it—literature and science.

"But the honors you derive from others you preserve untarnished by the splendor of those you have acquired for yourself in the course of a sober and enlightened piety, which makes you an example to the rest of your sex, as the patriotic virtues of your illustrious consort will make him the wisest of his."

1402. JOLY'S HISTORY SUPPRESSED.

A French canon, Claude Joly, a bold and learned writer, had finished an ample Life of Erasmus, which included a history of the restoration of literature, at the close of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth century. Colomies tells us, that the author had read over the works of Erasmus seven times; we have positive evidence that the manuscript was finished for the press. The Cardinal de Vonilles would examine the work itself. This important history was not only suppressed, but the hope entertained of finding it among the cardinal's papers was never realized.

1403. REMARKABLE IGNORANCE.

A correspondent of the Boston Post gives the following description of an incident at Faneuil Hall: "While my mind was riveted upon the picture of the Departure, by Wier, my attention was arrested by a question from a young man who had seated himself by my side—'Which is Columbus?' 'He does not appear on this picture,' said I; 'it is the Departure of the Pilgrims.' 'O, no,' said the young man, 'he does not; he came over afterwards.'"

1404. SMOLLETT'S TOMB.

"What interested me most in the burying-ground at Leghorn," says Basil Hall, "was the tomb of a brother sailor, Smollett, though I was rather provoked to find it scribbled all over with the signatures and trashy remarks of innumerable tourists, who seemed to imagine that by hooking on their unknown names and insignificant compositions, both in prose and verse, to the shrine of the poet, they too might have a chance of some touch of distinction.

As it did not strike me at first that this disfiguration of a great author's monument is really one of the best compliments that can be paid to his renown, I turned to the sexton, and in the impulse of the moment promised him a few pauls if he would clear away all these impertinent additions. Before we had left the ground he had procured a bucket of water and a bit of marble, with which he had effectually restored the stone to its original brightness. Till then it did not occur to me that I had missed the true point, and, by thus assimilating Smollett's tomb to those around it, had in fact lessened the only distinction which such things are capable of conferring on the memory of the dead."

1405. CARLYLE'S OPINION OF CHARLES II.

It is reported of Thomas Carlyle, that he once half jestingly declared his intention of writing a life of Charles II., as one who was no sham, or half man, but the perfect specimen of a bad king.

1406. GIBBON AND SHERIDAN.

"Before my departure from England," says Gibbon, "I was present at the august spectacle of the trial of Hastings, in Westminster Hall. It is not my province to absolve or condemn the Governor of India, but Mr. Sheridan's eloquence demanded my applause; nor could I hear, without emotion, the personal compliments which he paid in the presence of the British nation." On being asked by a brother whig, at the conclusion of the speech, how he came to compliment Gibbon with the epithet "luminous," Sheridan answered in a half whisper, "I said voluminous."

1407. ERRORS OF HISTORY.

The manuscript collections of history in national libraries now assume a formidable appearance. A toilsome march over these "Alps rising over Alps" — a voyage in "a sea without a shore" — has turned away most historians from their severer duties; those who have grasped at early celebrity have been satisfied to have given a new form to, rather than contributed to the new matter of, history. The very sight of these masses of history has terrified some modern historians. When Père Daniel undertook a history of France, the learned Boivin, the king's librarian, opened for his inspection an immense treasure of charters, and another of royal autograph letters, another of private correspondence — treasures reposing in fourteen hundred folios! The modern historian passed two hours impatiently looking over them, but frightened at another plunge into the gulf, this Curtius of history would not immolate himself for his country. He wrote a civil letter to the librarian for his supernumerary kindness, but insinuated that he could write a very readable history without any further aid of such paperasses or paper-rubbish. Père Daniel therefore quietly sat down to his history, copying others — a compliment which was never returned by any one — but there was this striking novelty in his "readable history," that, according to the accurate computation of Count Boulainvilliers, Père Daniel's history of France contains ten thousand blunders. The same circumstance has been told me by a living historian of the late Gilbert Stuart, who, on some manuscript volumes of letters being pointed out to him, when composing his history of Scotland, confessed that "what was already printed was more than he was able to read;" and thus much for his theoretical history, written to run counter to another theoretical history, being Stuart versus Robertson! They equally depend on the simplicity of their readers, and the charms of style!

1408. KEEN RETORT ON ORME.

When this intelligent historian presided in the export warehouse at Madras, Mr. Davidson, who acted under him, was one morning at breakfast asked by Mr. Orme of what profession his father was? He replied, that he was a saddler. "And pray," said Orme, "why did he not make you a saddler?" "I was always whimsical," said Davidson, "and rather chose to try my fortune, as you have done, in the East India Company's service. But pray, sir," continued he, "what profession was your father?" "My father," answered the historian, rather sharply, "was a gentleman." "And why," retorted Davidson, with great simplicity, "did not he breed you up a gentleman?"

1409. VERSATILITY OF GENIUS.

Zschokke has tried his hand at almost every species of literary production, and has been successful in all. He excels as narrator, combining artistic judgment with exuberant fancy, great power of characterization, a lively manner, and a style admirably suited to his material; natural, but at the same time dignified and correct. But his influence has been greatest as historian and popular teacher, skilled to comprehend and penetrate the spirit of the time, and indefatigable in developing and diffusing sound views of men and things.

1410. PAMPHLETS OF GEORGE III.

In the year 1762, the British Museum was enriched, by the munificence of George III., with a most valuable collection of thirty thousand tracts and pamphlets, relative to the history of England during the civil wars. The whole are bound in two thousand volumes, of which one hundred, chiefly on the royal side, were printed, but never published. This collection was commenced for the use of Charles I., by a clergyman of the name of Thomason, and was carried about England as the Parliament army marched, kept in the collector's warehouses, disguised as tables covered with canvas, and at length lodged at Oxford, under the care of Dr. Barlow, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln. These tracts were subsequently offered to the library at Oxford, and were at last bought for Charles II., by his stationer, Samuel Mearke, whose widow endeavored to dispose of them, by leave of the said king, in 1684; but it is believed they continued unsold till George III. bought them of Mearke's representative. In a printed paper, it is said that the collector refused four thousand pounds for them.

§ 144. IMITATION.

1411. MOHAMMED AND HIS IMITATOR.

Ebu Saad, one of Mohammed's amanuenses, when writing what the prophet dictated, cried out, by way of admiration, "Blessed be God, the best Creator!" Mohammed approved of the expression, and desired him to write it down as part of the inspired passage. The consequence was, that Ebu Saad began to think himself as great a prophet as the master, and took upon himself to imitate the Koran according to his fancy. But the imitator got himself into trouble, and only escaped with his life, by falling on his knees and solemnly swearing he would never again imitate the Koran, for which he was sensible God had never created him.

1412. SALLUST AND ARRUNTIVS.

Seneca, in his 114th epistle, gives a curious literary anecdote of that sort of imitation by which an inferior mind becomes the monkey of an original writer. At Rome, when Sallust was the fashionable writer, short sentences, uncommon words, and an obscure brevity were affected as so many ele-gances. Arruntius, who wrote the History of the Punic Wars, painfully labored to imitate Sallust. Expressions which are rare in Sallust are frequent in Arruntius, and, of course, without the motive that induced Sallust to adopt them. What rose naturally under the pen of the great historian, the minor one must have run after with a ridiculous anxiety. Seneca adds several instances of the servile affectation of Arruntius, which seems much like those we once had of Johnson, by the undiscerning herd of his monkeys.

1413. GARRICK AND HIS PUPILS.

Once, when the Bishop of St. Asaph was sitting to Sir Joshua, the conversation happening to turn on Garrick, the bishop asked him how it was that Garrick had not been able to make any excellent players, with all his instructions; and Sir Joshua's answer was, "Partly because they all imitated him, and then it became impossible: as this was like a man's resolving to go always behind another; and whilst this resolution lasts, it renders it impossible he should ever be on a par with him."

§ 145. IMPROVISATION AND IMPROMPTUS.

1414. CLERICAL WIT.

A clerical gentleman of Hartford who once attended the house of representatives to read prayers, being politely requested to remain seated near the speaker during the debate, he found himself the spectator of an unmarrying process, so alien to his own vocation, and so characteristic of the legislature of Connecticut, that the result was the following

IMPROMPTU, ADDRESSED BY A PRIEST TO THE LEGISLATURE OF CONNECTICUT.

"For cut-ting all connect-ions famed,
Connect-ic-ut is fairly named;
I twain connect in one, but you
Cut those whom I connect in two.
Each legislator seems to say,
What you Connect I cut away."

1415. THE THREE PROFESSORS.

In 1824, three professors of this extraordinary power were exhibiting at the same time, in the following distribution, viz.: Pistrasio in London, S. Gricci at Paris, and Signora Taddi at Naples. While the former were giving proofs of the wonderful promptitude of their imaginations, and ready powers of expression, both in verse and prose, Signora Taddi was manifesting not only her never-failing fancy in lyric poetry, but also in melody—unpremeditated verse and extemporaneous music were shown to be equally within the scope of the genius of this new Sibyl. And she would not only adopt as subjects whatever stories or incidents were suggested by her auditors, but would declare her ideas in any metre that they prescribed, and apply to her language a melody, the time or measure of which should be dictated at the moment.

1416. DIFFICULT RHYMING.

Three or four wits had dined together, and while wine-ing, the subject of impromptu, and the difficulty of finding rhymes for certain names, were discussed. The brigadier general and poet challenged any of the party to find a happy rhyme for his name, and the challenge was instantly taken up by Brougham the actor. Voici the result:—

"All hail to thee, thou gifted son!
The warrior-poet, Morris!
'Tis seldom that we see in one
A Cæsar and a Horace."

1417. THEODORE EDWARD HOOK.

Amongst Theodore E. Hook's various talents was one which, though familiar in some other countries, whose language affords it facilities, has hitherto been rare, namely, the power of improvisating, or extemporaneous composition of songs and music. Hook would, at table, turn the whole conversation of the evening into a song, sparkling with puns or witty allusions, and perfect in its rhymes. "He accompanied himself," says a writer in the Quarterly Review, "on the piano-forte, and frequently, though not always, as new as the verse. He usually stuck to the common ballad measures; but one favorite sport was a minic opera, and then he seemed to triumph, without effort, over every variety of metre and complication of stanza. About the complete extemporaneousness of the whole, there could rarely be the slightest doubt." This power of extempore verse seems to have been the wonder of all Hook's associates; it astonished Sheridan, Coleridge, and the most illustrious of his contemporaries, who used to hang delighted over such rare and unequivocal manifestations of genius.

1418. PRIOR.

In a gay French company, when every one sang a little song or stanza, of which the burden was "Bannissons la melancholie," when it came to Prior's turn to sing, after the performance of a young lady that sat next, he produced these extemporary lines:—

"*Mais cette voix, et ces beaux yeux,
Font cupidon trop dangereux;
Et je suis triste, quand je cris, Bannissons la melancholie.*"

1419. DR. JOHNSON.

Mr. Johnson, says Mrs. Piozzi, possessed an almost Tuscan power of improvisation. He called to my daughter, who was consulting with a friend about a new gown and dressed hat she thought of wearing at an assembly, thus suddenly, while she hoped he was not listening to their conversation,—

"Wear the gown, and wear the hat;
Snatch thy pleasures while they last;
Hast thou nine lives, like a cat,
Soon those nine lives would be past."

It is impossible to deny to such little sallies the power of the Florentines, who do not permit their verses to be ever written down—though they often deserve it—because, as they express it, così se perderèbbi la poca gloria.

As for translations, we used to make him sometimes run off with one or two in a good humor. He was praising this song of Metastasio,— "*Deh, se piacermi vuoi,

Lascia i sospetti tuoi,
Non mi turbar conquesto
Molesto dubitar;
Chi ciecamente crede,
Impegna a serbar fede;
Chi sempre inganno aspetta,
Alletta ad ingannar.*"

"Should you like it in English?" said he, "thus:—

"Would you hope to gain my heart,
Bid your teasing doubts depart;
He who blindly trusts will find
Faith from every generous mind;
He who still expects deceit,
Only teaches how to cheat."

1420. ARGUMENTUM AD HOMINEM.

The wit of Brougham, in his better days, as well as his propensity to punning and impromptu, are well known. The following anecdote appears to be well authenticated:—

The Duke of Gloucester, being in conversation with Lord Brougham on the subject of reform, grew so warm in the argument, that he observed, hastily, the chancellor was very near a fool. Brougham replied, that he could not think of contradicting the duke, and declared that he fully saw the force of his royal highness's position.

1421. READY WIT OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.

Sir Walter Raleigh having written on a window,—

"Fain would I climb, yet fear I to fall,"— the instant she saw it, she wrote under it,—

"If thy heart fail thee, climb not at all."

A greater instance of promptitude, and that, too, in Latin, was her extempore reply to the insolent commands delivered to her from Philip II., by his ambassador, in these lines:—

"*Tu, veto, ne pergas bello defendere Belgas;
Qua Dracus eripuit, nunc restituantur, oportet;
Quas pater everit, jubeo to condere cellas;
Religio papa fac restituantur ad unguem.*"

She instantly answered with heroic spirit,— "Ad Græcas, bone rez, fiant mandata, calendæ."

1422. DR. YOUNG'S HAPPY IMPROMPTU.

Perhaps the happiest and most elegant impromptu ever uttered was the following, by Dr. Young, author of the Night Thoughts, when walking in his garden with two ladies, one of whom he afterwards married. On being called away by his servants to speak to a parishioner on some pressing business, he was very unwilling to leave the ladies, and, on being almost driven into the house by their gentle violence, he thus addressed them:—

"Thus Adam once at God's command was driven
From paradise by angels sent from heaven;
Like him I go, and yet to go am loath—
Like him I go, for angels drove us both.
Hard was his fate, but mine still more unkind:
His Eve went with him, but mine stays behind."

1423. EXTEMPORE POETS OF ITALY.

The improviso, or extempore poets in Italy, are actually what they are called. They do it with great emulation and warmth, generally in octaves, in which the answerer is obliged to form his octave to the concluding line of the challenger, so that all the octaves after the first must be extempore, unless they act in concert together. "The first time I heard them," says Spence, "I thought it impossible for them to go on so readily as they did, without having arranged things beforehand.

"It was at Florence, at our resident's, Mr. Colman. When Mr. C. asked me what I thought of it, I told him that I could not conceive how they could go on so readily and so evenly, without some collusion between them. He said that it amazed every body at first; that he had no doubt of its being all fair, and desired me, to be satisfied of it, to give them some subject myself, as much out of the way as I could think of. As he insisted upon my doing so, I offered a subject which must be new to them, and on which they could not well be prepared. It was but a day or two before that a band of musicians and actors set out from Florence, to introduce operas for the first time in the Empress of Russia's court. This advance of music, and that sort of dramatic poetry which the Italians at present look upon as the most capital parts of what they call virtu, so much farther north than ever they had been under the auspices of the then great duke, was the subject I offered for them. They shook their heads a little, and said it was a very difficult one. However, in two or three minutes' time, one of them began with his octave upon it; another answered him immediately, and they went on for five or six stanzas, alternately, without any pause, except that very short one which is allowed them by the giving off of the tune on the guitar, at the end of each stanza. They always improvise to music, — at least all that I ever heard, — and the tune is somewhat slow; but when they are thoroughly warmed, they will sometimes call out for quicker time. If two of these guitar players meet in the summer nights in the very streets of Florence, they will challenge one another, and improvise sometimes as rapidly as those in set companies. Their most common subject is the commendation of their several mistresses, or two shepherds contending for the same, or a debate which is the best poet. They often put one in mind of Virgil's third, fifth, and seventh eclogues, or what he calls the contention of his shepherds, in alternate verse; and, by the way, Virgil's shepherds seem sometimes to be tied down by the thought in the preceding stanza, as these extempore poets are by the preceding rhyme."

1424. DR. JOHNSON'S PROMPTNESS IN REPARTEE.

Dr. Johnson was famous for improvisations and caricature imitations. Some one praising these lines of Lopez de Vega, —

"*Se aqui en los leones vence
Venca una muger hermosa;
O el de flaco averguence,
O ella de ser mas furiosa,*" — more than he thought they deserved, Mr. Johnson instantly observed, "that they were founded on a trivial conceit, and that conceit ill explained, and ill expressed beside. The lady, we all know, does not conquer in the same manner as the lion does; 'tis a mere play of words," added he; "and you might as well say, that If a man who turnsip cries

Cries not when his father dies,
'Tis a proof that he had rather
Have a turnip than his father."

And this humor is of the same sort with which he answered the friend who commended the following line: —

"Who rules o'er freemen should himself be free."

"To be sure," said Dr. Johnson, —

"Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat."

This readiness of finding a parallel, or making one, was shown by him perpetually in the course of conversation. When the French verses of a certain pantomime were quoted thus, —

"*Je suis Cassandre, descendre des cieus
Pour vous faire entendre, mesdames et messieurs, Que je suis Cassandre, descendre des cieus,*" —

he cried out gayly and suddenly, almost in a moment, —

"I am Cassandre, come down from the sky
To tell each bystander, what none can deny,
That I am Cassandre, come down from the sky."

The pretty Italian verses, too, at the end of Barretti's book, called Easy Phraseology, he did all improvise in the same manner: —

"*Viva! viva la padrona!
Tutta bella, e tutta buona,*

*La padrona e un angioletta
Tutta buona e tutta bella;
Tutta bella e tutta buona:
Viva! viva la padrona!"*

"Long may live my lovely Hetty!
Always young and always pretty;
Always pretty, always young,
Live my lovely Hetty long!
Always young and always pretty;
Long may live my lovely Hetty!"

The famous distich, too, of an Italian improvisator, who, when the Duke of Modena ran away from the comet in the year 1742 or 1743, —

"Le al venir vostro i principi sen vanno, Dek venga ogni di — durate un anno," —

"which," said he, "would do just as well in our language, thus: —

'If at your coming princes disappear,
Comets, come every day — and stay a year.'

When some one in company commended the verses of M. de Benserade à son Lit, —

"*Théâtre des ris et des pleurs,
Lit! où je nais, et où je meurs,
Tu nous fais voir comment voisins Sont nos plaisirs et nos chagrins,*" —

he replied, without hesitating, —

"In bed we laugh, in bed we cry,
And born in bed, in bed we die;
The near approach a bed may show
Of human bliss to human woe."

1425. DR. CHALMERS'S RELIGIOUS WORKS.

Foster, writing to Cottle, in 1825, says, "Dr. Chalmers started a plan of reprinting, in a neat form, a number of respectable religious works, of the older date, with a preliminary essay to each, relating to the book, or to any analogous topic, at the writer's discretion. The Glasgow booksellers, Chalmers and Collins, the one the doctor's brother and the other his most confidential friend, have accordingly reprinted a series of, perhaps now, a dozen works, with essays, several by Dr. C., several by Irving, one by Wilberforce, one by Daniel Wilson, &c., &c. I believe Hall and Cunningham promised their contributions. I was inveigled into a similar promise more than two years since. The work strongly urged upon me for this service, in the first instance, was Doddridge's Rise and Progress, and the contribution was actually promised to be furnished with the least possible delay; on the strength of which the book was immediately printed off, and has actually been lying in their warehouse, as dead stock, for two years. I was admonished and urged, and urged again, but in spite of mortification and shame, which I could not but feel at this occasioning the publisher a positive loss, my horror of writing, combined with ill health, invincibly prevailed, and not a paragraph was written till towards the end of last year, when I did summon resolution for the attempt. When I had written but a few pages, the reluctant labor was interrupted and suspended, by the more interesting one of writing those letters to our dear young friend, your niece, (Miss Saunders.) Not, of course, that this latter employment did not allow me time enough for the other, but by its more lively interest it had the effect of augmenting my disinclination of the other. Soon after her removal I resumed the task, and am ashamed to acknowledge such a miserable and matchless slowness of mental operation, that the task has held me confined ever since, till actually within these few sense of the not continuing, could have constrained me to so long labor. It is most mortifying to think of so slender a result of so much time and toil. The article is indeed of the length of nearly one half of Doddridge's book, but many of my contemporary makers of sentences would have produced as much with one fifth part of the time and labor. I have aimed at great correctness and condensation, and have found the labor of revision and transcription not very much less than that of the substantial composition. The thing has been prolonged—I should say spun out—to three times the length first intended, or which was required. It has very little reference to the book which it accompanies; has no special topic, and is merely a serious inculcation of the necessity of religion on young persons and men of the world. In point of merit, (that, you know, is the word in such matters,) I rate it very moderately, except in respect to clearness of expression. If it does not possess this quality, a vast deal of care and labor has been sadly thrown away."

§ 146. INTRODUCTIONS AND PREFACES.

1426. SELFISHNESS OF DR. ARMSTRONG.

Dr. Armstrong, after the appearance of his classical but sadly uninteresting poem, never shook hands cordially with the public for not relishing his barren labors. In the preface to his lively Sketches, he tells us, "he could give them much bolder strokes as well as more delicate touches, but that he dreads the danger of writing too well, and feels the value of his own labor too sensibly to bestow it upon the mobility." This is pure milk compared to the gall in the preface to his poems. There he tells us, "that at last he has taken the trouble to collect them. What he has destroyed would, probably enough, have been better received by the great majority of readers. But he has always most heartily despised their opinion." These prefaces remind one of the prologi galeati,—prefaces with a helmet!—as St. Jerome entitles the one to his version of the Scriptures. These armed prefaces were formerly very common in the age of literary controversy; for half the business of an author consisted then either in replying, or anticipating a reply, to the attacks of his opponent.

1427. MARRIAGEABLE BOOKS AND PREFACES.

On a very elegant preface prefixed to an ill-written book, it was observed that they ought never to have come together. A sarcastic wit remarked that he considered such marriages were allowable, for they were not of kin.

1428. ALBINUS'S ROMAN HISTORY.

A literary anecdote of the Romans has been preserved, which is sufficiently curious. One Albinus, in the preface to his Roman History, intercedes for pardon for his numerous blunders of phraseology; observing that they were the more excusable, as he had composed his history in the Greek language, with which he was not so familiar as his maternal tongue. Cato severely rallies him on this; and justly observes, that our Albinus had merited the pardon he solicits, if a decree of the senate had compelled him thus to have composed it, and he could not have obtained a dispensation.

1429. BOLD FALSEHOODS OF ALDUS MANUTIUS.

The boldest preface-liar was Aldus Manutius, who, having printed an edition of Aristophanes, first published in the preface that Saint Chrysostom was accustomed to place this comic poet under his pillow, that he might always have his works at hand,—as, in that age, a saint was supposed to possess every human talent, good taste not excepted. Aristophanes, thus recommended, became a general favorite. The anecdote lasted for near two centuries; and what was of greater consequence to Aldus, quickened the sale of his Aristophanes. This ingenious invention of the prefacer of Aristophanes at length was detected by Ménage.

1430. EGOTISM OF SCUDERI.

Scuderi was a writer of some genius and great variety. His prefaces are remarkable for their gasconades. In his epic poem of Alaric, he says, "I have such a facility in writing verses, and also in my invention, that a poem of double its length would have cost me little trouble. Although it contains only eleven thousand lines, I believe that longer epics do not exhibit more embellishments than mine."

But Scuderi and his works were of less consequence than he supposed. His sonnets, heroic poems and romances, in great number, have been long forgotten.

1431. SELF-CONCEIT OF WARBURTON.

The public are treated with contempt when an author professes to publish his puerilities. This Warburton did, in his pompous edition of Shakspeare. In the preface, he informed the public that his notes "were among his younger amusements, when he turned over these sort of writers." This ungracious compliment to Shakspeare and the public merited that perfect scourging which our haughty commentator received from the sarcastic canons of criticism.

LANGUAGES.

§ 147. HISTORICAL ITEMS.

1432. EARLY STAGES OF WRITTEN LANGUAGE.

At first, words were few in number, corresponding to the limited extent of ideas. The vocabulary of savage tribes—those for example which inhabit the American continent—is in general exceedingly limited.

The growth of a language corresponds to the growth of mind; it extends itself by the increased number and power of its words nearly in exact correspondence with the multiplication and the increased complexity of thought. Now the history of all language teaches us that words, which were invented and brought into use, one after another, in the gradual way just mentioned, were first employed to express external objects, and afterwards to express thoughts of an internal origin.

Some writer remarks, that among the Boschuanas of South Africa, who live in a parched and arid country, the word pulo, which literally signifies rain, is the only term they have to express a blessing or blessings.

But there may be blessings internal as well as external—goods and joys of the mind as well as of the body. Still, in the language of these Africans, it is all rain. The blessings of hope, and peace, and friendship, and submission, and all other modes of intellectual and sentient good, are nothing but rain.

1433. CHINESE LANGUAGE.

The Chinese language is like no other on the globe. It is said to contain not more than about three hundred and thirty words, but it is by no means monotonous, for it has four accents, the even, the raised, the lessened, and the returning, which multiply every word into four; as difficult, says Mr. Astle, for an European to understand, as it is for a Chinese to comprehend the six pronunciations of the French æ. In fact, they can so diversify their monosyllabic words by the different tones which they give them, that the same character, differently accented, signifies sometimes ten or more different things.

P. Bourgeois, one of the missionaries, attempted, after ten months' residence at Peking, to preach in the Chinese language. These are the words of the good father: "God knows how much this first Chinese sermon cost me. I can assure you this language resembles no other. The same word has never but one termination; and then adieu to all that in our declensions distinguishes the gender, and the number of things we would speak; adieu, in the verbs, to all which might explain the active person, how and in what time it acts, if it acts alone or with others. In a word, with the Chinese, the same word is the substantive, adjective, verb, singular, plural, masculine, feminine, &c. It is the person who hears who must arrange the circumstances, and guess them. Add to all this, that all the words of this language are reduced to three hundred and a few more; that they are pronounced in so many different ways, that they signify eighty thousand different things, which are expressed by as many different characters. This is not all: the arrangement of all these monosyllables appears to be under no general rule; so that to know the language after having learnt the words, we must learn every particular phrase. The least inversion would make you unintelligible to three parts of the Chinese.

"I will give you an example of their words. They told me chou signifies a book; so that I thought whenever the word chou was pronounced, a book was the subject. Not at all. Chou, the next time I heard it, I found signified a tree. Now I was to recollect chou was a book or a tree. But this amounted to nothing: chou, I found, expressed also great heats; chou is to relate; chou is the Aurora; chou means to be accustomed; chou expresses the loss of a wager, &c. I should not finish, were I to attempt to give you all its significations.

"Notwithstanding these singular difficulties, could one but find a help in the perusal of their books, I should not complain. But this is impossible. Their language is quite different from that of simple conversation. What will ever be an insurmountable difficulty to every European, is the pronunciation. Every word may be pronounced in five different tones; yet every tone is not so distinct that an unpractised ear can easily distinguish it.

"These monosyllables fly with amazing rapidity. Then they are continually disguised by elisions, which sometimes hardly leave any thing of two monosyllables. From an aspirated tone, you must pass immediately to an even one; from a whistling note to an inward one; sometimes your voice must proceed from the palate; sometimes it must be guttural, and almost always nasal. I recited my sermon at least fifty times to my servant, before I spoke it in public; and yet I am told, though he continually corrected me, that, of the ten parts of the sermon, (as the Chinese express themselves,) they hardly understood three. Fortunately the Chinese are wonderfully patient; and they are astonished that any ignorant stranger should be able to learn two words of their language."

It is not less curious to be informed, as Dr. Hager tells us in his Elementary Characters of the Chinese, that "satires are often composed in China, of which, if you attend to the characters, the import is pure and sublime; but if you regard the tone only, they contain a meaning ludicrous or obscene." He adds: "In the Chinese, one word sometimes corresponds to three or four thousand characters; a property quite opposite to that of our language, in which myriads of different words are expressed by the same letters."

1434. CHINESE ETYMOLOGIES.

A writer in the Boston Courier, who takes the signature "Dhoong Kwoh," says,—

"When the thirteen stripes and stars first appeared at Canton, much curiosity was excited among the people. News was circulated that a strange ship had arrived from the farther end of the world, bearing a flag 'as beautiful as a flower.' Every body went to see the kwa kee cheun, or 'flower flag ship.'

The name at once established itself in the language, and America is now called kwa kee kwoh, the 'flower flag country'; and an American, kwa kee kwoh yin—'flower flag countryman'—a more complimentary designation than that of 'red-headed barbarian'—the name first bestowed upon the Dutch.

"It is well known that all proper names in Chinese are significant, every character in the language expressing a thing or an idea as well as a sound. There are, consequently, no unmeaning names in Chinese, corresponding to our Tom, Dick, and Harry; Jones, Davis, and Jenkins; but a man's name must be something like House or Barnes, White or Brown, Flood or Stone, Wood or Waters. Foreign names, however unmeaning originally, acquire, when written in Chinese, a significance which is often strikingly curious.

"Yankee Doodle and Washington are the most remarkable of these etymologies which have yet come under my notice. The two Chinese characters, Yank kee, signify 'the flag of the ocean'—a most appropriate name for the banner which is now to be seen wherever there is blue water. The Chinese have no D, and 'Yankee Doodle' would be written Yan-kee-too-te-lee, 'the flag of the ocean, sovereign people of the world.' This is an omen sufficiently flattering, and if the Chinese do not suspect there is 'something in it,' we must give them credit for being less superstitious than many other people.

"Washington is no less happy in his transition into Chinese, for Wo shingtung, as it would be written, signifies no less than 'rescue and glory at last.' Could the name of the father of his country be expressed with more felicitous truth?

"The Chinese attach great importance to expressive and high-sounding names; and an ambassador to the court of Peking, whose name had not something imposing in Chinese, would be received pretty much in the way that Bubb Doddington anticipated when he thought of going minister to Spain. Our former commissioner from the United States was very luckily gifted in this respect, for Cu-shing means 'ancient glory'—a name that will satisfy the most fastidious courier at the Meoau Tang, and augurs a prosperous issue to the 'whole pigeon,' as the Chinese would say."

1435. ERRORS OF AUTHORS AT THE RESTORATION OF LETTERS.

The age succeeding the restoration of letters furnished the studious with honors and avocations; but they were reserved only for themselves. It withdrew them from the cultivation of all vernacular literature. They courted not the popular voice, when a professorial chair or a dignified secretaryship offered the only profit or honor the literary man contemplated. There was no other public opinion than what was gathered from the writings of the few who wrote to the few who read.

Authority and quotation closed all argument, and filled vast volumes. University responded to university, and men of genius were following each other in the sheep tracks of antiquity. Even to so late a period as the days of Erasmus, every Latin word was culled with a classical superstition; and a week of agony was exhausted on a page finally inlaid with a mosaic of phrases. While this verbal generation flourished, some eminent scholars were but ridiculous apes of Cicero, and, in a cento of verses, empty echoes of Virgil. All native vigor died away in the coldness of imitation; and a similarity of thinking and of style deprived the writers of that raciness which the nations of Europe subsequently displayed when they cultivated their vernacular literature.

It is remarkable of those writers who had already distinguished themselves by their Latin works, that when they began to compose in their native language, those classical effusions on which they had confidently rested their future celebrity sank into oblivion; and the writers themselves ceased to be subjects either of critical inquiry or of popular curiosity, except in that language in which they had opened a vein of original thought, in a manner and diction the creation of their own feelings. Here their natural power and their freed faculties placed them at a secure interval from their imitators.

1436. THE MOTHER TONGUE versus THE ANCIENT LATIN.

In the overwhelming of ancient Rome, another Rome shadowed the world. Ecclesiastical Rome, whence the novel faith of Christianity was now to emanate, far more potent than military Rome, perpetuated the ancient language. The clergy through the diversified realms of Europe were held together in strict conformity, and by a common bond chained to the throne of the priesthood—one faith, one discipline, one language.

The Latin tongue, both in verse and prose, was domiciliated among people of the most opposite interests, customs, and characters. The primitive fathers, the later schoolmen, the monkish chroniclers, all alike composed in Latin; all legal instruments, even marriage contracts, were drawn in Latin; and even the language of Christian prayer was that of abolished paganism.

The idiom of their fatherland, or, as we have affectionately called it, our "mother tongue," and as our ancient translator of the Polychronicon energetically terms it, "the birth tongue"—those first human accents which their infant ear had caught, and which from their boyhood were associated with the most tender and joyous recollections, every nation left to fluctuate on the lips of the populace, rude and neglected. Whenever a writer, proposing to inform the people on subjects which more nearly interested them, composed in the national idiom, it was a strong impulse only which could induce him thus to submit to degrade his genius. One of the French crusaders, a learned knight, was anxious that the nation should become acquainted with the great achievements of the deliverers of Jerusalem. It was the command of his bishop that induced him to compose the narrative in the vernacular idiom. But the twelve years which he bestowed on his chronicle were not considered by him as employed for his glory, for he avows that the humiliating style which he had used was the mortifying performance of a religious penance.

All who looked towards advancement in worldly affairs, and were of the higher orders in society, cultivated the language of Rome. It is owing to this circumstance, observes a learned historian of our country, that "the Latin language and the classical writers were preserved by the Christian clergy from that destruction which has entirely swept from us the writings of Phœnicia, Carthage, Babylon, and Egypt." We must also recollect, that the influence of the Latin language became far more permanent when the great masterworks of antiquity were gradually unburied from their con-cealments. In this resurrection of taste and genius, they derived their immortality from the imperishable soul of their composition. All Europe was condemned to be copiers, or in despair to be plagiarists.

1437. MIXTURE OF LATIN WITH VERNACULAR LANGUAGES.

The predominance of the Latin language, during many centuries, retarded the cultivation of the vernacular dialects of Europe. When the barbarous nations had triumphed over ancient Rome, the language of the Latins remained unconquered; that language had diffused itself with the universal dominion, and, living in the minds of men, required neither legions nor consuls to maintain its predominance.

From accident, and even from necessity, the swarming hordes, some of whom seem to have spoken a language which had never been written, and were a roving people at a period prior to historical record, had adopted that singular colloquial idiom which their masters had conveyed to them, attracted, if not by its beauty, at least by its convenience. This vulgar Latin was not, indeed, the Latin of the great writers of antiquity, but, in its corrupt state, freed from a complex construction, and even from grammar, had more easily lent itself to the jargon of the rude people. Teutonic terms, or Celtic words with corrupt Latinisms, were called "the scum of ancient eloquence, and the rust of vulgar barbarisms," by an indignant critic in the middle of the fifth century. It was amid this confusion of races, of idioms, and of customs, that from this heterogeneous mass were hewed out those vernacular dialects of Europe which furnished each people with their own idiom, and which are now distinguished as the modern languages. Italy retained the sonorous termination of her paternal soil, and Spain did not forget the majesty of the Latin accent—lands favored by more genial skies, and men blessed with more flexible organs. But the Gothic and the northern races barbarously abbreviated or disfigured their Latin words; to sounds so new to them they gave their own rude inflections. There is but one organ to regulate the delicacy of orthoepy—a musical and a tutored ear. The Gaul, in cutting his words down, contracted a nasal sharpness; and the Northmen, in the shock of their hard, redundant consonants, lost the vowelly confluence.

An ingenious literary antiquary has given us a copious vocabulary, as complete evidence of Latin words merely abbreviated by omitting their terminations, whence originated those numerous monosyllables which impoverish the French language. In the following instances the Gauls only used the first syllable for the entire word: damnum—damn; aureum—or; malum—mal; nudum—nud; amicus—ami; vinum—vin; homo—hom, as anciently written; sonus—son; bonus—bon; and thus many others.

The nasal sound of our neighbors still prevails; thus Gracchus sinks into Gracque; Titus Livius is but Tite Live; and the historian of Alexander the Great, the dignified Quintus Curtius, is the ludicrous Quinte Curce.

This vulgar or corrupt Latin, mingled with this diversity of jargons, was the vitiated mother of the sister languages of Europe; sisters still bearing their family likeness, of the same homely origin, but of various fortunes, till some attained to the beauty and affluence of their Latin line. From the first the people themselves had dignified their spurious generation of language as Romans, or Romance, or Romaunt, still proud, perhaps, of its Roman source; but the critical Latins themselves had distinguished it as a Rustic, to indicate a base dialect, used only by those who were far removed from the metropolis of the world.

1438. CHANGES IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

The following was the form of the Lord's prayer in the year 1300:—

"Fader our in hevne, Haleweyed be thi name, Come thi kingdam, Thi will be don as in hevne and in earth, Oor uch dayes bred give us to day, And forgive us our dettes, as we forgiven our dettours, And lede us not into temptatioun, Bote delivere us of yvel. Amen."

1439. PROGRESS OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

In the year 700 the Lord's prayer began thus:—"Uren fader thie are in hiefnas, sio gokagud thin noma, to eymeth thin rick; sic thin willa suc is in heofnas and in ertho."

Two hundred years after, thus:—

"Thee ura fader the eart on heofeum si thin namagelhal God. Com thin ric. Si thin willa on earthan swa, or hoefcum."

About two hundred years after this, in the reign of Henry II., it was rendered thus, and sent over by Pope Adrian, an Englishman:—

"Ure fader in heaven, rich,
Thy name be hailed eber lich,
Thou bring us ty michell blisse;
Als bit in heaven doe,
That in hearthe beene it also," &c

About one hundred years after, in the reign of Henry III., it ran thus:—

"Fader thou art in heaven blisse
Thine Heyle name it wurth the blisse
Cumen and met thy kingdom,
Thine holy will it be all don,
In heaven and in earth also,
So it shall be in full well Ie-tro," &c.

In the reign of Henry VI., it began thus:—

"Our fader that art in heaven, holiewid be thi name, the kingdom come to thee, be thee will dono in earth, as in heaven," &c.

In 1537 it began thus:—

"O, our father who art in heaven! hallowed be thy name. Let thy kingdom come. Thy will be fulfilled as well in earth as it is in heaven."

1440. DEFINITY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

An individual, leaving home, left behind a favorite dog, and wrote over its kennel, "Take care of the dog,"—meaning that he wished it to be taken care of and provided for,—which was interpreted "Beware of the dog!" by all avoiding the poor animal till it starved to death.

1441. LINGUAL STATISTICS.

There are three thousand six hundred and sixty-four known languages now in use in the world. Of these, nine hundred and thirty-seven are Asiatic; five hundred and eighty-seven European; two hundred and seventy-six African; and one thousand six hundred and twenty-four American dialect.

1442. ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Some years ago a gentleman, after carefully examining the folio edition of Johnson's Dictionary, formed the following table of English words derived from other languages:—

Latin,	6732	Irish,
French,	4812	Runic,
Saxon,	1665	Flemish,
Greek,	1148	Erse,
Dutch,	691	Syriac,
Italian,	211	Scottish,
German,	106	Irish and Erse, . .
Welsh,	95	Turkish,
Danish,	75	Irish and Scottish, .
Spanish,	56	Portuguese,
Icelandic,	50	Persian,
Swedish,	34	Frisi,
Gothic,	31	Persic,
Hebrew,	16	Uncertain,
Teutonic,	15
Arabic,	13	Total,	15,784

1443. ANCIENT LITERATURE.

Up to the time of Bayle, ancient literature, from century to century, had constituted the sole labors of the learned, and varia lectiones were long their pride and their reward. Latin was the literary language of Europe. The vernacular idiom in Italy was held in such contempt, that their youths were not suffered to read Italian books—their native productions. Varchi tells a curious anecdote of his father sending him to prison, where he was kept on bread and water, as a penance for his inveterate passion for reading Italian books. Dante was reproached by the erudite Italians for composing in his mother tongue, still expressed by the degrading designation of il volgare, which the "resolute" John Florio renders "to make common;" and to translate was contemptuously called volgarizzare; while Petrarch rested his fame on his Latin poetry, and called his Italian nugellas vulgares!

With us, Roger Ascham was the first who boldly avowed "to speak as the common people, to think as wise men;" yet so late as the time of Bacon, this great man did not consider his Moral Essays as likely to last in the movable sands of a modern language, for he as anxiously had them sculptured in the marble of ancient Rome.

1444. ITALY THE MOTHER OF VERNACULAR LITERATURE.

It was Italy, the mother and the nurse of literature, as the filial zeal of her sons has hailed her, which first opened to the nations of Europe the possibility of each creating a vernacular literature, reflecting the image, not of the Greeks and of the Romans, but of themselves.

Three memorable men, of the finest and most contrasted genius, appeared in one country, and at one period. With that contempt for the language of the people in which the learned participated, busied as they were at the restoration of letters by their new studies and their progressive discoveries, Petrarch contemned his own Italian Rime, and was even insensible to the inspiration of a mightier genius than his own; that genius who, with a parental affection, had adopted the orphan idiom of his fatherland—an orphan idiom which had not yet found even a name; for it was then uncertain what was the true language of Italy. Dante had at first proposed to write in Latin; but with all his adoration of his master, Virgil, he rejected the verse of Virgil, and anticipated the wants of future ages. A peculiar difficulty, however, occurred to the first former of the vernacular literature of Italy. In the state of this unsettled language, composed of fragments of the Latinity of a former populace, with the corruptions and novelties introduced by its new masters, it seemed hopeless to fix on any idiom which, by its inherent nobleness, should claim the distinguished honor of being deemed Italian. Dante denied this envied grace to any of the rival principalities of his country. The poet, however, mysteriously asserted that the true Italian volgare might be discovered in every Italian city; but being common to all, it could not be appropriated by any single one. Dante dignified the volgar illustre which he had conceived in his mind, by magnificent titles; it was "illustrious," it was "cardinal," it was "aulic," it was "courtly." Dante, in his musings, had thrown a mystical veil over the Italian language; but the poet presciently contemplated, amid the distraction of so many dialects, that an Italian style would arise which at some distant day would be deemed classical. Dante wrote, and Dante was the classic of his country.

The third great master of the vernacular literature of Italy was Boccaccio, who threw out the fertility of his genius in the volgare of Nature herself. This Shakspeare of a hundred tales transformed himself into all the conditions of society; he touched all the passions of human beings, and penetrated into the thoughts of men ere he delineated their manners. Even two learned Greeks acknowledged that the tale-teller of Certaldo, in his variegated pages, had displayed such force and diversity in his genius, that no Greek writer could be compared with his volgare eloquenza.

The Italian literature thus burst into birth and into maturity; while it is remarkable of the other languages of Europe, that after their first efforts they fell into decrepitude. Our Saxon rudeness seems to have required more hewing and polishing to be modelled into elegance, and more volubility to flow into harmony, than even the genius of its earliest writers could afford. Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio were the contemporaries of Gower, of Chaucer, and of "the Ploughman;" they delight their nation after the lapse of many centuries; while the critics of the reign of Elizabeth complained that Piers Ploughman, Chaucer, and Gower then required glossaries; and so, at a later period, did Ronsard, Baif, and Marot, in France. In prose, we had no single author, till the close of the sixteenth century, who had yet constructed a style; and in France, Rabelais, and Montaigne had contracted the rust and the rudeness of antiquity, as it seemed to the refinement of the following generation.

1445. OPPOSITION TO THE USE OF THE ITALIAN VERNACULAR.

A long time after the Italian authors began to write in the vernacular idiom, the prejudice in favor of the Latin was so firmly rooted that their youths were prohibited from reading Italian books. A curious anecdote of the times, which its author has sent down to us, however, shows that their native productions operated with a secret charm on their sympathies; for Varchi has told the singular circumstance that his father once sent him to prison, where he was kept on bread and water, as a penance for his inveterate passion for reading works in the vernacular tongue.

The struggle for the establishment of a vernacular literature was apparent, about the same period, in different countries of Europe—a simultaneous movement to vindicate the honor and to display the merits of their national idiom.

Joachim de Bellay, of an illustrious literary family, resided three years with his relative, the cardinal, at Rome; the glory of the great vernacular authors of Italy inflamed his ardor; and in one of his poems he develops the beauty of “composing in our native language,” by the deeper emotions it excites in our countrymen. Subsequently he published his Defense et Illustration de la Langue Française, in 1549, where, eloquently and learnedly, he would persuade his nation to write in their own language.

Ferreira, the Portuguese poet, about the same time, with all the feelings of patriotism, resolved to give birth to a national literature, exhorting his countrymen to cultivate their vernacular idiom, which he purified and enriched. He has thus feelingly expressed this glorious sentiment:—

“*En desta gloria ao fico contents
Que a minha terra amei, e a minha gente.*”

In Scotland we find Sir David Lindsay, in 1553, writing his great work on the Monarchie, in his vernacular idiom, although he thought it necessary to apologize, by alleging the example of Moses, Aristotle, Plato, Virgil, and Cicero, who had all composed their works in their own language.

In his own country, Lord Berners had anticipated this general movement. In 1525, when he ventured on the toil of his voluminous and spirited Froissart, he described it as “translated out of Frenshe into our maternal English tongue”—an expression which indicates those filial-yearnings of literary patriotism which were now to give us a native literature.

The predominant prejudice of writing in Latin was first checked in Germany, France, and England, by the leaders of that great revolution which opposed the dynasty of the tiara. The versions of the Scriptures seemed to consecrate the vernacular idiom of every nation in Europe.

1446. THE LATIN PUT DOWN BY THE REFORMATION.

It is remarkable how the reformation began to diminish the veneration for the Latin language. Whether from the love of novelty, or rather by that transition to a new system of human affairs, the pedantry of ancient standing was giving way to the cultivation of a national tongue. A great revolution was fast approaching, which would give a new direction to the studies of the scholastic gentry, and introduce a new mode of addressing the people. It was a revolution alarming those who would have walled in public opinion, by circumscribing all knowledge to a privileged class. A remarkable evidence of this disposition appears in an incident which occurred to Sir Thomas Wilson, the author of two English treatises on the Arts of Logic and of Rhetoric. An emigrant, in the days of the Papistic Mary, he was arraigned, at Rome, before the Inquisition, on the general charge of heresy, but especially for having written his Arts of Logic and of Rhetoric, in a language which, at least we may presume, the whole conclave could not have criticized. The torture was not only shown to him, but he tells us that “he had felt some smart of it.” The dark inquisitors taught our critic a new canon in his own favorite arts; and our English Aristarchus soon discovered how far those perfidious arts of reasoning and of eloquence may betray the hapless orator, when his words are listened to by malicious judges, equally skilled in mutilating sentences or catching at loose words. “They brought down my great heart by telling me plainly that my defence had put me into further peril.” Our baffled rhetorician saw that his only safety was to abstain from using the great instrument of his art, which was now locked up in silence. He was left, as he expresses himself, “without all help, and without all hope, not only of liberty, but also of life.” He escaped by a strange incident. It would seem that in an insurrection of the populace, they set fire to the prison, and in a burst of popular freedom, forgetful of their bigotry, or from the spirit of vengeance on their hateful masters, they suffered the heretics to creep out of their cells—an ebullition of public spirit in “the worthy Romans,” which the luckless English expounder of logic and rhetoric might well account as “an enterprise never before attempted.” On Wilson’s return to England, he was solicited to revise his admirable Art of Rhetoric, but he strenuously refused to “meddle with it, either hot or cold.” Still smarting from the torture which his innocent progeny had occasioned, he seems to have alleviated his martyrdom with the quaint humor of a querulous prologue.

1447. ABSURD ATTACHMENT OF MODERN WRITERS TO THE LATIN.

After the reformation had diminished the estimate of the ancient Latin, and there was a universal call for works in the vernacular languages, many authors, ambitious of enduring fame, were unwilling to trust their hopes to “the maternal tongues,” and still wrote in Latin.

Lord Bacon wrote his favorite works in that language; and what he did write in English he was anxious to have preserved, as he expresses himself, in “that unive as books last.”

to have been told that the learned in Europe one day study English authors to learn to think and write, and prefer his own Essays, in their living pith, to the colder transfusions of the Latin versions of his friends. The taste of the philosophic chancellor was probably inferior to his invention. Our illustrious Camden partook largely of this reigning fatuity; as did Buchanan, of Scotland, and De Thou, whose great history includes that of the reformation in France. All these works, addressed to the deepest sympathies of the people, were not imparted to them.

There was a peculiar absurdity in composing modern history in the ancient language of a people alike foreigners to the feelings as well as to the nature of the transactions. The Latin had neither proper terms to describe modern customs, nor fitting ~~expressions~~ ^{expressions} for modern places. The fastidious delicacy of the writers of modern Latinity could not endure to vitiate their classical purity by the Gothic names of their heroes, and of the barbarous localities where memorable transactions had occurred. These great authors, in their despair, actually preferred to shed an obscurity over their whole history, rather than to disturb the collocation of their luminous diction. Buchanan and De Thou, by a luminous play on words, translated the proper names of persons and of places. A Scottish worthy, Wiseheart, was dignified by Buchanan with a Greek denomination — Sophocardus; so that in a history of Scotland the name of a conspicuous hero does not appear, or must be sought for in a Greek lexicon, which, after all, may require a punster for a reader. The history of De Thou is thus frequently unintelligible; and two separate indexes of names and places, and the public stations which his personages held, do not always agree with the copy preserved in the family. The names of the persons are Latinized according to their etymology, and all public offices are designated by those Roman ones which bore some fancied affinity. A remarkable instance of the gross impropriety of composing an English history in Latin, and of the obstinate prejudice of the learned, who imagined that the ancient idiom conferred dignity on a theme wholly vernacular, appeared when the delegates of Oxford purchased Anthony Wood's elaborate work on the History and Antiquities of the University of Oxford. Our honest antiquary, with a true vernacular feeling, had written the history of an English university, during an uninterrupted labor of ten years, in his artless but natural idiom. The learned delegates opined that it was humiliating the Oxford press to have its history pass through it in the language of the country; and Dr. Fell, with others, was chosen to dignify it into Latin. What was the result of this pompous and inane labor? The author was sorely hurt at the sight of his fair offspring disguised in its foreign and fantastic dress. What was clear in English was obscure in the circumlocution of rotund periods and affected phraseologies; the circumstantial narrative and the local descriptions, so interesting to an English reader, were not only superfluous, but repulsive, to the foreigner. Anthony Wood indignantly retranscribed the whole of his English copy, and left the fair volumes to the care of the university itself, not without the hope, which has been realized, that his work should be given to posterity stamped by its author's native genius.

1448. INFLUENCES MODIFYING AND CHANGING OUR LANGUAGE.

"Our language," says D'Israeli, "has been subjected to those dominant events in the history of our country which have so powerfully influenced our genius and our destiny; and, our insular position occasioning a general intercourse with all the continental nations, our national idiom has been mottled by foreign neologisms.

"For more than five centuries was the Saxon language the language of England; the awful revolution of 1066 produced novelties of all kinds, but none greater than the entire change in our Saxon language, which, however, our Norman masters could never eradicate from among the people. During three centuries most of our English writers composed in French. When Greek was first studied, in the reign of Henry VII., it planted many a Hellenism in our English; the translation of the Scriptures, in that of Edward VI., while it transmitted many Latinisms, at the same time revived the simplicity of the Saxon English, which seemed to bear a sort of evidence that a primitive language was most suitable for primitive Christianity, in contrast with the pompous corruptions of Rome.

"Under Elizabeth, favorite phrases were insinuated into the dialect by over-refined travellers, who spoke 'minion-like,' while the revolution of the Netherlands incorporated among us many a rough but vigorous inmate. In the days of James and Charles, the long residence of the Spanish Gondomar at our court, and the romantic pilgrimage of love to Madrid, and the political ties which bound the two nations, framed the style of courtesy, as well as set the fashions.

"The Puritanic commonwealth, under Cromwell, sunk down the language to its basest uses. Stripped to nakedness, the jargon of the market and the shop hid itself under the gibberish of its cant. Writers then abounded equally illiterate and fanatical. Perhaps we owe to these mean scribblers the scorn and pride with which Milton constructed on the Latin model of inversions and involutions of sentences his artificial and learned prose, unlike the style of his contemporaries, and which was never to be that of his successors; it was a machinery too costly for its price, and too unwieldy for the handling of an ordinary workman. Under the second Charles, we see the nation and the language equally Gallicized, and so it remained to the days of Anne. Suppose, for a moment, that when the first Georges were appointed to the English throne, the Germany of that day had been the Germany of the present. What would have been the result? Instead of two torpid Germans, destitute of every sensibility to literature and art, we might have seen an accomplished Duke of Weimar at St. James's, and a Wieland, a Schiller, and a Goethe at our court; our authors had been impressed by the German genius, in our emulation and delight. Such is the simple history of the English language, as it has been, or might have been, subjected to our national events."

1449. ARABIC WORDS IN THE SPANISH.

In Spain, we find that the possession of that land by the Moors has left in the Castilian language a whole dictionary of Arabic words, which now mingle with the vernacular idiom, and forever shall bear witness of the triumphs of their ancient masters.

1450. CHANGES IN THE FRENCH LANGUAGE.

The French, though not an insular people, have been subject to rapid revolutions in their language. The ancient Gaulish French has long been as unintelligible to a modern Frenchman as our Saxon is to us; even those numerous poets of France, who, at a later period, composed in their langue Romane, are strewn in the fields of their poetry only as carcasses, which no miracle of antiquarian lore shall ever resuscitate. Compare the style of one writer with another only two centuries later, or Rabelais with Voltaire. The age of Louis XIV. effected the most rapid change in the vernacular style, inasmuch that the diction of the writers of the preceding reign of Louis XIII. had fallen obsolete in the short space of half a century. And yet the chastened style of the age of Louis XIV., with its cold imitation of classical antiquity, was to receive a higher polish from the hand of a Pascal, a novel brilliancy from the touch of a Montesquieu, and a more numerous prose from the impassioned Rousseau. The age of erudition and taste was to be succeeded by the more energetic age of genius and philosophy. An anecdote recorded of Vangelas may possibly be true, and is a remarkable evidence of this perpetual mobility of style. This writer lived between 1585 and 1650, and during thirty years had been occupied, more suo, on a translation of Quintus Curtius. It was during this protracted period that the French style was passing through its rapid transitions. So many phrases had fallen superannuated, that this martyr to the purity of his diction was compelled to rewrite the former part of his version, to modernize it with his later improved composition. The learned Ménage lived to be old enough to have caught alarm at this vicissitude of taste, and did not scruple to avow that no work could last which was not composed in Latin.

1451. CHAUCER AND SPENSER.

In 1580, Carew informs us that, "Within these sixty years we have incorporated so many Latin and French words, as the third part of our language consisteth in them."

Some there were who, alarmed that such ceaseless infusions were polluting the native springs of English, would look back with veneration and fondness on our ancient masters. The great poet Spenser, then youthful, declared that the language of Chaucer was the purest English, and our bard hailed, in a verse often quoted by the critics,—

"Dan Chaucer, well of English undefiled."

But in this well are deposited many waters. Chaucer has been accused of having enriched the language with the spoils of France, blending the old Saxon with the Norman French and the modern Gaelic of his day, for which he has been vehemently censured by the austerity of philological antiquaries. Skinner and his followers have condemned Chaucer for introducing "a wagon load of words," and have proclaimed that Chaucer "wrote the language of no age"—a reproach which has been transferred to our Spenser himself, who has transplanted many an exotic into the English soil, and recast many an English word for the innocent forgery of a rhyme. So that two of the finest geniuses in our literature, for recasting the language, must lay their heads down to receive the heavy axe of verbal pedantry.

1452. SERVILE IMITATION AND RESTRICTION.

"While the English language," says D'Israeli, "was undergoing the most rapid changes, and subsequently, when more tardy changes were creeping in, there were found those sternly resisting innovation, and pleading amid the popular movement for 'purity of style.' They demand our sympathies, for not a few have suffered martyrdom in their chimerical devotion. In the days of my youth there were some who would not write a word unwarranted by Swift or Tillotson. These were to be held fast for pure idiomatic prose by those who felt insulted by the encumbering lexiphanicisms of the ponderous numerosity of Johnson, and recently by a return to our Saxon words, diminutive in size, have been trumpeted in a set oration at the University of Glasgow, by a noble personage. This taste is rife among critics of limited studies. Charles Fox, a fine genius, who turned towards the pursuits of literature too late in life, was a severe sufferer, and purified his vocabulary with a scrupulosity unknown to any purist; so nervously apprehensive was this great man lest he should not write English. Addison, Bolingbroke, and Middleton were not of sufficient authority, for he would use no word which was not to be found in Dryden. Alas! what disappointments await the few who creep along their Saxon idiom, or who would pore on the free gracefulness of Dryden as a dictionary of words and phrases! Could the chimerical purity which these are in search of be ever found, never would it lend enchantment to their page, should their taste be cold or their fancy feeble. The language of genius must be its own reflection, and the good fortune of authors must receive the stamp used in their own mint."

1453. PROVINCIAL DIALECT IN ENGLAND.

"Had the Heptarchy [Octarchy] continued," observed Bishop Percy, "our English language would probably have been as much distinguished for set dialects as the Greek, or at least as that of the several independent states of Italy." In truth, we remained much in that condition while a power hostile to the national character assumed the sovereignty. So unsettled was the English language, that a writer at the close of the fourteenth century tells us that different parts of the island experienced a difficulty to understand one another. A diversity of pronunciation, as well as a diversity in the language, was so prevalent, that the northern, the southern, and the middle-land men were unintelligible when they met; the middle-land understood the northern and the southern better than the northman and the southman comprehended one another. The English people seemed to form an assemblage of distinct races. Even to this day a scene almost similar might be exhibited. Should a peasant of the Yorkshire dales, and one from the vales of Taunton, and another from the hills of the Chiltern, meet together, they would require an interpreter to become intelligible to each other; but in this dilemma what county could produce the Englishman so versed in provincial dialects as to assist his three honest countrymen?

1454. WONDERFUL MEMORY.

In distinguished men the thorough awakening and vigorous exertion of the mind has more to do with their eminence than is generally thought. In most men the intellectual energies slumber, or are but half put forth. A correspondent of the New York Tribune, writing from Rome, relates some anecdotes of the eminent linguist Cardinal Mezzafonti which illustrate this truth. Mezzafonti is able to speak fifty-two languages. The pope attributes his extraordinary powers in this respect to miraculous aid. A friend of the cardinal's informed the writer that he took the same view of the case; which, with the circumstances mentioned below, shows that his powers as a linguist did probably receive, when extraordinary exertion was demanded, a remarkable impulse and development.

He states that when an obscure priest, in the north of Italy, he was called one day to confess two foreigners condemned for piracy, who were to be executed the next day. On entering their cell he found them unable to understand a word he uttered. Overwhelmed with the thought that the criminals should leave this world without the benefits of religion, he returned to his room, resolved to acquire their language before morning. He accomplished his task, and the next day confessed them in their own tongue. From that time on, he says, he had no difficulty in mastering the most difficult language. The purity of his motive, in the first place, he thinks, influenced the Deity to assist him miraculously. A short time since a Swede, who could speak a patois peculiar to a certain province of Sweden, called on him, and addressed him in that dialect. Mezzafonti had never heard it before, and seemed very much interested. He invited him to call on him often, which he did, while the conversation invariably turned on this dialect. At length the Swede, calling one day, heard himself, to his amazement, addressed in this difficult patois. He inquired of the cardinal who had been his master; for he thought, he said, there was no man in Rome who could speak that language but himself. "I have had no one," he replied, "but yourself. I NEVER forget a word I hear expired in the passage. Thus the Parret, we are told, is the boundary of Somersetshire dialect; for words used east of the Parret are only known by synonyms on the west side. The same incident occurs in Italy, where a single river runs through the level plain; there the Piedmontese peasant from the western end, meeting with a Venetian from the eastern, could hold but little colloquial intercourse together; a Genoese would be absolutely unintelligible to both; for, according to their proverb, "Language was the gift of God, but the Genoese dialect was the invention of the devil." In those rank dialects left to run to seed in their wild state, without any standard of literature, we hardly recognize the national idiom; the Italian language sprung from one common source—its maternal Latin. But this we might not suspect, should we decide solely by its dialects; and we may equally wonder how some of our own could ever have been mangled and distorted out of the fair dimensions of the language of England.

1455. DIALECTS AND LOCALITIES.

If etymology often furnishes a genealogy of words through all their authentic descents, so likewise a map of provincial idioms might be constructed to indicate the localities of the dialects. There we might observe how an expansive and lengthened river, or intervening fells and mountains which separate two counties, can stop the course of a dialect, so that the idiom current on one side, when it passes the borders, becomes intrusive, little regarded, and, ere it reaches a third county, has 1456. LATIN GIVING PLACE TO MODERN LANGUAGES.

About the ninth century barbarous Latin began to give place to the modern languages of France, Spain, and Italy. The council of Tours, in the year 813, ordered the priests to preach in Romance, that they might be understood by the people. We have an odd idea that the clergy did not preach before the reformation. The Roman Catholic clergy always preached, and do preach, in the vulgar tongue.

§ 148. DIFFICULTIES AND BLUNDERS IN THE ACQUIREMENT OF MODERN LANGUAGES.

1457. ORIGINAL ANECDOTE.

A few days since, a lady stepped into a store not a hundred miles from Newtown, and inquired of the dapper little man who kept the same, whether monsieur avait des colliers. "Oui, mademoiselle," said the gentleman, with a profound bow, handing down a horse collar. The lady, nearly screaming with laughter, explained herself in English, and asked for a necklace.

1458. ENGLISH. GERMAN.

An English lady resident at Coblenz, one day wishing to order of her German servant (who did not understand English) a boiled fowl for dinner, Grettel was summoned, and the experiment began. It was one of the lady's fancies, that the less her words resembled her native tongue, the more they must be like German. So her first attempt was to tell the maid that she wanted a cheeking, or keeking. The maid opened her eyes and mouth, and shook her head. "It's to cook," said the mistress, "to cook, to put in an iron thing, in a pit—pat—pot." "Ish understand risht," said the maid, in her Coblenz patois. "It's a thing to eat," said her mistress, "for dinner—for deener—with sauce, sauce—sowose. What on earth am I to do?" exclaimed the lady in despair, but still making another attempt. "It's a little creature—a bird—a bard—a beard—a hen—a hone—a fowl—a fool; it's all covered with feathers—fathers—feeders!" "Ha, hn," cried the delighted German, at last getting hold of a catchword, "Ja, ja! feeders—ja woh!" and away went Grettel, and in half an hour returned triumphantly, with a bundle of stationers' quills.

1459. QUITE A MISTAKE.

A Frenchman, who knew very little of our language, unfortunately got into a difficulty with a back countryman, and fight he must, and that, too, rough and tumble. But before he went at it, he was very anxious to know what he should cry if he found himself whipped. After being informed that, when satisfied, all he would have to do would be to cry out "enough," at it they went; but poor monsieur, in his difficulties, forgot the word, and finding his eyes likely to be removed from their sockets, he began to cry out; but instead of saying what was told him, he commenced bawling out, "Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah!"

To his astonishment, the countryman kept pounding the harder; when monsieur, finding there was no use hallooing, turned and went to work in such good earnest, that it was not long before the countryman sang out, in a stentorian voice, "Enough."

"Say dat again," said the Frenchman.

"Enough, enough!" cried he again.

The Frenchman in turn exclaimed, "Dat is de vere word I vas trying to say long time ago."

1460. A SARCASTIC REPLY.

A lady at Vienna having somewhat rudely remarked to Mr. Ward that it was strange that all the best society spoke French as well as German, while the English scarcely spoke French at all, or spoke it ill, Ward answered that the English must be excused for their want of practice, as the French army had not been twice to London to teach them, as they had to Vienna.

1461. INCONVENIENCE OF NOT UNDERSTANDING FRENCH.

"Never go to France," says Hood, "unless you know the lingo." The propriety of this advice is well illustrated in an anecdote related of an Englishman, who being hard run for a cab at the Jardin des Plantes, in Paris, during a sudden shower, rushed out and called a cocher, or driver; but his pronunciation was so bad, that the "cad" understood him to say cochon, or hog; whereat ensued a speedy bout and fisticuffs.

1462. AMUSING ANECDOTE.

The confidence with which the French travel about, speaking their language indiscriminately to all nations, and the certainty with which they think they must be understood, has often been productive of laughable mistakes. The following is an example; and what renders it more really amusing is, that we are assured it is a fact:—

A young Parisian, going to Amsterdam, was attracted by the remarkable beauty of a house situated near the canal. He addressed a Dutchman, in French, who stood near him in the vessel, with, "Pray, sir, may I ask who that house belongs to?" The Hollander answered him in his own language, "Ik kan niet verstaan," (I do not understand you.) The Parisian, not doubting but what he understood, took the Dutchman's answer for the name of the proprietor. "O, O," said he, "it belongs to Mr. Kaniferstane. Well, I am sure he must be very agreeably situated; the house is most charming, and the garden appears delicious. I don't know that ever I saw a better. A friend of mine has one much like it, near the river at Choisy; but I certainly give this the preference." He added many other observations of the same kind, to which the Dutchman, not understanding them, made no reply.

When he arrived at Amsterdam, he saw a most beautiful woman on the quays, walking arm in arm with a gentleman. He asked a person that passed him who that charming lady was; but the man, not understanding French, replied, "Ik kan niet verstaan." "What, sir," replied our traveller, "is that Mr. Kaniferstane's wife, whose house is near the canal? Indeed, this gentleman's lot is enviable; to possess such a noble house and so lovely a companion."

The next day, when he was walking out, he saw some trumpeters playing at a gentleman's door, who had got the largest prize in the Dutch lottery. Our Parisian, wishing to be informed of the gentleman's name, he was still answered, "Ik kan niet verstaan." "O," said he, "this is too great an accession of good fortune! Mr. Kaniferstane proprietor of such a fine house, husband of such a beautiful woman, and to get the largest prize in the lottery! It must be allowed that there are some very fortunate men in the world."

About a week after this, our traveller, walking about, saw a very superb burying. He asked whose it was. "Ik kan niet verstaan," replied the person of whom he asked the question. "O my God," exclaimed he; "poor Mr. Kaniferstane, who had such a noble house, such an angelic wife, and the largest prize in the lottery. He must have quitted this world with great regret; but I thought his happiness was too complete to be of long duration." He then went home, reflecting all the way on the instability of human affairs.

1463. HUMILITY.

An Englishman talking with a German friend, a man of a remarkably philosophical cast of mind, and fond of clothing his sentiments in the graces of classical allusion, the discourse happened to turn upon the mortifications to which those subject themselves who seek after the vanities of this world. Our friend was for a stoical independence, and had Diogenes in his eye. "For mine self," he exclaimed, with rising enthusiasm, "I should be quite contentment for to live all my days in a dub, eating noting else but unicorns!" (acorns.)

1464. MISAPPLICATION OF WORDS.

It is said that Dr. Chalmers once entertained at his table a distinguished guest from Switzerland, whom he asked if he would be helped to "kippered salmon." The foreign divine asked the meaning of the uncouth word kippered, and was told that it meant preserved. The poor man in a public prayer soon after offered a petition that the distinguished divine might long be "kippered to the Free Church of Scotland."

1465. LUDICROUS BLUNDER.

A Frenchman, having frequently heard the word press made use of to imply persuade.—ns, "press that gentleman to take some refreshments." "press him to stay to-night,"—thought he would display his talents by using what he imagined a synonymous term; and therefore made no scruple one evening to cry out in company, "Pray, squeeze that lady to sing."

1466. PHILOLOGICAL CONCEIT.

"Come here. Gas-son," said a young fopling, at one of our metropolitan eating-houses. A waiter presented himself. "Your name isn't Gas-son, is it, Stupid? I called Gas-son, yonder." And he beckoned to a lad, whom he had heard called garçon, the day before, to do his bidding. This reminds one of the story of a person of pleasing address and appearance, who was encountered on board a steam packet from Dover to Calais. It was observed that whenever he obtained an auditor, he would address him courtously, and commence a discussion of the qualities of two carriages which were on the forward deck. "That 'ere big coach," said he, "is a nice 'un; but them 'ere scratches on the cab, them's the worst on't, though!" A gentleman, who heard these coarse remarks thrice repeated to different individuals, by a person of pleasing and gentlemanlike exterior, had the curiosity to inquire of one who seemed to be a companion voyager, why it should happen that his language was so strangely out of keeping with his general bearing; when, lo! it transpired that he was a Parisian, sporting the little English he had learned of a cockney valet, in a brief stay in London, before his countrymen. Many an "ignoramus" on this side the water makes himself equally ridiculous, in misapplying and mispronouncing the language of this ambitious Gaul; speaking it like the man whom Matthews describes, who boasted of his perfection in French, but gave the credit to his felicitous acquisition; he "larnt it of a Gecaarman, that larnt it of a Scotchman at Dunkirk!"

1467. ETHIOPIAN FRENCH.

A correspondent of the New York Spirit of the Times tells a humorous incident of a colored servant's translation of French. He says, "Our children have every morning some bread and molasses, or bread and ham, as children must have, to pacify their active appetites; and one day, when Daphne first came with us, we went out for the morning, and left her to take care of the children. She kept them quiet until they began to want something to eat, which they got, and were all well enough but Charley; but he was not going to have any thing but bread and ham, and that he would have. So he began to put up his hand to his mouth, and cry for 'du pain et jambon—du pain et jambon!' but this was all High Dutch to Daphne, and the more he cried the less Daphne could understand. All she could do by way of consolation amounted to nothing. However, we came home soon, and the little ones flocked about us.

"Pa," said one of them, 'Charley has been crying for du pain et jambon.'

"Yes, massa," said Daphne, 'I wish to de Lor' you would do someting for dat boy, for he been cryin' about a pain in his jawbone eber since you been away!'

1468. THE DUTCHMAN AND THE ENGLISH.

The services at an ancient church on the Hudson River were originally performed in the Dutch dialect. It was at length proposed, at a stated meeting, that, as there were many in the congregation who did not understand Dutch, and but few who could not comprehend more or less of English, the religious performances should be in English, at least a part of the time, and that English Bibles should also be used among the members. This proposition met with decided opposition from one old-school Dutchman. "I don't know any t'ing about dat," said he; "I an't going to give up my 'ligion; I mean to stick to de fai' of my faders!" When remonstrated with, and informed that the change could in no respect vary his creed, or vitiate the faith of his fathers, he waxed exceedingly wroth, and put an end to all further discussion, with, "I shan't argue mit any body about it at all; I shan't alter my 'ligion! I'll stick to de fai' of my faders, and I'll suck to my Dutch Bible, if I'm d—d for it!" We believe it was this same choleric stickler for ancient usages, who refused to vote for a lightning rod, when the old church was new. "We've been," said he, "to great deal droubles, and great deal 'spense, to build a house for God Almitis; and now if he's a mind to dunder on his own house, and burn him up, let him dunder den! I shan't vote for de dunder rod!"

1469. EFFECTS OF NOT KNOWING FRENCH.

Not long after the general peace, when all classes of English travellers, learned and unlearned, polished and unpolished, flocked to the continent, in search of the classical and the picturesque, one of these pilgrims met a companion, sitting in a state of most woful despair, and apparently near the last agonies, by the side of one of the mountain lakes of Switzerland. With great anxiety he inquired the cause of his suffering. "O," said the latter, "I was very hot and thirsty, and took a large draught of the clear water of the lake, and then sat down on this stone to consult my guide-book. To my astonishment, I found there that the water of this lake is very poisonous! O, I am a gone man. I feel it running all over me. I have only a few minutes to live! Remember me to ——" "Let me see the guide-book," said his friend. Turning to the passage, he found, "L'eau du lac est bien poisseuse," (The water of the lake abounds in fish.) "Is that the meaning of it?" "Certainly." "I never was better," said the dying man, leaping up, with a countenance radiant as the sun on a fine May morning. Then, extending his arm in the true long-bow style,—"There's muscle"—he cut a series of capers over the grass that would have done honor to a Vestris. "What would have become of you," said his friend, "if I had not met you?" "I should have died of imperfect knowledge of the French language."

1470. FRENCH HOTELS.

A western editor, according to the New Orleans Bulletin, not exactly understanding that "hotel" is synonymous with our mansion, or residence, after announcing from some European paper that Talleyrand had died "at his hotel in Paris," proceeded in the most pathetic manner to descant on the mutability of human affairs,—how this man had ruled France by his great talents, had been the right arm of Napoleon, his confident and adviser,—recounted all manner of important things he had, and many that he had not done, and finally wound up the grand climax by saying, that notwithstanding the distinguished rôle he had played, he at last "died at a tavern-keeper."

1471. A COW IN A BOX, alias A COUGH IN THE CHEST.
